were difficult, the years were full ones too. Then her eyes open with a start. The exercises are over, and a new generation is on its way. With that generation may come yet another Gilbreth picture, but one hopes not; the two have been so satisfactory. This one is Myrna Loy's movie, as the first was Clifton Webb's, and she takes over as an efficiency engineer who is also the mother of an enormous brood would be expected to do. Ably abetted by Jeanne Crain and a necessarily large cast, she turns in a performance that helps make Belles one of the best, and certainly the biggest, family movie so far this year.
Cast: Jeanne Crain, Myrna Loy, Debra Paget, Jeffrey Hunter, Barbara Bates.—20th Century-Fox.

ANYTHING CAN HAPPEN

This is the inspirational story of the making of an American: Giorgi Papashvily, a Georgian (Near Eastern variety) who comes to the United States in the Thirties knowing little of the country's language and practically nothing of its customs. It tells how, with the help of a group of his expatriate friends, he becomes first a construction worker, then a cook and finally an orange grower in California; and how he woos and wins a West Coast girl named Helen. This story of an immigrant is neither Horatio Alger tale nor epic struggle. Based on the autobiographical book of the same name by George and Helen Papashvily, it is very human, often even moving, and manages to retain much of the simplicity and semi-humorous detachment that made the book a best-seller. This is made possible partly through the performance of Academy Award-winner José Ferrer, who shows movie audiences another facet of his many-sided art. If there is a quibble to be made about his handling of the role, it would be about the very facility with which he does it; sometimes he speaks faster than would be normal for a neophyte at English, and he seems to be almost too alert in "catching on" to American ways. But generally he is not only a young and winning Giorgi but manages the difficult accent in a manner that is never cute or self-conscious. Kim Hunter, who looks prettier with each movie appearance, plays Helen admirably, and a whole raft of first-rate character actors complete the cast as Giorgi's Georgian friends.
Cast: José Ferrer, Kim Hunter, Oscar Beregi.

SINGIN' IN THE RAIN

As a screen musical, Singin' In The Rain possesses two rare virtues: a relaxed, unpretentious production and a story line just about as unhackneyed as anything that has come along since On The Town. By more than a coincidence, the direction and writing of both pictures are the work of the same teams (Gene Kelly-Stanley Donen and Betty Comden-Adolph Green, respectively). Gene Kelly is in the new film, too, and he gives his usual ingratiating performance as a dashing, Douglas Fairbanks-type hero of the silent screen. Jean Hagen is the other member of a famous acting team. She presents a genuinely side-splitting portrait of a silent-screen actress whose voice is hardly wired for sound. Complications set in for her partner when she begins to take seriously studio press-agentry linking her romantically with him; and complications set in for her when The Jazz Singer opens and sets movie people talking. (Her voice is a high squeak and her diction the sort that maligns pure Brooklynese.) How Kelly, his side-kick (Donald O'Connor) and his sought-after (Debbie Reynolds) manage to salvage both his romance and his studio's investment provides the rest of the plot. As a special added attraction, Cyd Charisse appears in a couple of stunning dance numbers. Singin' in the Rain is a rare musical treat. Cast: Gene Kelly, Donald O'Connor, Debbie Reynolds, Jean Hagen, Cyd Charisse.—MGM.

FLESH AND FURY

The pretentious title that adorns this film hides its most engaging quality—that it is a comparatively worthy motion picture made on a comparatively modest budget. Flesh And Fury is no Golden Boy, but it is a surprisingly honest and often very touching fight story. It features far-and-away the best performance Tony Curtis has yet given. And the part of the fighter he has to play is not a particularly easy one: For most of the footage he is both deaf and dumb. Acting such a character calls for a kind of mute sensitivity that Curtis projects quite effectively from the time Jan Sterling, as a blonde named Sonya with a heart set on gold, first sees him fighting a preliminary bout in a small-time arena. The screenplay follows his rise in the ring to the point where he is ready for important matches. Then he meets Mona Freeman, who offers him understanding companionship that contrasts sharply with Sonya's passion for dollars and cents. From here on in, the film contains so much unnecessary melodramatic action that a good deal of its original effectiveness is lost. Yet its purpose remains a serious and laudable one—to show that some sort of insecurity grips everyone, so that a man who feels unsure of himself need never feel alone.
Cast: Jan Sterling, Tony Curtis, Mona Freeman.—Universal.

VALLEY OF THE EAGLES

The star of Valley Of The Eagles is its locale. The vast, panoramic reaches of far-northern Scandinavia and the nomadic Lapps who inhabit them provide a very real, rather overwhelming background for a spy story that is actually no great shakes. Yet the barren austerity of the setting lends a certain authenticity to the simple scenario: about a Swedish scientist who helps chase his wife and his former assisant through desolate snow regions to recover a sensational invention stolen for the possible military use of another nation. This is country where man is pitted not only against man but against pitiless nature, and the purposes of nations seem puny by comparison. The performances are keyed to this stark fact; the members of the predominantly British cast, play their parts in appropriately straightforward fashion. But it is the land itself and the phenomena native to it that make the film consistently interesting. The shots of a fight between hungry wolves and the Laplanders' trained eagles, for example, or the northern trek of a Lapp tribe with their reindeer, are unique among those ever introduced into a feature picture. It is because director-writer Terence Young's basic documentary approach is so sound—because he has mixed his melodramatic screen-writing so well with a measure of the wild melodrama of nature—that he has come up with a really exciting off-beat film.
Cast; John McCallum, Nadia Gray, Jack Warner.—Lippert Pictures.

FOR BRIGHTER, RICHER, NATURAL COLOR

Wearing a white satin gown (she bought it two years ago "just in case") Betty and her new husband Charlie O'Curran share the first piece of cake at their wedding reception. Their midnight elopement came as a surprise!

Hutton's Prince Charlie

by Maurice Saunders

"I'm through with love," Betty cried—and everyone believed her, except a mild-mannered Irishman named O'Curran.

Just a few short weeks ago, Betty Hutton gave an interview to George Fisher, the CBS Motion Picture Editor, in which she stated quite frankly that marriage, as far as she was concerned, was just a word that started with M. Expanding on her views, Betty said that one unfortunate try for wedded bliss and a couple of sour engagements had convinced her that her true love was and would be her career—something she'd had since she was three years old. It was a serious discussion and Betty Hutton meant every word of it.

The next time Betty Hutton appeared at George Fisher's microphone, she had an entirely different story to tell. As a matter of fact, at that time her name had been changed to Betty O'Curran—and she was married to a dance director, Charlie O'Curran, a fellow she didn't even bother to get engaged to.

How did it happen?

Well, as Betty put it on her second appearance on the program, she had just gotten back from Korea where she had played for thousands of soldiers, lonely men grimy with the soil of hard living and battle. She had played camp after camp and dozens of forward positions—and during each performance she stood on a rude stage and gazed out at a sea of male faces huddled together in the cold or rain and saw loneliness. And she told Fisher: "I guess when I looked at all those men and realized that not one of them was really mine, I decided I wanted to be married. I was in love with Charlie, and I suppose it was then that I decided I'd marry him—even though I didn't realize it at the time."

If you knew Betty Hutton intimately, you would know that this was the way it had to happen to her. If you knew the heartbreak she had suffered at the time of her divorce from Ted Briskin, and the loneliness she suffered during the few years she had to live alone, you'd know that a shock like meeting terrible loneliness and need face to face would propel her into making (Continued on page 83)

Hope comes to Indiana*

By Sgt. Karl K. Deigert

■ Nobody noticed the cold that night at Camp Atterbury, Indiana. Instead of the usual gloomy faces and complaining voices that hang over an army camp, the post was filled with laughter and excitement. Thousands of soldiers gathered expectantly outside the post's sports arena. A huge sign atop it shouted: "Bob Hope In Person Tonight!"

And to think I was responsible for it all! Weeks before, I'd entered a nationwide contest to pick the town where Bob Hope would premiere his latest picture, My Favorite Spy. The patients in the army hospital where I was in charge of Special Services needed entertainment badly—and this was a terrific opportunity to get it for them, I figured.

I forgot all about the contest after I entered it—until my commanding officer called me into his office. "We just got a phone call from Bob Hope! You won second prize in that contest. Get started making arrangements for an all-star show, soldier, two weeks from today!"

Boy, what arrangements we made! The arena was completely remodeled, a new stage built, a new sound system installed.

Bob and his troupe rolled into camp to the strains of the band's "Welcome, Mister," that day, and the new arena almost burst its seams. Almost 5,000 men jammed into it for the first show (there were two shows scheduled for the arena, and one for the hospital).

The applause was thunderous as Hope walked on stage. He fell to his knees, praising Allah in typical Hindu fashion. After bandleader Les Brown helped him off the floor, Bob grabbed the microphone and began sending jokes in all directions.

"Where's Crosby?" one of the soldiers yelled out. "Well," answered Hope, "Dad was coming out here with me, but he had a nasty accident—he fell off his wallet!"

The rest of the troupe—Gloria Grahame, Jerry Colonna, Jan Sterling, Susan Morrow, Mary Murphy, and Marilyn Maxwell came on stage one by one to do their act. Hope was always in there pitching; he clowned with each one of them, danced, sang, and brought the house down time after time.

Without a doubt, no one in the audience except myself knew that the man who was giving his all to entertain them had been ordered to bed by a doctor several hours prior to the show. However, Hope had refused to disappoint the men, and had gone on with a fever of 102 degrees.

When the show was over, Bob went down into the audience to talk with the patients. I'll never forget how his face changed when he looked at one of the youngsters who'd come back from Korea with half his face blown away. The patient managed to smile at Hope, and there was happiness shining out of the one eye he had left. After Hope shook hands with him, he directed a steady stream of jokes in his direction for about ten minutes. As I watched, I realized how tough it must be to try to bring laughter to men who have so little to live for. While Hope joked and mugged, I thought I saw a tear rolling down his cheek—but whoever heard of a great clown crying!

When Hope left the base that night, more than 10,000 soldiers had had their morale boosted 100%.

Now I am on my way to Korea, where I hope to continue my work in Special Services, to try to bring a little laughter to the men wounded over there. I'm sure I can't fail, for I had as a teacher a great "soldier in greasepaint"—Bob Hope.

 Bob Hope's trip to Camp Atterbury, Indiana, was a special second prize, not originally planned for his radio contest. This display of good citizenship in the highest tradition of show business earned Bob Hope the* Modern Screen award in 1952.

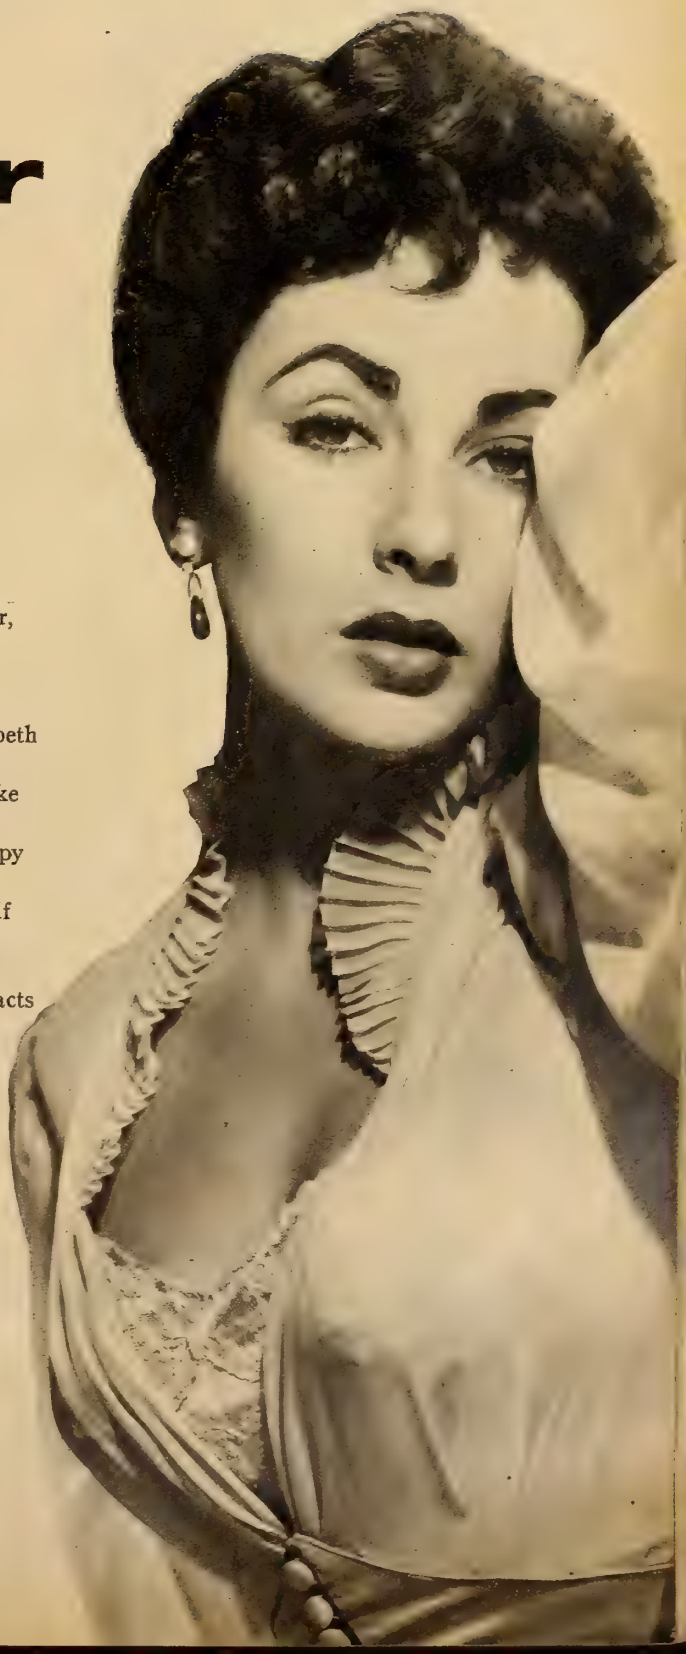
the love secret liz never told

by Giselle La Falaise



Her honeymoon bliss in the Alps revealed nothing of the inner turmoil Liz felt before marrying Mike.

L'Alpe d' Huez, Switzerland: Nothing delights a journalist more than to suddenly encounter, especially in a remote part of the world like this, an exclusive, "now it can be told," scoop on the year's most enchanting bride.

To begin with, let it be known that Elizabeth Taylor, the exquisite princess of Hollywood, didn't stroll dreamily into this marriage to Mike Wilding. She ran swiftly. The speed with which Elizabeth deliberately wrote her own happy ending to the romance Hollywood couldn't understand was such that the bridegroom himself seemed a little taken aback.

But that was before he knew what had been going on in Hollywood after his picture contracts called him to England, forcing a temporary separation from his beloved Liz. And it was before Elizabeth told him the things she found impossible to say by transatlantic telephone.

I must explain, here, that although Hollywood spends most of its waking hours manufacturing stories about great loves, it seldom recognizes that kind of love when it actually happens. In fact, many of the geniuses who create stories of noble passion for movie audiences don't believe what they preach on celluloid. That is why so few people in Hollywood could convince themselves that Elizabeth Taylor and Michael Wilding were serious (Continued on page 95)

MODERN SCREEN brought you the poignant drama of the John Waynes' break-up. Here is the sequel—the only possible one—reconciliation.

BY JIM HENAGHAN

One day early this year, John Wayne sat in a wicker chair on the verandah of a Mexican hacienda, his feet propped up on a small table. He was staring listlessly across a lush green landscape at the purple sea that broke half a mile away on a white beach. He had been sitting there for hours, soaking sun and thinking. A friend sat a few feet from him chewing on pieces of coconut meat and listening to a small portable radio. But there was no conversation between them.

Although nobody spoke about it very much, Wayne had his troubles. He had been sitting this way for more than a month, all of his thoughts on the separation that was keeping him away from his wife, Esperanza. There had been no serious quarrel, no publicity, just one of those quiet talks in which a woman tells a man it's all over. And the man in this case had picked up his hat and walked, then flew, until he got a long way from his home where he could think things over. It required a lot of thinking, because John Wayne was in love with his wife and he wanted to win her back.

Presently the music changed on the radio and a French singer crooned a ballad. Wayne lifted up his head and looked at the set. "J'attendrai" was the name of the song—and it held a special meaning for Duke Wayne. When the chorus was over, he got to his feet.

"Come on," he said to his pal, "let's get out of here. I want to go home."

"Right now?" asked his friend.

"Right now," said Duke. "J'attendrai" means "I'll be waiting." I've been waiting long enough. I'm going back to see if Chata will let me in the house."

Rita's night-clubbing with Kirk Douglas took the columnists by surprise. Kirk was her first date in Hollywood, as Rita had been in virtual seclusion since filing for divorce from Aly Khan in Reno.

"I'm not an actress, I'm a dancer," says Rita. Affair In Trinidad got off to a slow start because she refused to work with an unfinished script. Now Affair is finished and her next film is Salome.

by LOUELLA PARSONS

A MODERN SCREEN FIRST: THE ONLY AUTHENTIC INTERVIEW

■ Since her return to Hollywood Rita Hayworth has flatly refused to answer or discuss the following "forbidden" topics:

Is she still in love with Aly Khan?

Is there a chance of a reconciliation even though she has picked up her divorce papers in Nevada?

Is she "broke" because of footing the bills during her marriage?

Is she giving up the Moslem faith and returning to her Christian religion?

In which faith will she bring up her children—particularly two-year-old Yasmine, daughter of Moslem Prince Aly?

How has she taken the bitter criticism heaped on her head since Aly came into her life?

Has she been unreasonably temperamental since her return to Columbia?

Where—and why—is she "hiding away" with her two children in Beverly Hills?

Without fear of contradiction I can tell you that these questions were practically taboo with Rita.

Her only answer to anything pertaining to her private life was "I cannot discuss that subject"—and the freeze was on.

As an old friend of Rita's, I had tried to break down that wall of resistance. I had called her several times—but she did not return any of my phone calls.

On one occasion I had met her briefly in an office at Columbia and she'd answered a few questions in a perfunctory way. Frankly, I was hurt.

Rita had always told me her troubles ever since she was just little Margarita Cansino. I had attended her wedding to Aly Khan in France as the only newspaperwoman and one of the three American friends invited so I couldn't understand her attitude.

I sincerely believed that Rita needed help, that her side of her headlined marriage and separation should be put before the fans if they were to take Rita to their hearts again. Some of the things I thought the public had a right to know were the very subjects Rita was steadfastly refusing to discuss with even her closest friends.

So, once more I put in a call to her and—surprise, surprise—she answered!

I told her I wanted to talk with her—to really let our hair down—and she, herself, suggested her home for the meeting. Which proved one point; she was no longer trying to make a mystery of her whereabouts, at least with me.

The address Rita gave led to a simple and unpretentious place she has rented for herself and the children at the end of a secluded street in Beverly Hills. It is a small place of nondescript style—English, if anything—with a large garden and much tall shrubbery in the back. Later, Rita described it as "a little on the murky side," but it is comfortable and convenient for her small household.

The maid let me in and no sooner had I entered the hallway than I was completely taken over by a little two-year-old charmer who was tugging at my skirts and pulling me toward the divan in the brown-and-chintz living room.

"I'm Yasmine," this adorable little thing introduced herself. "What's your name?"

"Lolly," I replied.

"Come on, Lolly," she said. "Let's look at my picture books."

In nothing flat I was completely under the spell of this darling blue-eyed, reddish-haired baby daughter of Rita and Aly.

You could just eat her with a spoon. No photograph has ever done justice to this child who is so gay and so lovely to look at, with her mother's vivid coloring and her father's gracious charm.

I think if Aly saw her as she is now he would be down on his knees to get Rita to take him back. Whatever his faults, Aly is a devoted father as his love for his two sons has proven.

Yasmine and I were bent over a picture book, and she was chattering like a magpie when Rita came in breathless from a dash up the steps. She was wearing a red sweater and blue jeans —a most informal array for an (Continued on page 93)

Lanza's the target for every crackpot, and a slave to the public now. Read how a nice, plain guy is trapped in the snarl of his own success story.

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ One Sunday a few weeks ago, Mario Lanza was awakened at eight in the morning by an insistent hammering on his front door.

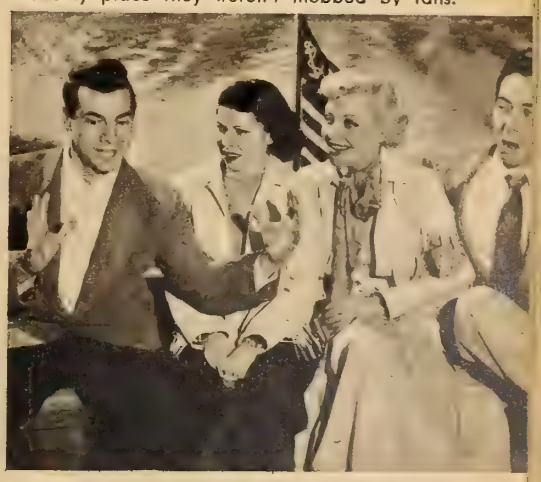
Half asleep, Mario struggled into his robe and shuffled downstairs.

He opened the door, and a telegraph messenger handed him an envelope which contained the following wire: DON'T KNOW IF YOU REMEMBER BUT WE WERE IN VARE JUNIOR HIGH TOGETHER STOP MY MOTHER DESPERATELY ILL PLEASE WIRE FIFTEEN HUNDRED DOLLARS TO BELOW ADDRESS.

Mario shook his head in disbelief. He couldn't for the life of him recall the identity of the sender.

Two days later, he received a special delivery letter from the same person which said in part, "I didn't want to believe all those stories about your growing snobbish and swell-headed, but since you haven't sent the money after my fervent plea, what else can I believe?"

The fellow who sent that letter was a perfect stranger to Mario, who has an excellent memory. "Yet," says Betty Lanza, "you'd be surprised by the number of similar requests we get from people we've never heard of. As soon as the newspapers carried the story that Mario made a million dollars last year, he became the target for every crackpot, beggar and confidence man in the country. It's gotten so bad we've had to hire someone to separate the legitimate requests from the loony ones."



Six years ago, when Mario Lanza was a concert singer with the Bel Canto Trio, he dreamed of being rich and famous, of owning two cars, providing his parents with luxuries, and taking pretty good care of himself. (Continued on page 86)

Mario gets little chance for simple pleasures he loves (above). He's much too busy. "Success is a snare and a delusion," he says now.

Recently the Lanzas went to Las Vegas for a rest. The local reservoir was their sanctuary—the only place they weren't mobbed by fans.

Mario can only dream of "the one that got away," with no time to go fishing. He and Betty visited the Andy Russells in Las Vegas.

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

for Shelley— ALL OR NOTHING

Shelley praises Vittorio to the skies. "He's remarkable, brilliant and a great artist," she says. "Our marriage will be the most important thing in my life. I'll work at it night and day."

■ They were sitting around in Hollywood talking about Shelley Winters. Opinion was pretty equally divided. There were those who loved her and those who hated her, and nobody could change anyone's mind. Finally, someone said. "You know, I think Shelley is a wistful girl."

"Wistful!" Someone else exploded.

"Shelley, wistful? Why, I want to tell you when I was writing a script for her I did every scene two ways. I could have killed her off in any scene on any day, and it was only that threat that kept her in line."

"You ought to see her at an interview," a girl said. "She stands there snapping her fingers and saying, 'Come on, get on with it. I have a lot of things to do.' Real cooperative."

"I love her," a columnist said. "I love her honesty, and what she said about her performance in A Place In The Sun. She said, 'Every time I see it I get better.' That's refreshing after all the phony humility in Hollywood."

"Speaking of A Place In The Sun," a young starlet said, "I was at the opening. I love Shelley. When I said hello to her and Farley she couldn't have been sweeter. She showed me her dress—all torn where some kids had stepped on it—but she didn't care. Then she saw somebody else she knew, and rushed down the aisle to speak. The usher told her she was in the wrong place, so she dashed out into the lobby and pretty soon—well practically immediately—she was rushing (Continued on page 97)

john speaks for himself

In Hollywood, flattery will get you somewhere—but not with John Derek. He won't kid you . . . or let you kid him!

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

■ Some months ago, John Derek, a writer, and a studio publicist were basking in the sun on the Dereks' patio while an interview went on.

"What do you like to read?" the writer asked John.

"Not much," John said, stifling a yawn. "Never did read much. There were too many other things to do."

"Really!" said the writer with raised eyebrows, and the studio publicist tried desperately to catch John's eye.

"Patti likes it, though," continued Mr. Derek. "She has her nose in a book all the time. Can tell you anything you want to know about them."

The interviewer shifted in his chair, and the publicist coughed.

"Do you and your wife go to nightclubs very often?"

"Nope. Can't afford it. We don't go out very much at all. It's comfortable up here on the hill and besides, we can't afford a baby sitter."

The writer put down his pencil and looked at John in disbelief. "Oh, come now," he said.

Suddenly, the publicist broke in. "John," he said, "what's that stretch of flat land over there to the south?"

John grinned. "It's an irrigation project, and I've told you three times already." He turned back to the writer. "As a matter of fact, we're up to our ears with this house. It's mortgaged to the hilt. It's pretty expensive land, you know—"

Here he trailed off and looked at the publicist, who was plucking a piece of lint from his sleeve. John laughed. "He always does that when he wants me to change the subject, but I'm going to finish what I (Continued on page 91)

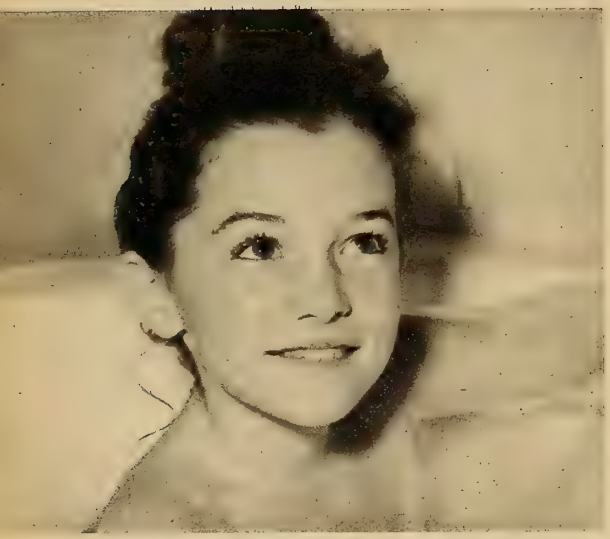
IF YOU KNEW ANNIE!

■ One sunny afternoon last spring, Anne Baxter was strolling barefooted along the glamorous Sunset Strip in Hollywood, thoroughly enjoying the sights. She'd started out properly shod on the daily two-mile hike—doctor's orders, for she was just barely expecting Katrina then—but the dusty path through the Hollywood hills was hot and the shoes oppressive, so she'd just yanked them off. Then, dropping down to Sunset Boulevard a mile below her house, she couldn't squeeze them back on her feet. That didn't particularly bother Anne, nor what happened next:

Out of the corner of her eye she spied the sleek, black Cadillac cut over to the curb and the door swing open. Anne revved up her lackadaisical gait and pretended she was chewing gum. The sharpie who leaned out and invited, "How about a ride, kid?" was unprepared for the round, brown eyes which beamed innocently at him and the rosebud mouth which made a loud smack as if popping the gum.



"Oh, thanks, mister, so much," she chirped guilelessly, "but my mama's waiting for me up at the corner." As she tripped merrily on, the car roared off with a supremely disgusted wolf snapping back the bitter insult, "Jailbait!"

Anne padded on up the hill to her house on Pine Tree Place and burst through the front door happily. "Guess what just happened to me!" she begged John Hodiak excitedly, and since he couldn't possibly guess, she told him.

"Why the rat!" exploded her lord and master. "I'll murder him! Imagine the nerve—and you in your condition and everything—" and he leaped for the phone to call the cops, the fire department, the FBI or whatever might be necessary to right the wrong. It took a few minutes, but Anne (Continued on page 60)

■ There are five reasons why, according to amateur psychologists, Gene Kelly's marriage should have foundered years ago:

(1) Gene is Catholic, and Betsy is Protestant.

(2) Gene is 12 years older than Betsy.

(3) Gene's acting career has been fabulously more successful than Betsy's.

(4) Gene is well-educated, a graduate of the University of Pittsburgh. Betsy never went to college. She's been a model, dancer, and actress from the age of nine.

(5) Wealth is conspicuous by its absence in Gene's background. Betsy comes from a fairly well-to-do family—her father is an insurance broker and her mother was a schoolteacher.

Despite these vital differences, the Gene Kellys have been one of the most happily-married couples in Hollywood for the past 11 years.

How come?

The reason is simple: Gene and Betsy, instead of being temperamental and self-centered, live for each other—not tempestuously with "sweetheart" and "honey-bunch" as their every other word, but in a calm, deliberate, mutually considerate manner.

A few months ago, Gene was flying over Paris en route to Munich to star opposite Pier Angeli in The Devil Makes Three.

It was a fast flight but a rough one, and all through it Gene kept clutching at his side, trying to mask the grimaces of pain which broke out on his face.

When he checked into the Hotel Lancaster, Gene, who hates being sick, had sense enough to call the house doctor.

An examination revealed that he was suffering from an acute case of appendicitis, and would have to be operated on at once.

"Your wife," the doctor said. "Where is your wife? She must be notified immediately."

"Skip it," Gene said.

Irritated by this phlegmatic American, the doctor said, "This is no laughing matter. (Continued on page 62)

"I want to do whatever brings Betsy the most happiness," says Gene. "Isn't it funny," Betsy adds, "that's exactly how I feel about Gene."

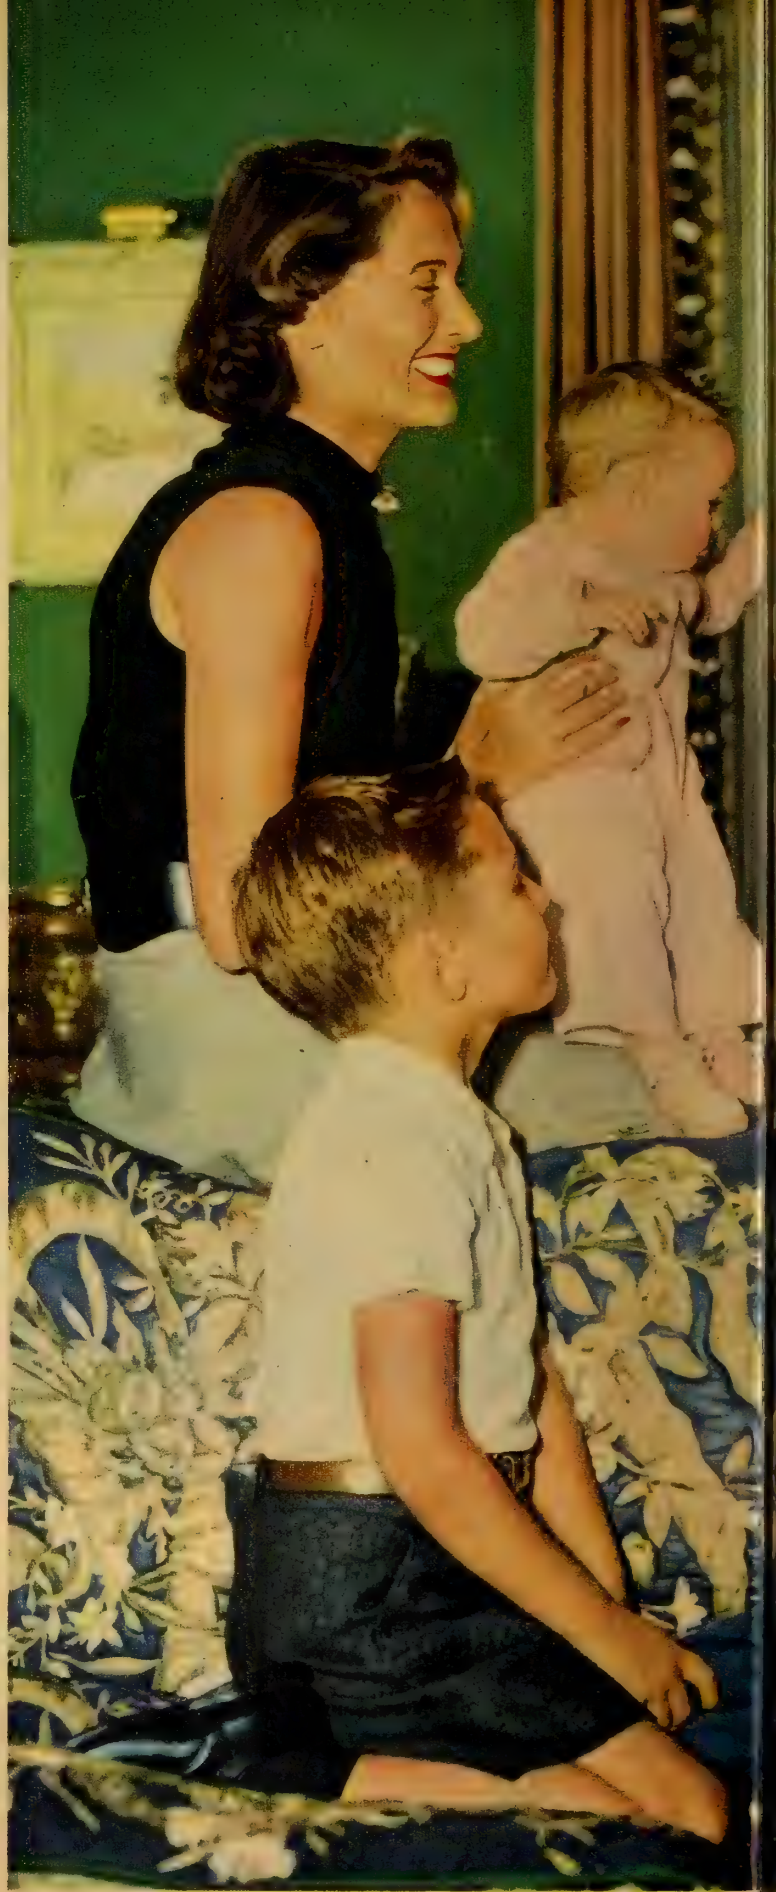
■ A few months ago Jack Benny was gazing out of his window and suddenly he thought he saw a parade.

"Mary," he shouted. "Come to the window. The circus is in town."

Mary Benny came and looked. She saw a tremendous German shepherd trotting up the avenue followed by two small boys on bicycles, a tall, attractive girl accompanied by an even taller, leaner man, and a nursemaid wheeling a pair of twins.



"Don't be silly," Mary explained. "That's no circus. Those are the Jimmy Stewarts out for an airing."

"You mean that dog is Jimmy Stewart?" Jack quipped.

Mary tossed her husband a married look. "The dog," she said flatly, "is part of his tribe."

Benny rubbed his head. "Can't figure it out," he said. "A few years ago the only thing the guy was married to was a golf ball."

The events of the past few years have left 44-year-old James Maitland Stewart only a mite less bewildered than his longtime pal. In August it will be three years since Jimmy and the goodlooking Gloria Hatrick McLean were (Continued on page 46)

Gloria's favorite room is the library, where she spends lots of time reading (especially Jimmy's scripts). Family mementos line the walls, fill the cabinets and bookshelves to overflowing.

The oval table and period chairs give the dining room an old-fashioned, comfortable look. But the room is rarely used, since they do little entertaining, prefer to "be alone together."

The master bedroom is in a separate wing of the house. Decorated with Gloria's furniture from her old bedroom, a desk and TV set were added to give the room a masculine touch.

Jimmy's idea of owning an isolated home with a breathtaking view was changed when reality, in the form of four vivacious children, descended upon him.

Dark green paint did wonders for the old woodwork in the living room, and cracks in the ceiling were covered with painted burlap. Original oil paintings form an elegant setting.

married in the Brentwood Presbyterian Church. That wedding, as both of them fondly recall, was followed by an idyllic Hawaiian honeymoon completely free of script worries, housing worries, child worries, or miscellaneous worries.

There was swimming, sunning and romance and carefree, ecstatic happiness until one day—poof! The honeymoon was over, and life in Hollywood began.

When you're a 40-year-old bachelor and you marry a beautiful divorcee from Larchmont, N. Y., who has two sons—you've got problems.

First problem for the Jimmy Stewarts was they had too many houses. Jimmy owned a comfortable bachelor cottage in Brentwood and Gloria owned a good-sized house in Beverly Hills, one she had purchased after selling her mansion to the Frank Sinatras.

Jimmy's proposed solution was to sell both of these houses and build a low-slung modern job on the Palisades. "He made his dream house sound very attractive," Gloria remarks, "and I hated to destroy his lovely illusions; but I simply had to tell him the truth. Hillside homes aren't particularly good for children. The views are heavenly, but let baby toddle outside for one minute, and the next thing you know, (Continued on page 64)

a childhood memory set

■ Her earliest memory is of riding in an automobile, curled up on the shelf between the back seat and the rear window, watching the receding flow of scenery. It was a balmy day, probably spring, and the rare treat of an auto ride sent little waves of happiness through her. The driver and her mother had been talking earnestly for a long time, but June had heard none of it until her mother's voice cut like a knife across her mind.

"Oh, I couldn't do that! I couldn't put her into a home!"

June was only three, possibly four, too young to know the real meaning of her mother's words. But she caught the feeling of them, and suddenly the brightness of the day was gone for her.

That memory set the keynote for most of June's life. She was born in a nondescript apartment on 143rd Street and St. Anne's Avenue in New York. Her parents' marriage was already on the brink of disaster, and when June was six months old her father walked out on his family.

Her mother was distraught. There was no money in the bank, only a few dollars in the vase on the living room table, and there were two children to support, June and her brother Henry. She went to her parents and asked if she could move in with them and bring the children.

The Provosts were good people, saddened by their daughter's plight, but they lived in a tiny apartment and had a limited income. "Clara, we're sorry," they said. "We'd like to take all of you but there is only room for you and one of the children. You'll have to choose between them."

Clara took June, because June was the baby and more dependent. Henry was sent to his father. Then Clara got a job in a printing plant.

June and her brother saw each other only once more during their childhood. It was one Christmas time when her parents were attempting a reconciliation. Clara had bought her husband a new derby hat for a gift. The children found it and playfully tore the rim from the crown. They emptied the ashes from the coal stove and sprinkled them through the apartment and then rode Henry's bicycle through the rooms. It was their version of 'playing train'.

It seems to June now that the spanking that followed was the last thing that happened before she and her mother were back with her grandparents. The Provosts had now bought a house, out in Throggs Neck on the East Side, a rambling, ancient affair with peeling paint and tiny rooms, but it seemed grand and immense to June. There was a hydrangea bush in front, and the snowball blossoms in summer were a wondrous thing to the child born under the Third Avenue El. The house was full, for it now sheltered a couple of aunts with broken marriages behind them, as well as June's cousin Helen.

June's grandmother was a tiny, plump woman with a kind face behind the spectacles she wore a bit low on the nose. She made a wonderful substitute for a mother while Clara was at work, surrounding June with love and taking all her dreams and problems seriously. June was happiest when her grandmother would play the piano, and she'd dance and (Continued on page 67)

the keynote for her life

"THE SHY VIOLET" was the title of a poem June recited at school in this costume. She had an attack of stage fright and dissolved into tears. Only six, she already felt insecure.

A NEAR FATAL ACCIDENT was in June's past, but not forgotten, when she posed at 13 in her confirmation dress. Her adored grandmother had died; June's highschool days were troubled ones.

JUNE'S FIRST BREAK came at 16. The taunts of schoolmates who said she couldn't dance, drove her to try out for a chorus job on Broadway. She got it. Here she's in Sing Out The News.

LOVE WALKED IN when June met Dick Powell on the set of Meet The People. To June he was a big star and she couldn't understand or take seriously his interest in her.

SUCCESS WAS FUN and after June had won her own niche in Hollywood, she learned at last to relax and enjoy life. With Dick's reassuring love to guide her, the harsh memories of childhood faded.

SECURE AT LAST, June is at the height of her fame. (She won the Modern Screen popularity trophy in 1951.) More important to her is the fact that she has a family of her own to love.

my favorite role:

"THE GIRL IN WHITE"

by June Allyson

■ I suppose every actress remembers certain roles with a special fondness. That's how I think of Dr. Emily Dunning in The Girl In White. True, it's my most recent part and freshest in my memory, but there are two good reasons why I enjoyed it so much.

The first was the cast with whom I worked. When you get to the studio at seven A.M., the strain of waking before dawn is somehow relieved when you sit down in the makeup department next to an actress like Mildred Dunnock. (She played the mother in Death Of A Salesman.) The very thought of working with such an accomplished performer thrilled me. Then there were Arthur Kennedy and Gary Merrill, Jesse White and Marilyn Erskine—a gay bunch that was fun between scenes and a great challenge before the camera.

The second reason is that at last I played the part of a doctor. I never thought it possible, because there are so few women doctors in this world. Dr. Emily was the first woman admitted to the medical staff of a New York hospital. To accomplish the goal she'd set for herself, she had to overcome opposition from every mother's son she encountered.

I'd always wanted to portray a doctor because once I actually wanted to be one. I first got the idea as a child when I was in the hospital after an accident. There was a doctor on the staff who was so kind to me—he'd come to see me as often as he could, and it seemed that he really understood me. I don't remember his name or his face, but he had bright red hair, almost orange, and I'd lie there for hours, anticipating the moment when that flaming head would come into view.

I thought then that I'd like to help people the way he did. The idea stayed in my mind for years, and when I began to work in show business I determined to put aside as much money as I could to eventually study medicine. That plan went up in smoke in a great hurry, because it took every cent I earned to pay the bills, and although I knew then I'd never make it, I've had a soft spot for doctors every since.

Of course, I didn't realize then what troubles I'd have had in college. The role of Dr. Emily Dunning taught me a lot—how only the very highest grades and (Continued on page 85)

NO TRESPASSING

■ Swimming season was on down at the creek, so this last week of school an ornery sort of kid named Harry Keel told his dad he'd like a haircut. "Make it short," he suggested, "so it'll last me a while."

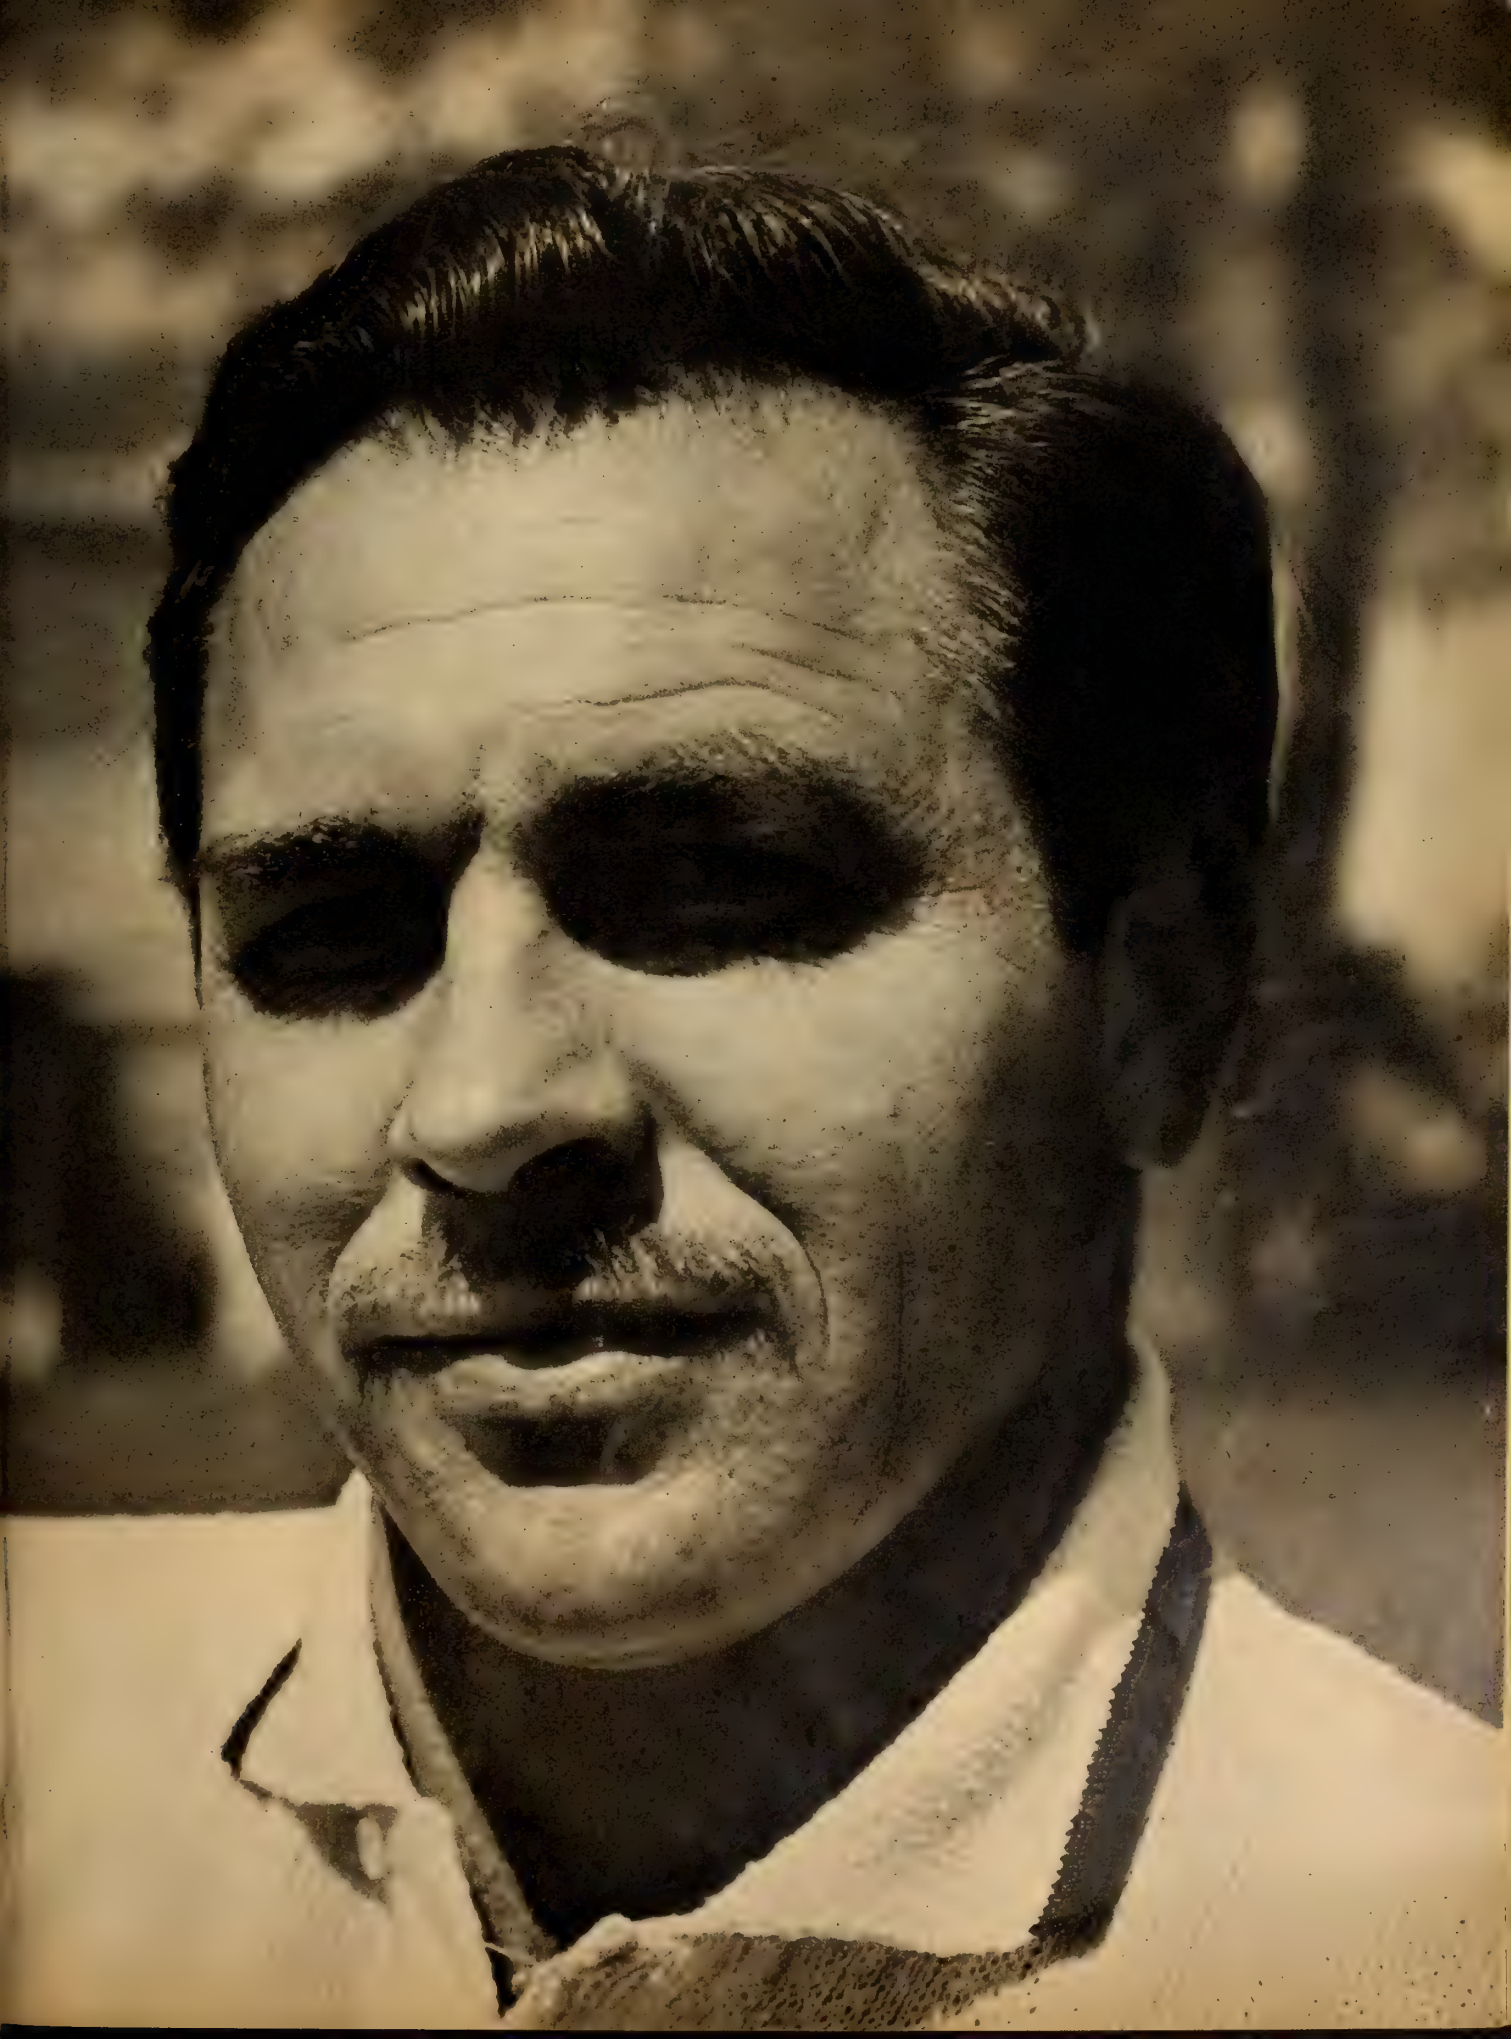
His pop nodded, pinned a towel around his neck, stropped his straight-edged razor and shaved him as smooth as an egg.

"Great Jumpin' Judas, Pop!" swore Harry. "You've ruint me! I look like a picked turkey buzzard!"

His dad cracked him a playful flip with the towel. "Get along to school now," he ordered.

Harry got along, but he grabbed his cap first and pulled down the earflaps to hide his disgrace. He kept it on when he took his seat in class. "Harry Keel," the teacher barked, "take off your cap in the schoolroom!"

Harry shook his head. "No ma'am."



"Take it off, I said."

"Uh-uh."

She stalked down the aisle, snatched off the head piece and hung it on the rack. Harry jumped up, retrieved it and jammed it back on. She took it off again. He put it on. The antagonistic shuttle continued for 12 trips—a silent, resolute battle of wills. But in the end Harry was wearing his cap. They called him "Coonie" after that—"Coonie Keel"—because he looked like a skinned raccoon, but there was a certain admiration in the jibe. Obviously he was a kid with a mind of his own and one to be reckoned with.

That one-boy rebellion occurred a good stretch of years ago, in the little coal mining town of Gillespie, Illinois. But it's still going on, in essence, a good many miles West, in Hollywood. Harry Keel was his own boy and now he's his own man—all 76 inches of him.

■ Oh, to be the wife of a movie star. Mrs. Gregory Peck, say. Mrs. John Wayne. Mrs. Mario Lanza. Mrs. Burt Lancaster. Mrs. William Lundigan . . . it sounds wonderful.

Here, certainly, is wifehood without drudgery, motherhood without slavery, life blessedly devoid of penny-pinching. Picture yourself at those lovely social affairs floating in tulle or sparkling in

HOLLYWOOD (oh, yeah?)

The public sees Dean Martin more than his wife Jeanie does since he rocketed to fame and became a popular figure overnight.

There was no "other woman"—only work that separated the John Waynes and led to marital discord. Now reconciled, Esperanza is resigned to her fate.

Luckily, Betty Lanza glories in Mario's popularity; otherwise she'd have trouble ignoring all the fans who adore him.

The MacDonald Careys are a solid family unit because Betty knows how to deal with predatory females—she forgets about them.

Norma Lancaster realizes that as Burt's wife, she carries his reputation in her hands. This means she can't ever let the public know that life isn't all glamor.

When Bill Lundigan is mobbed by fans, they give Rena the brush-off. She's used to it; it's part of being a star's wife.

sequins, with innumerable handsome men brushing your fingertips with their lips.

But is it like that?

One woman who must have thought so introduced herself to Norma Lancaster at a beauty parlor late one afternoon. "Oh! Aren't you lucky to be the wife of Burt Lancaster!" she gushed. Norma, whose feet were tired from shopping all day, and whose little ones (for whom she won't let anyone else cook) wake her early every morning, just nodded dumbly. When she got home, however, she told Burt, "The next person who talks to me like that—well, I'll just blow my top!"

Of course Norma didn't mean that. Blowing one's top is a luxury the wife of a star cannot permit herself. She carries her husband's reputation in her hands at all times. Even more, there is the public conception of his glamor which she must make sure she never shatters, even though sometimes this is exactly what she feels like doing.

The minor, as well as the major irritations are many. It is supposed to be a wife's privilege, for instance, to feed her husband's ego. Sociologists agree that this is a normal way of cementing a marriage. But what (Continued on page 100)

dreamboat's a-comin'

■ One afternoon, up in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the postman delivered a package to skinny 12-year-old Henry Herman McKinnies, Jr., who raced back up to his room and tore it open excitedly. Inside, as a reward for a Ralston cereal box-top and 50 hard saved cents, was a miraculous object—a Tom Mix Makeup Kit.

Henry dug out the precious ingredients and set to work making himself into the most horrendous Frankenstein-like apparition he could dream up. Then he ran in the dusk up the street and knocked on the front door of a neighbor's house.

The woman who answered took one look, screamed, slammed the door and locked it. Pushing his luck, Henry Herman tore ecstatically around to the back door and banged. This time the man of the house confronted him angrily, ripped away the fright wig, putty and false eyebrows.

"Henry McKinnies," he barked, "beat it right home this minute and wash your face—and don't you ever go around fooling decent people like this again! If you keep it up, some day you're gonna get shot!"

That was a good dozen years or so ago, and while he has been fooling people off and on since, Hank McKinnies has yet to get blown to glory —unless you call zooming to Hollywood stardom a shooting affair.

In that hurry-up process, it's true, there've been some occupational hazards. Diving in The Frogmen Hank was chased by man-eating Caribbean barracudas. Smoke-jumping in Red Skies Of Montana he was almost roasted alive by naphtha flames. Doing Cry Of The Swamp he got chewed by a boa constrictor and mauled by a bear. And there was the bruising business of being belted around the set by husky Dale Robertson, while playing Chad the cad in Take Care Of My Little Girl. But despite it all, Henry Herman McKinnies, Junior, famous today as Jeffrey Hunter, has managed to stay in one tall, dark and handsome piece. And in Hollywood, Jeff, through some fast and effective footwork, has certainly done all right for himself.

It was barely two years ago that 23-year-old H. H. McKinnies, Jr., was warming a desk seat (Continued on page 71)

"You kill me!" Debbie says when they ask if she's in love—but there's no denying the gleam in her eye when Bob Wagner's around!

BY JIM NEWTON

■ Around noontime the other day a dusty coupe rolled to a stop at a drive-in restaurant halfway between MGM and Fox Studios near Hollywood. Inside, a tall, good-looking guy with ruddy cheeks, a chiseled profile and a rebellious shock of dark brown hair grinned at his pert companion, a tiny doll with green-gold eyes and saucy curls here and there on her head.

"What'll you have?" asked the boy.

"Oh, you know," she answered.

He ordered a jumbo strawberry malt and a hamburger with pickles for her, and a steak sandwich and coffee for himself. While he instructed the car-hop the girl unfolded the morning paper to catch up on current events. Suddenly she said, "Oh, no!"

"Oh, no what?"

"Can you take it?" she exclaimed, rattling the paper his way. "We're in Cupid's Corner again! Look, it reads: 'Things must be getting serious with Debbie Rey-

if you knew annie!

"Why, Darling," she explained. "I'm not mad. I'm thrilled. Think what a compliment that was."

Now, there are very few mildly expectant mothers in Hollywood or anywhere else who would take a constructive view like that, very few, in fact, who would report the pass only to their loving husbands. Certainly you could hunt among the stars a long time to find one who wouldn't fly into an outraged snit and call out the Marines—or at least her press agent—to make the most of it. And among them all just about the last gal you might expect to react with a pleasantly tickled funny bone would be Anne Baxter, who, for some weird reason, enjoys the reputation of being a serious, elegant lady with about as much spice as a tax-collector.

Why this should be is a mystery, partly explainable, perhaps, by the fact that Anne has had only one husband to her name, and that in the dozen years she has been around Hollywood she has never had any more scandal attached to her career than has Gigi Perreau. A certain impression, too, was bound to get around when Anne played the predatory and ruthless Eve Harrington in All About Eve, and almost won her second Oscar for being so convincingly deadly, deadpan and icy in her ambitious drive for success.

In any event, there are a lot of mistaken impressions about Annie Baxter hanging around Hollywood and elsewhere which can stand correcting.

Not long ago, when Anne signed up to go on a Movietime, U.S.A., tour, the directors briefed her anxiously. "Now, Miss Baxter," they said, "of course we want you to keep your natural dignity and all that. But at the same time we'd like you to put across the idea in public that you're just like the girl next door."

"Unfortunately," Anne came back truthfully, "I have about as much natural dignity as a chimpanzee and the girl who once lived next door to me, frankly, was as dull as dishwater."

John Steinbeck, the distinguished author who's a pal of the Hodiaks, turned a neat phrase her way just the other day: "Anne—" he told her, "to me you always look like you're peeping over the bushes hunting a surprise!" Actually, that's just about it with A. Baxter. She lives on surprises, she couldn't live without them. Sometimes they're for herself, though more often for others, but however they wind up, they fit a nonconformist creed of daring independence which her crusty old grandpappy, the great modern architect Frank Lloyd Wright handed her long, long ago.

"Anne," he said, "remember this: Never form a habit. Never fall into a rut. And above all, never do anything because the others do." And so help her she hasn't and doesn't, no matter what—in her home, her studio, or with her friends or family. In fact, the recent arrival of Miss Katrina Hodiak is a case in point.

A LITTLE over a year ago when Anne first learned she was wearing a halo she was also set to make Follow The Sun. In Hollywood it's custom and cricket to spread the news the minute that interesting condition occurs. First to the studio which by law can retire any enceinte star to the boneyard pronto. But Anne saw no reason why she should skip a part she was dying to do, so she kept her mouth buttoned and played the part for all it was worth.

Well, when Annie was six months along, and still nobody knew, Hedda Hopper suddenly snared her for her radio show.

"The jig's up," John told his wife, "Hedda will take one look and, brother, the world will know!"

"Want to bet?" asked Anne.

She went to the broadcast. She wore her mother's dress, and a tight girdle, and she talked faster than Hedda can, so that that keen-eyed sleuth never got a chance to look below Anne's jabbering jaws.

In fact, nobody in Hollywood ever did guess, until the Hodiaks announced it themselves.

Now that is undoubtedly one kind of a record for Hollywood, but it's also typical of Anne Baxter and how she operates. So is the fact that, mulling over names for her first born, she came up at one point with "Heidi Hodiak," to make John snort, "Whose daughter do you think she's going to be—Cab Calloway's?" And last July Anne tore out to a gala Hollywood ball, almost fell in the fishpond, came home and sat around toasting her baby's arrival in champagne, until twinges sent her off to the hospital next morning where she had Katrina as easy as pie.

The plain truth is that Anne Baxter is an intriguing mixture of a sophisticated Bohemian and an unreconstructed scamp, who writes a personal declaration of independence with every move she makes.

A girl who can show up at a Press Photographers Ball in black transparent trousers, a bejeweled G-string and nothing between that and her sketchy bra but an amber colored bike light at her navel is, to put it mildly, individualistic. Anne got the flu from that escapade, but she also stole the show.

But that any of this should be a surprise to the customers is rather a surprise itself. Because rugged individualism obviously runs rampant in Anne Baxter's blood. Her architect grandfather, stunned all of America almost 50 years ago by designing houses that made functional sense but looked to shocked Victorian eyes like zig-zag orange crates. He has been blasting stereotyped ideas all his life and still does at 84. His daughter, Catherine, Anne's mother, is a woman of strong notions who once, when papa was away, redecorated her room in fluffy ruffles and bird's-eye maple just because she darned well felt like it, and kept it that way when her modern-minded father came home and exploded like Vesuvius. Nowadays, Catherine stubbornly re-arranges the furniture at the Hodiaks each time she visits them—and the minute she leaves, her daughter puts everything right back where it was.

When Anne was only a junior miss up in Bronxville, N. Y. and a prospective debutante, she took a studied look at the prissy Ivy League future in store for her, and she shook her head. When she was 11 she faced the family with the facts of life. "I'm going to be an actress," she stated. "Do you mind?"

"Heavens no," they told her. "Be a plumber if you like. But be the best!"

So Anne ran alone into Manhattan to drama school, intrepidly mixed with the mobs at the subway and nobody at her house gave it a thought. She was on Broadway at 12, when most girls are just starting to hide their dolls, and in Hollywood at 15.

One week when Anne was 16 she was deposited with family friends at their summer house on Catalina Island. These were very nice people and Anne, of course, was a very nice girl. She was already in pictures then, but because her mother didn't vibrate to Hollywood Mrs. Baxter was living up North in Burlingame. Anne had a companion, really a chaperone, named Miss Tickett, a dear, sweet soul, but a little difficult to shake at times.

At Avalon Anne sensed her opportunity, so she faked a telephone call and told her hosts she was called back to the mainland. She took the noon boat but she didn't go home to Miss Tickett. Instead, she decided to paint Hollywood red, but that's hard to handle when you're 17 with nobody to take you around. What Anne finally wound up doing was eating creamed chicken by herself in a respectable tea room, but that didn't satisfy her reckless urge. So she just drove and drove—finally winding up way out in the Malibu mountains at Lake Sherwood. There is absolutely nothing to do at Lake Sherwood except listen to hoot owls and plopping bass, but there beneath the shaggy oaks, Annie communed alone with nature and found it reckless and romantic enough, finally falling asleep in the car.

In the morning she drove back, tidied up at a gas station, and finally reported dutifully to Miss Tickett, who had called Catalina unfortunately, learned of her departure, and suspected the worst. But she said nothing, and from then on Anne got the freedom she yearned for and the privilege of dating—without a chaperone cramping her style. It may also be forgotten that Anne Baxter got around very successfully from then on, and in the experimental process of meeting men was engaged three times before she saw John Hodiak in the Fox commissary one noon.

That romance has been long since reported too, but even today if you mumble something about how John Hodiak courted her, what you get from Anne is, "Courted me? Don't be silly. I courted John. I had to tell lies, play hard to get and all kinds of things. It was really rugged to break the man down, even after I knew he was interested."

But she finally did, of course, six years ago come July seventh, and although John came down with mumps immediately before and Anne got carved with an appendectomy right afterward, in between they had a lovely wedding in the garden of her mother's house in Burlingame. The reception which followed must have been a party to remember—and a tough one to leave. Some of the guests got confused and ended up in Hawaii. When John and Anne finally pulled themselves away in a rain of rice they planed to Colorado Springs and the Broadmoor Hotel, where they finally got to bed at five A.M.

BUT even on her honeymoon Anne couldn't bring herself to carry on like the rest of the newlywed hand-holders strolling down lovers' lane and blushing prettily around the lobby.

What the new Mrs. Hodiak hove up with for a honeymoon idyll was spending a night in an old Rocky Mountain ghost town that even the natives had forgotten. She packed a hamper with steaks, garlic, French bread, salad greens and wine, John rented a car and they whizzed off. Well—it poured all night long, the ancient shack leaked and they almost burned it up, along with the steaks on the wood stove. There was no plumbing, no water, no heat. Swilling coffee to keep alive, they didn't sleep a wink—and in such a frayed condition had their first fight.

Six years of marriage haven't tarnished the spirit which triggered that frantic excursion, and life for Anne Baxter is always loaded with excitement. Maybe that's because, as she explains, "the only rule we have around here is that there aren't any."

At the Hodiak's Hollywood home (and it is smack in Hollywood, not fashionable Bel-Air or Beverly Hills) a deceptive air of calm and order prevails when you first walk in. But just stick around. If Petunia and Shoo-Fly, the poodles, don't suddenly decide to have a family in the front hall with Anne playing midwife, then some characters with hammers and saws may wander in and noisily start changing this and that around, according to a fresh idea John or Annie got the night before. One such flash inspiration a year ago changed their whole house from English to contemporary modern with about everything in the joint shifted except the dishwasher. Last birthday John came home to find the dining room wall hung with shirts on a yellow pasteboard panel luridly labeled, "GIGANTIC CLEARANCE SALE!" Anne had raided Brooks Brothers that morning for every color and style they had. A party is likely to gather like a summer storm at any minute, with Clifton Webb dancing the "Afternoon of a Faun" perhaps, and Anne making like Lily Pons. One thing's certain to see almost daily use—the champagne loving cup which sits by the fireplace etched "Anne" and "John." Elaine and John Steinbeck gave them that thoughtfully. They knew how everything with the Hodiaks has to be celebrated—a new part, a new dress, or a 30-foot putt.

Long ago, Anne and John Hodiak learned that the planned life was impossible, because studios don't fit their shooting schedules to wedded companionship. So they gather their good times together on the first bounce of opportunity.

One evening three years ago, John rushed into the house, shouting, "Hey, I just got 18 days!"

"In jail?" Annie asked him.

"No—my fool—I'm free, off the hook, at liberty, nothing to do. It's real, it's true, and it's in writing."

"Now isn't that a coincidence!" cried Anne, "—with me a liberty belle too. And I had a dream last night. . . ."

"You and your dreams—"

"It was in Technicolor," continued his wife. "I saw blue, blue water and coral sands. Dark people with brightly colored scarves wrapped around their heads. Houses on stilts . . . where's that? Wait a minute."

She came back with two things. One, her dream book—it's called "What's in a Dream?" and has 10,000 visions and what they mean, and two, a handy, descriptive atlas. "This says I'm definitely going on a trip," she informed him, "and this says it's Jamaica."

"Jamaica!" howled John. "Not that far. Wait a minute!" But he knew he was licked.

That was on a Saturday night. Sunday they checked the weather in Jamaica by phone, packed their bags, called goodbyes and got permits. Monday they were on their way—and the doctor jabbed them with their smallpox shots going out the door in their traveling clothes.

That's pretty typical. And although in Kingston the shots took too much effect and Anne wound up with fever and was found laid out cold on a park bench, in the end it turned out to be some trip. Hodiak, who hates to dance, even learned the West Indian rhumba.

Life, of course, is not all a dish of cherries jubilee for Anne and John Hodiak. They have their problems like everyone else. Anyone who ventured dreamily that they've never had an argument since that honeymoon night in the Rockies would be laughed by both of them right out the front door. But underneath the explosions lies a love that is deep and real and stubbornly defended.

They buck horns constantly on trivial matters. Hodiak has threatened to bop Anne if she doesn't stop leaning over his shoulder when he's reading a book and inquiring, "How far've you got?" Being a sports fan he's long ago registered supreme disgust with indoor Annie's athletic talent, and compares her golf swing to the ballet version of a dying swan. On the other hand—Anne can't lure him out dancing, and she's put up for years with his criticism of the clothes she picks. The other day, after holding her temper when he criticized a shaded chiffon dress she'd bought at a sale with, "looks like the colors ran," she led him right back to the swank Beverly Hills shop and said, "All right—you pick it out!"

The models trotted out with all the French imports in the place, and in no time at all John easily picked a heavy white satin number with gobs of style.

"Now that's perfect for you, Anne," he declared. "We'll take that."

So they took that and John reached for his checkbook, as Anne grinned at the lesson he'd learn.

"Six hundred dollars, please," said the salesgirl sweetly.

But even in trying situations like that John is really proud as a peacock about his wife. At 28, Anne Baxter looks like that high school kid the smoothie in the Cadillac took her for. She's still tiny and cute with an even smaller waist—22—than before the blessed event. There's only one thing that really bothers her in the looks department—her nose. Nobody else worries about it, but she thinks it's a little too retroussé. A makeup man had her in his chair not long ago and cocked his head professionally. "Hasn't your nose been fixed?" he asked.

"Listen," snapped Baxter, "do you think I'd have it fixed this way?"

Ordinarily though, Anne Baxter isn't the touchy type. She's a serious actress, of course, so serious that sometimes, lost in her acting job, she'll forget to speak to her best friends at Fox. Other times, for no good reason at all, she can get crazily corny when the going is toughest.

Recently, on the set of The Outcasts Of Poker Flat, Anne tied into a climactic scene where the snowbound Sierra troupe sat around for days in a cold cabin and chewed on chicken bones. Through the long scene Anne was called on to lift up her skirt periodically, to stow away gold dust, pistols and props of the Bret Harte Forty-Niner drama in a pocket of her petticoat. The act became a sort of trademark for her role. And the chicken—after three straight days—began to gag everybody around.

Anne showed up the last morning, flipped up her petticoat, stared at the eternal fowl, yelped, "What—chicken again? and hauled out an endless stream of weenies which she handed around. The laughs pleased her so much she repeated the gag that afternoon with a motheaten stuffed squirrel somebody dug up for her in the prop department.

There is really only one thing that ever brings out the red in her hair very seriously. That's when somebody takes a cruel and groundless crack at her marriage. Not very long ago a misguided press agent at her own studio found himself in deep dutch from an unlucky yarn he dreamed up for publicity's sake. Anne was on location in Colorado with nothing much happening to stop the presses so the agent made up a squib: Anne Baxter, he wrote, went panning for gold in a mountain stream—but instead of striking it rich, she only lost her wedding ring!

It was innocuous enough, but by the time Hollywood had worked that one over, it came out like this: Anne Baxter alone on location and lonely, was so mad at John Hodiak for chasing around in Hollywood in her absence that she had hysterically tossed her wedding ring into the creek! Well—when Annie heard that she made more than a pop with her prop pistols. She practically blew off the roof of 20th Century-Fox. Some hasty explanations convinced her it was one of those things and nobody got scalped or even lost a good job. But it's a cinch it won't ever happen again.

Anne Baxter plays her marriage straight and for keeps and that's no joking matter with her. Right now the girl who has never tended any sacred cows knows one thing at least that is sacred to her—her home with John Hodiak and Katrina.

When Katrina came to her house last July, Annie's grand old progenitor, Frank Lloyd Wright, sent her a snappy telegram. "KEEP UP THE GOOD WORK," he wired. So the other day, Anne thought it was time grandpapa, who has mighty good critical taste, deserved a look.

Bundling up baby Katrina, John and Anne carried their custom-designed project over to "Taliesen," the famed Arizona desert home of the dean of American architecture.

The white-haired expert sat in the sun for the first look at his great grandchild. "Well," he tapped his cane impatiently, "let's see him!"

"It's not a him—it's a her," explained Anne, opening the blanket.

Her grandpapa studied the object thoughtfully. "High head," he pronounced, "—brains. Let's see her legs." Anne uncoiled the wrapper to oblige. "Very good supports," grumped the man who should know. "Very important."

At that point Katrina stuck out her tongue and pronounced a mild raspberry, as some babies are wont to do. Mr. Wright grinned. "I think she'll get along," he allowed.

He might say the same thing about his granddaughter, and maybe he has. If not, anyone who really knows Anne Baxter could oblige. A girl who has beauty, brains and a more than slightly sassy slant at the world will get along all right—in Hollywood or anywhere else. END love is better than anything

Gene shook his head. "There's no point in upsetting her," he said. "You perform the operation. I'll call her afterwards."

The operation was a success, and a day later Gene asked his nurse at La Clinique des Belles Feuilles to put in a transatlantic call to his wife in Beverly Hills.

Betsy said later that it was six A.M. when the phone rang. "Gene, was very sorry to wake us," she explained. "He just didn't want Kerry and me to worry in case we read anything in the paper. 'I had a little stomach ache,' he said, 'and they took out my appendix.' Then he asked when Kerry and I were coming over, and I told him we'd have to put all our things in storage and rent the house and take Kerry out of school, and then we'd sail on the Ile de France."

As you read this, Betsy, Gene, and their nine-year-old Kerry are all living in Europe—but the above incident will give you a small idea of how thoughtful the Kellys are about each other. Gene wouldn't think of worrying Betsy about a little thing like an emergency appendectomy. And Betsy, if Gene wanted her and their little girl in Europe, wouldn't think twice about all the trouble involved in closing down one home and finding another abroad.

BETSY says, "In my household, Gene and his career come first." And while Gene doesn't like to discuss it, he sincerely hopes that Betsy will become the top-flight actress she so wants to be.

Gene very probably could wangle a term contract for his wife at MGM. But Gene isn't that kind, and neither is Betsy.

"I want to get ahead on my own ability," she says, "not because Gene Kelly is my husband."

It's a well-known axiom in Hollywood that two careers in one family don't mix, especially when one is obviously more successful than the other. Either the wife or the husband becomes jealous and resentful, and this leads to trouble. Observers have been predicting such trouble in the Kelly setup for years, but it hasn't come to pass. Gene understands his wife's ambition, has faith in her talent and feels sure that with luck she'll make her mark in the acting world. Meanwhile, he not only encourages Betsy to be active in little theater work, but a few years ago, when Orson Welles cabled her an offer to play in Othello in Africa, Gene insisted that she go.

"But who'll look after Kerry?" Betsy asked.

"Don't worry," Gene said. "I will."

Betsy flew to Africa and then to Italy and did act opposite Welles, but he didn't have enough money to finish the picture, and eventually Betsy came back to Beverly Hills.

However, the point is that sacrifice is an integral part of the Kelly marriage. But the Kellys don't call it sacrifice. They consider it only an expression of love.

"More than anything else," Gene says. "I want Betsy to do whatever brings her the most happiness."

"Isn't that funny?" Betsy says. "That's exactly how I feel about him."

This mutual understanding is why Gene and Betsy have gotten along so well despite their background of differences. Take the question of religion. Gene is a practising Catholic. He very much wanted his daughter to be raised in that faith. He talked it over with Betsy, and she, knowing how much it meant to Gene, readily assented.

Every Sunday Gene and Kerry go to mass. A few weeks ago, before Gene flew to Scotland to scout locations for Brigadoon, he and Kerry attended services in a beautiful little cathedral in Switzerland. "One of the things I like best about Sundays," Kerry says, "is going to church with Daddy."

While Gene takes care of Kerry's religious education, Betsy takes care of her schooling. It was Betsy who insisted upon enrolling Kerry in a public school instead of a private one.

Whene Gene asked Betsy to come abroad, Betsy not only enrolled herself in the Berlitz School of Languages but also enrolled Kerry. ("Kerry's accent is better than mine," says her mother.)

IT is a tribute to Betsy Kelly that her daughter is unspoiled. Only recently, the headmistress at the Swiss school Kerry attends, told a reporter, "What a refreshing little girl Kerry is. We've had lots of experience teaching daughters of wealthy Americans. Most of them are terribly spoiled and pampered, but not this one. I think it is because her parents are such good people, really democratic. I remember a few months ago when Gene Kelly first arrived in Switzerland. It wasn't long before all the children in town were calling after him, 'Hello, Geno. Hello, Kelly.' Wherever he went a pack of children followed him. Just as they did in his picture, American In Paris. He is very popular, and so is his wife. Kerry is very lucky to have such parents."

When you're a star, it's a relatively difficult job to keep your child from being spoiled. The Kellys have succeeded, but not without cost.

Veteran actress Ethel Barrymore still commutes to and from her studio in an automobile of 1925 vintage.

From time to time, for example, Gene is usually voted one of the most uncooperative stars of the year by the Hollywood Women's Press Club. The reason is he doesn't like to pose for home layouts.

"It's okay once in a while," he explains, but you let a young girl know that she's being treated as something special, and well, it's tough keeping her hat-size normal. That's what Betsy and I pretty much want to do—see that Kerry lives a normal childhood."

The Kellys plan to stay in Europe for at least another year. Gene finished The Devil Makes Three in Germany late in March. Brigadoon will be finished in Scotland, if all goes well, by the end of the summer. Then Gene wants to start a third film, Invitation To The Dance, in Paris.

Right now Gene and Betsy don't know whether to leave their nine-year-old in Switzerland for a year, and fly back to see her every other weekend, or whether to enroll her in different schools as they hop from country to country.

"I think we'll keep her in one school," Betsy says. "More normal that way."

With the Kellys, the accent is always on normality, being yourself, down-to-earth, never putting on any airs.

Betsy, for instance, is frank to admit that in her opinion she isn't Gene's intellectual equal. "He's older than I am," she explains. "He's had a better education and wider experience, and consequently, he knows more."

"Only about certain things," Gene adds facetiously; "Betsy has plenty on the ball. She's a fine dancer, a good actress, a wonderful mother, and an understanding wife. The thing I like most about her is her rate of growth. We were married when she was very young, hardly 18. She'd graduated from the New York Professional School and had danced in a few clubs but she wasn't very worldly. In the 11 years we've been married, she certainly has learned a lot. Betsy is at ease in front of anyone. She has a fine sense of values, too. She knows what's important and what isn't."

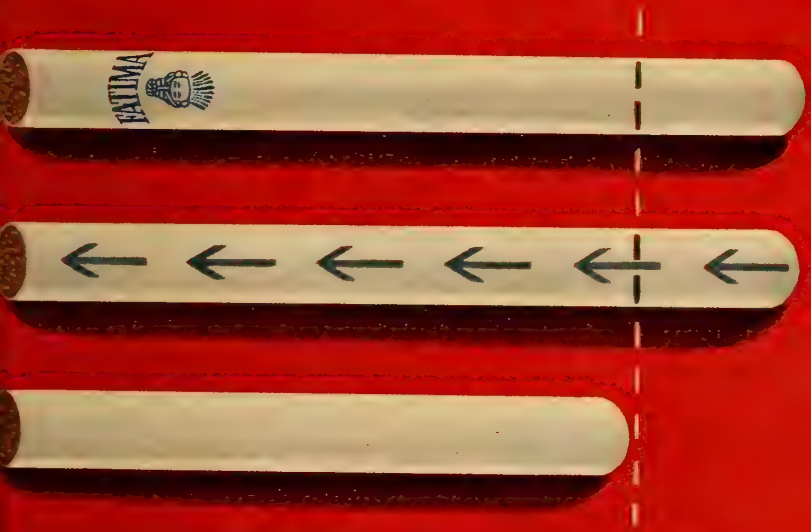
THE most important thing to Betsy is keeping her marriage on an even keel. She grew up in a happy home. Gene was the first man she ever fell in love with—she was 15 at the time—and her whole adult life has always revolved around him.

Gene was the dance director at Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe who insisted upon hiring Betsy as a dancer. That was way back in 1938. Gene and Dick Dwenger, the pianist, used to take Betsy out to lunch, and the young girl from Cliffside, N. J., would hang on to Gene's every word. To her, whatever he said was the law.

"When Betsy first started going with Gene," her mother recalls, "she used to refer to him as Mr. Kelly. It was always 'Mr. Kelly said this.' or 'Mr. Kelly said that.' She looked up to him with great veneration."

Betsy still venerates Gene. "When he first came out to Hollywood," she says, "they thought he was just a hoofer. Gene has not only brought a new concept to the musical film but he's developed into a writer, director, and choreographer. I think he's done more to popularize the ballet than any other man in America. He's an exciting person to live with, because he's constantly breeding ideas. He generates a tremendous amount of energy and it's almost impossible to keep up with him. His skiing is a pretty good example of that. One week of lessons with his instructor in Switzerland, and he was racing down the steepest hills.

"Lots of people come up to me and say, 'I bet it's pretty tough living with a guy like Gene.' It isn't tough at all. He eats meat and potatoes practically all the time. He doesn't give a hang about clothes. He sleeps late when he isn't working, which is practically never. He doesn't quibble about little things. He's a basically kind man, and he likes people.



"I remember one evening when he was making Singin' In The Rain. He came home that night and said, 'Bets! You should see that Donald O'Connor. Boy! Can that kid dance! He's really out of this world.' He plugged Donald so much that after the picture was released, Donald was signed by two other studios. I honestly think Gene has helped more young players get started at MGM than anyone else, with a few exceptions like Billy Grady and Joe Pasternak.

"Gene not only helps people but he loves to entertain them. A week after he had his appendix removed in Paris, friends wrote me and said, 'Your husband is crazy. He is dancing for the American troops in Germany against the doctor's orders.' Gene's like that. Action keeps him happy. As a matter of fact, action and one other word are symbols of our marriage. The other word is love. We think that you can be happy anywhere if you're active and you're in love."

After 11 years of marriage, Gene says he's more in love with Betsy than ever. "We have our arguments," he admits. "But you should've seen me in Europe before Betsy and Kerry came over. People said I reminded them of a kid who had just lost his mother. Now that my family's with me, I feel like a kid who's eaten his candy and has it, too." END now there are six

(Continued from page 46) baby has dropped 600 feet into the Pacific Ocean. Jimmy eventually realized this, so he sold his house and moved into mine. Before we could start looking for a new one, 20th Century-Fox offered him a job in London in No Highway In The Sky. Jim said he'd take it providing the whole family could go along, so we all went to England."

While they were in England the Stewarts had no housing problem at all. The boys were enrolled in a British school. The studio took care of all the hotel bills. But one morning Gloria realized that as far as she was concerned, the European junket was over. What is known in show business as "an act of God," had happened. She was pregnant.

Understandably enough, she wanted to return to the U.S.A. and be under the care of her own doctor. Jimmy said of course. He saw Gloria and the boys off and then returned to his picture work in No Highway.

One morning at four A.M., the phone rang in his London hotel. Jimmy groped for it. "What's the idea of calling anyone at this hour?" he muttered.

"But the call is from Los Angeles, California," the operator said.

"I don't care where it's from," Jimmy mumbled. "I'm asleep."

"Here's your party, sir," the operator said.

Jimmy tried to carry on a coherent conversation, but he was too sleepy, so he just nodded as Gloria explained that she was in excellent condition, the doctor told her she could expect twins in May, and everything else was fine.

"Thanks for calling," Jim said. "Wonderful to hear your voice."

As he hung up the receiver, however, his eyes sprang open. Twins! Did Gloria say twins? Was he going to be the father of twins? Did she actually say it or was he dreaming?

He grabbed the phone. "Operator," he screamed. "Get me that party in Los Angeles again. ..."

For the prospective father of twins there was no sleep that night.

Now, the requirements of a family with four children are vastly different from the simple requirements of newlyweds.

As soon as Jimmy returned from England, he abandoned all thoughts of a romantic cliffside house and began looking for a substantial home in a substantial family neighborhood.

One afternoon he and Gloria stopped their car before a solid-looking, two-story, ivy-covered brick structure in Beverly Hills.

"This place," said Gloria, "looks like a dormitory to me."

"Well, that's what we need," Jim answered, "isn't it?"

Gloria grinned, "I guess it is." And that settled it.

The Stewart "dormitory" contains the necessary number of bedrooms: five on the second floor. The front stairs leading up to them have a landing which the family aptly calls The Great Divide. The children's rooms are off to the left, the parents' to the right. Seven-year-old Ronald, who began going to Black Fox Military Academy last fall, always makes a point of turning a square corner at this dividing line.

"I used to think," Jim says, "that maybe our room was too far away from the kids, but when the four of them get up at six in the morning, I'm real glad that they're in one half of the house and Gloria and I are in the other."

Another house feature which makes Jim happy is the full basement. Most homes in Southern California have no cellars. His does, and Jim plans to re-model it into a sound-proof playroom. When the younger set gathers at the Stewart place, as they will in a few years, Papa Stewart says they'll be promptly ushered into the basement where they can raise hallelujah to their hearts' content.

Like all large Beverly Hills homes built before the war, this one includes a roomy kitchen, butler's pantry and breakfast room, as well as living and dining rooms, and a library. Gloria's favorite nook is the library.

She's the omnivorous reader in the clan who not only scans all the scripts sent to Jimmy, but frequently synopsizes them as well. She recommends stories to him, and sends rejected scripts back to his agent. She also cues Jim on his lines.

"In ten minutes," he says, "Gloria reads more pages than I do in an hour."

Princeton-reared Stewart reads about as rapidly as he talks.

In contrast to the typical Hollywood-home library, which has everything but books, the Stewart library is well-stocked with reading matter. It also contains Jimmy's collection of airplane models, a dozen family photographs, and the various gag gifts he and Gloria have picked up during their travels. The room is furnished informally, as is the rest of the house.

"The twins came so quickly after we moved into this place," Gloria explains, "that we didn't have time enough to make a production out of furnishing it. We pooled furniture from Jim's old house and mine, and then I hired Helen Conway, a decorator, to re-upholster a few of the pieces. She made us some new living room draperies and got us a couple of oversize tables. You know, just looked after the essentials."

Oddly enough, the Stewart house looks as settled as if they'd been living in it for years. The furnishings are basically traditional, and the color schemes are all subdued.

The living room, for example, is done in muted tones of beige and green. Two large sofas and a large coffee table in front of the fireplace dominate the room. A baby grand piano stands in one corner and a very fine French Provincial breakfront in the other. The furniture, however, plays second fiddle to the paintings in the room. These are really the attention-getters.

The Utrillo over the French commode was Gloria's Christmas gift to Jimmy the first year they dated each other. Her gay portrait beside the piano is provocative not only because it is well-done but because it was painted by Claudette Colbert who is developing into a portrait painter of the first rank. The canvas above the mantel is by Suzanne Eidendieck, and those on either side of the fireplace are Roualts. In addition to the work of famous artists, Jimmy has bought paintings by a couple of unknown disabled veterans. "I like 'em as well as the others," he says.

The Stewart dining room with its old-fashioned oval table is physically traditional. "But spiritually," Jimmy says, "this room is a nothing, largely because we never entertain. I don't know why we don't entertain, either. Seems like Gloria and I just like to be alone together."

"People do come to our house," Gloria hastens to explain, "but I'm sure they think we're odd. We go upstairs every night at about eight-thirty and watch television from our bed. I tell Jimmy our friends are going to think we're nuts, but he refuses to worry."

The master bedroom to which Mr. and Mrs. James Stewart retire is done in soft rose. Gloria's old bedroom furniture decorates it, so to keep it from appearing too feminine, Gloria added a desk, a table model television set, and Bello, her German shepherd who sleeps there more or less regularly. Gloria likes to sleep with the windows open. Jim does not. One night a few months ago, the master of the house complained that it was freezing in the room. Even Bello had walked out. "And look what he's wearing," Jim yelled. Next day, Gloria drove to town and bought an oversize electric blanket.

In the children's half of the Stewart dorm, each of the boys has his own room which he's expected to keep in order. This chore comes easily to Ronald. He inherited Jimmy's old furniture, and he's so proud of it that he actually enjoys polishing the pieces. He hero worships his step-dad and copies many of his ways.

Six-year-old Michael, however, is a bit lax when it comes to tidying up. He always has excuses, too. Gloria listens to all of them, then usually lets him off easily. Gloria is the relaxed type of mother who feels that since Mike will probably never have to make beds or clean house there's no sense making an issue of it. "Just wait until Mike gets into the Army," Jim warns her. "He'll never forgive you."

Right now the double feature attraction in the Stewart household are the infant girl twins, Kelly and Judy. Jim insists that these two will be taught how to cook and do housework. Gloria isn't much of a cook, and Jim never stops razzing her about her few dismal attempts at preparing canned soup. "The twins," he vows, "will make up for their old lady."

At this moment, however, the two little girls spend most of their time sleeping. They share a suite of two rooms with their nurse, and these rooms bulge with cribs, clothes chests, and baby-tenders.

In the evening when he returns from the studio, Stewart heads straight for the nursery. He picks up the twins, places one in the V of each elbow, and watches both of his daughters perform. He views each new childish development with the surprised awe of the typical new father.

A few nights ago he came home and was told that Kelly and Judy couldn't be put into the same playpen since they insisted upon fighting, and that there wasn't enough room in the nursery for two playpens. Next day Jim phoned an aircraft factory and had them send out a sheet of plexiglass. He cut the plastic and ran it from one side of the playpen to the other dividing it in two. Kelly and Judy now see each other but can't get at one another.

"I always knew," Jimmy Stewart says, "that my four years in the Air Force weren't wasted." END a childhood memory . . .

School brought an aching sense of loneliness, for June was acutely shy and found it difficult to make friends. She buried herself in her schoolwork, loving her studies but afraid of her teachers and her carefree schoolmates.

Twice her father sent a message that he had a gift for her, naming a place to meet him. After school was out, June would go to the appointed street corner and wait. Her father never came. She recalls being swept with a terrible fear during these times. She'd go home and tell her grandmother, who'd rock June back and forth in her arms, comforting her.

JUNE remembers clearly the events of the day the accident happened. Clara had taken her to Coney Island as a special treat, and on the way home June said she wanted to ride her bicycle.

"You'll have to take off your Sunday dress," said her mother, but June didn't stop to change her clothes. She got on her bike and soon was playing cops and robbers with the boy next door. She had just made a sprint down the block, with her dog Teddy running by her side, when the boy jumped out from behind a bush. "Stop!" he yelled, and put up his hand. It was the last thing she remembered. The great dead tree had dropped one of its huge branches, and June and her bicycle and her dog lay twisted beneath its mass.

When she came to, she was stretched out on the drainboard of the kitchen sink. Her grandfather was supporting her with one hand and with the other was tenderly bathing her head. Her mother and grandmother and aunts were standing huddled by the door, and they were all crying.

"My head," said June. "It feels funny." She put her hand to it and immediately blacked out once more. Consciousness returned just after the ambulance arrived.

"The doctor is going to stitch your head where it's been hurt," they told her, "and if you don't cry, we'll give you a quarter."

Who could keep from crying? June was terrified when she saw the ambulance and refused to allow them to carry her to it.

The interne shook his head. "She's much too upset to force her," he said. "Is there anybody in the neighborhood whose car we could use?" The people next door offered theirs, and June rode to the hospital on the interne's lap.

At the hospital, they told Clara her daughter had a fractured skull and serious spinal injuries. "You must be brave," they said. "She won't live through the night."

But when Clara was admitted to the room the next morning June had not died. She was swathed in bandages and the only thing visible was her left eye. Her eye and one white, swollen hand. Clara sank to her knees beside the bed and wept.

The months spent in the hospital melted into a haze of confusion for June. Her mother was there every day and so were her grandparents, but one day faded into the next, remembered only for the blood transfusions and the kindly red-headed doctor, and finally she was taken home.

There was a brace on her back, a steel and muslin contraption that she was to wear for many years to come. She lay for more months, listening to the sound of the children at play outside in the streets, and dreaming horrible dreams at night because her cousin Helen had told her, "You'll go crazy, you know. Everybody who's had a skull fracture goes crazy." They told her, too, now that she was home, that the accident had killed her dog. They did not tell her that the doctors said she would never walk again.

She began with faltering steps and the family watched with happiness. Soon she was running around the house and waiting hand and foot on her grandmother, who was now almost always confined to a chair. June didn't understand why until Mrs. Provost was taken away to the hospital. Grandmother was very sick, they told her, and she must be very quiet when they brought her home. Mrs. Provost never came home. June was walking home from school one day, alone as always because of the added shyness given her by the wearing of the brace. Her cousin met her in front of the house, and with the cruelty of children, blurted out the news. "I guess you won't be so happy to know," she said, "that Grandmother died today."

Marriage is a wonderful thing if you don't find a reporter hiding in your bedroom.

Audie Murphy

June stared at her cousin in disbelief, then pushed past her and into the house. When she saw her mother crying in the hall, she knew it was true. All that night they tried to coax June out of the bedroom where she had locked herself. But Mr. Provost pleaded, "Leave her alone. Leave the child alone."

When her grandmother died it was as if all the love had gone out of June's life. Mrs. Provost's last words had been whispered to Clara, "Take good care of the little one. Make sure she's happy. Please."

Not long after, Clara married again. Her new husband's name was Arthur Peters. They moved into a walkup apartment, no different from the rest of the walkups June had known, except that now, for the first time, she had a bedroom of her own. It was small but cheerful, with twin beds, which June thought the height of elegance. For the first time, too, Clara was home during the day. She quit her job at the printing plant and June began to know her mother.

One night she was awakened by Peters. "We're going to take your mother to the hospital. Hurry and get dressed."

Even the fact that her mother was about to have a baby was overshadowed by the thrill of June's first ride in a taxi. The phone was ringing in the apartment as they climbed the stairs on the return trip, and Peters was told that Clara had given birth to a baby boy. He hurried June downstairs again into the night and back to the hospital, and June was so enchanted by the cab that she thought no one could ever have been as happy as she.

The baby Arthur was a joy to June. She helped feed and diaper him and sometimes, when she'd see him sleeping in his crib, she was seized by the fear that he was no longer alive and would prick him with a pin just to make sure. He had grown to the highchair stage the night June felt for a certainty that she was not part of the family. Clara and her husband were talking together at dinner and cooing at the baby, and June suddenly felt as if she weren't there, as though she were invisible.

This began what was perhaps the unhappiest period in June's life. There was nothing tangible in her feeling of being unwanted, it was a slow building up through the years of childhood lived without a family like the other kids, lived without assurance like the other children, and now, with the brace strapping her back, without the ability to play like the others. There seemed to be no warmth anywhere—at school, at home, or with her playmates. She had always felt inferior to everyone, even before the accident, and was always trying to prove to her small friends that she was worthy of them.

Now, at 14, she decided to accept a dare. The muscles in her back had been strengthened by her swimming at school under the direction of swimming coach Marie Spinosa, a girl who was largely responsible for June's ability to pick up the last bit of courage that remained in her. Marie had taken June with her to all the schools where she taught, and eventually her pupil was winning ribbons for her ability.

June had seen a number of Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers movies, some of them many times over, and still trying to prove herself to her classmates, had boasted that she could dance as well as the famous stars. Other kids didn't like June. She never spoke unless they spoke first, and of course couldn't join their games because of the brace. But she was always hanging around and so they made her the scapegoat for their practical jokes. Now she was telling everybody she could dance.

"So go dance," they said. "Who cares?" But one of them showed June a newspaper advertisement. Chorus girls were wanted for Sing Out The News.

June thought about it all that day. And the next day she played hookey for the first time.

She went to the theater and left her name with the man at the door, then wandered uncertainly through the dingy rear of the theater, a pitiful little figure in skirt, blouse, flat shoes and bobby socks. Arrived at the scene of action, she was momentarily blinded by the bright lights, and then she saw the other girls who had come to audition. They were tall and willowy, and June thought they were beautiful. She stood for a moment taking in the display of pulchritude that any Broadway theater draws for chorus auditions, then made up her mind to bolt and run. But at that moment someone called out her name.

"You're next," bellowed a man in a bow tie and short sleeved shirt. "Whaddya do?"

"I—uh—dance," June squeaked.

"Sing?" said the man.

"Uh-huh."

"Where's your music?"

"Music? I haven't any."

The man spoke to a piano player in the pit, who began to pound out a rhythmical tune. June took a deep breath and did a series of the time steps she'd learned in two dancing lessons and then practiced at home. When she felt she'd done enough of them, she broke the monotony with a twirl or two.

"Hmpph," said the man in the bow tie. "Let's hear you sing."

June's voice then was as barnacled as it is now, and she managed to get out about four bars before the man held up his hand to stop her. "You're hired," he said, and June almost fainted from the shock. To this day she doesn't know why she got the job, and insists it must have been for laughs.

For laughs or not, she got through the show, and went on to work in Very Warm For May and Higher And Higher. In Panama Hattie she had one speaking line, and in Best Foot Forward she was teamed with a trio who sang and danced.

A new life for June had begun. Clara didn't understand show business, had never seen a play, but she did advise June to return to school. June went back after a few months and when she finally got her working papers she moved into the Women's Club, severing her life from that of her family. It was a split that came without hard feelings, but hers was now a life apart from theirs and she began to make friends. There was Miriam Franklin; June was maid of honor at her wedding to Gene Nelson. There were Jane Ball and Penny Porter, kids in show business. These people were the first to accept June, to make any effort to know and love her, and June has never forgotten them.

Her room at the Women's Club cost about $12 a week, her earnings were about $45 a week, so she could budget. Things weren't always bright. There were times between shows that shook to pieces her careful savings. When things were rough she tried other ways of earning a living. She entered amateur contests at the local theaters, and she never won, but she kept on smiling. Once she entered a radio contest, planning to sing "The Lady in Red." She started off on the wrong key, and after a few bars was cut off the air. "What went on?" Clara asked her afterward. "You started to sing and then something went wrong with the radio. An organ started playing."

She tried modeling, too. They frizzed her hair and glued on false eyelashes and tried to make her look what she wasn't. Even for 'junior clothes' June just didn't make the grade. Her last modeling job was a bathing suit pose, for which they took her to a waterfall and sat her on a rock. June promptly fell off the rock and into the water, and that ended that. There was a brief stint at the Copacabana where, even though short girls were in season that year, June was the runt of the chorus.

Although her income was erratic she managed to support herself, and once in a while would wonder, as she stood in the wings of a theater, why she was there and how she'd ever got there. With her work in Best Foot Forward her salary shot to $125 a week, and she moved to Tudor City to live in the Windsor Towers, an apartment house as elegant as its name. At this point she had been helped to gain her footing not only by the girls in show business, but by one boy in particular. Tommy was the second person outside June's family to give her understanding. Tommy came from a well-to-do family, had been paddling around in show business for a few years, and knew the ropes. At this time June was impressionable and naive. She felt it was lucky that a boy like Tommy should have come along. He took her to fine restaurants, introduced her to exotic menus, encouraged her to read the classics, and saw to it that she ate regular meals and got enough rest.

June spent three years in New York show business, and was so bewildered by it all that it seemed to fly by and then fuse into a muddle of faces and frightening moments and fleeting bits of happiness.

Then came the offer from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The studio wanted to film Best Foot Forward, and they offered a package deal to certain people in the show. June was included. She was happy, naturally, for by this time she was ambitious, but it was ironic that now, when she'd found a few things that were dear and familiar to her, she had to abandon them for a city whose very name frightened her. She packed her clothes and her brace into a suitcase, said goodbye to her mother and brother and to Tommy, and boarded the train with Penny Porter, who sang in the chorus.

Penny was excited and frightened. June was just frightened. She had never been farther from home than Boston and Philadelphia, and at those times she had been with a whole gang who knew what to do. Now, on this great train that sped across 3,000 miles, June didn't even know whether she should tip the porter, or if so, how much. She sat staring out the window, often dabbing the tears from her eyes, and on the second day out of Chicago a kindly, middle-aged woman who had heard June crying asked what was the matter. June told her about her new job and how frightened she was and the woman melted in sympathy. "I'm sure you'll be a big movie star some day," she said. "May I have your autograph?" June smiled at that, it was so preposterous, and obliged with her signature.

She had thought that a welcoming committee would be on hand at Los Angeles. But there was no one. The two girls climbed into a cab and June said the name of the only hotel she'd heard of—the Beverly Wilshire. They rolled up before its polished doors almost an hour later and from their double room, June phoned the studio. She was bounced around from one person to another until she finally talked with someone who knew who she was, and this person informed her that she had just gone on a six-week layoff.

After three days the bill at the Beverly

Wilshire was astronomical. June's knees shook when she informed the manager that she was broke but he looked at the pale and earnest face and told her she could pay later when her finances were straightened out. In desperation June went to MGM, where they agreed to advance her three weeks' salary, and she moved into the Town and Country Apartments on Wilshire Boulevard.

The night she came home from her first work before the cameras she opened her suitcase and took out the brace. For the last few years she had been wearing it only periodically, when her back was tired. She stood looking at it for a long moment, then took it downstairs and into the backyard, where she put it in the incinerator.

It was the final severance from the old days, the last reminder, and with its departure came a new June Allyson. She was still afraid of the 'important people' in Hollywood, yet she covered up with a gaiety that became synonymous with her name. But alone in her apartment, she sat and pictured the Peeping Tom outside, the burglar who might be listening at her door. Often she went across the hall to the apartment of Hyatt Downing and his wife and slept on the couch in their living room. The Downings insisted that she get a housekeeper-companion and introduced her to Bess VanDyke, a motherly woman who gave June the sense of belonging that she needed.

They moved to another apartment on Wilshire Boulevard, and it was while living here that June's career soared to the top. She worked in Meet The People, and in Two Girls And A Sailor. With the release of the latter film she became a star; not in actuality, but in the minds of the movie goers. Magazines and newspapers flooded the studio with requests for interviews and the studio was delighted. They liked this merry little character, never knowing that she was quaking inside, and they were pleased to see that she was on her way up. To June herself, it was unbelievable, the eighth wonder of the world. She would look in the mirror that hung over the couch in her living room, and make a face. "Some movie star," she would say to herself. And to Bess, "I'm not beautiful to look at, and I haven't a beautiful voice. But I am a beautiful swimmer." Still trying to prove herself.

To the men in Hollywood, June was a paradox. The bachelors gathered like bees around honey but they went away puzzled. She wore little makeup and her clothes were tailored. She was far from a glamor girl. She didn't like nightclubs and was afraid to take a drink. She knew so little about cocktails that she once astounded a writer who was interviewing her at home. "Would you like a drink?" June called from the kitchen. And when the writer accepted, June asked how to concoct it. "Why, it's simple," shouted the writer. "Just put three fingers of liquor in a glass and add ice and water."

A few minutes later June appeared with a glass filled with a purplish liquid.

"What," said the writer, "is that?"

"Your drink," crinkled June. She had put three fingers of port wine into a glass and added water.

Her complete naturalness made up her appeal, and it took studio makeup men many months to learn that June Allyson did not look like herself when her makeup was too heavy, her eyelashes too long. June never wore anything but street makeup for still photography, and after battling with her for a long time, photographers learned she was right.

When June had been in Hollywood a couple of years she was discovered by Dick Powell, who was refreshed rather than confused by her type of appeal, and soon found himself thinking of marriage. June couldn't believe that he was serious, but they were wed in August, 1945, and their marriage and house and children have all been the subject of thousands of stories.

June's mother has been shaken by pride and astonishment at her daughter's phenomenal success. Clara has come to California several times to visit June and Dick, and has met the great names of Hollywood quietly and shyly. Clara married again recently, to a man named William Brenner, who has finally given her the happiness she has sought.

From her home in New York, Clara keeps in touch with June through letters, and proudly writes of her son Arthur who is taking a premedical course at Columbia University. He has grown into a lean and handsome young man, quiet in his pride of his sister. When June first became famous she received scores of requests from Arthur for her photograph.

For June, life is a lot smoother than it ever was, but there are new wrinkles. Because she is in the spotlight she is a target for criticism, as are all celebrities. The same people at the studio who once worked overtime to help June now say she is difficult and temperamental. Faced with the gossip, June sighs, "Of course it bothers me," she says, "but I've found it impossible to please everybody. I tried at first. I bent over backwards. And after a while I heard rumors that I wasn't what I should be or that I was what I shouldn't be. So I said to myself, 'All right, let's try it another way'. And I began doing as I pleased. The rumors still go around, but no more than before.

James," she says, "and I'm no diplomat. If a writer asks me if I like his script and I don't, I tell him so. If a designer asks me if I like a dress and I don't, I say so. I figure if they didn't want my opinion they wouldn't ask me, so why lie? Besides, I can't. I don't want to hurt people's feelings, but I can't see any sense in buttering them up if I have to lie about something. Even Richard says to me sometimes, 'Sweetheart, when somebody asks your opinion about something you don't like, can't you find something nice to say about it? Just to take the edge off.'

"All I can say is, I'd be no good as an ambassador."

But as a mother, she does fine. With the arrival of Pamela, June realized that she had what she had always wanted, and her attitude toward her career began to change. For the first time it was no longer important to her. When Ricky was born the feeling was strengthened and the studio, instead of being second only to her family, began to fade away in her thoughts. June wants, more with each day, to do nothing but stay home and play with her children and be with her husband. Fame never appealed to her and still doesn't, because at heart she is as shy as the little girl who could never make friends. She sought a career only to earn her own living and to find her place in the sun. She wanted a career for security, and she has that security now in her family. END

dreamboat's a-comin'

Brunette or not, Jeff is Hollywood's newest fair-haired boy—a six-foot-one-inch symphony of sex appeal, talent and personality.

And in the past 24 months events have rocketed off for him in swift enough succession to make a jet pilot dizzy.

Take that May Day in 1950 when he scribbled his name below the blocks of fine print that were to change his life. In the morning Hank had gone to classes as usual, his thoughts concentrated completely on the one more day necessary to wind up his studies. He'd already pushed out of his mind the campus drama job he'd done in All My Sons, and the unrealistic aftermath—a screen test at Paramount where the answer was a fast "No."

But when he dropped by the Phi Delt house that afternoon there was a note, "Call your agent." So Hank called. "We've got a contract," said Paul Kohner. "Come over to Fox."

"Fox?" puzzled Hank. He'd never been there. He had no idea, of course, that screen tests, turkeys or not, make the rounds in Hollywood like prom-trotters, and that a man named Sol Siegel had spied his, said, "I've got a part for that boy —get him!"—just like that.

The ink was still wet when Hank ventured, still a little dazed, "I'll be back day after tomorrow."

"Day after tomorrow," they corrected him tersely, "you'll be in New York City."

"But—" sputtered Hank, "I've just got 30 minutes more class work—then I'm through."

"Thirty minutes is too much," they said. "You're hopping off by plane at dawn. You're in a picture—Fourteen Hours. It's shooting in Manhattan. Goodbye now."

Well, at dawn Hank was winging East, all right, his first ride on a plane, his first trip to New York since he'd gone there in rompers, his first job in a movie—and behind him was a collegiate goal he'd steered for since his high school days, missed by 30 short minutes!

And when he came back, he'd hardly unstrapped his bags when the telephone rang. "We don't like your name, Hank," said a voice. "Nothing personal—but think up a new one, will you? And make it snappy. Got just an hour to get the ads and publicity going on your picture."

Hank sat down at his handy portable and pecked out all the names he could think of—front and back—on index cards. Up in the office of Harry Brand, the publicity chief, he dealt himself "Jeffrey" with one cold hand and "Hunter" with the other. They paired up. "How about Jeffrey Hunter?" he asked as the deadline passed.

"Hi, Jeff!" grinned that genial executive.

Now, a resilient laddie who can switch both his life's plans and his name that fast without psychic upheavals is obviously quick on the uptake and able to field a fast bounce. But by now Jeff Hunter knows that anything can happen so you'd better keep yourself ready to jump. All along it's been that way with him.

WHEN Producer Julian Blaustein called him in for his first big movie break in Take Care Of My Little Girl, for instance, he asked a few questions: Was Jeff by any chance a Greek letter man?

Jeff said he certainly was. He was a Phi Delta Theta at Illinois Alpha chapter, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois. What's more, he had been chapter president, and the tong meant a lot to him.

"UM-hmmm," purred Mr. Blaustein happily. "That's fine—just perfect. Well, I suggest you resign at once."

"Resign?"

"Why, yes—before you get kicked out."

Blaustein explained: He was all set to rip collegiate Greek letter fraternities and sororities into quivering shreds with the movie expose Take Care Of My Little Girl —and Jeff was to be the main ripper. "After Chad Carnes hits the screen, Jeff," he assured him, "you will not only be kicked out by your lodge but possibly tarred and feathered."

So there went another prop from Jeff's security, another Hollywood clipping of the cord with his past—or so he thought. But he did such an acting job that he was swamped with letters from all the brothers saying "Bravo!" the national publication, The Scroll, wrote him up in glowing terms and instead of a heel he turned into a Phi Delta hero.

Actually, of course, none of these twists and turns have been unwelcome to Jeff Hunter. In fact, results have been swell. Maybe the habit of changing his course fast is why he proposed to pretty Barbara Rush, now his wife, on their second date, and a hurry up outlook could be why they're expecting a family addition so soon. At any rate, right now Jeff is supremely happy with the hand fate has dealt him in Hollywood, and thankful too, which is only fitting and proper. Because Jeff was born on Thanksgiving Day, 1926, right after his mom had shoved the cranberry sauce in the icebox to set and started on the walnut stuffing.

"But nobody at our house got any turkey that day," Jeff grins, beating you to the punch. "The turkey was me."

That event took place on Hepser Street in New Orleans where the first H. H. McKinnies and his bride, Edith Burgess McKinnies, had migrated from Arkansas. So there's Rebel blood in Jeff's veins. But if you listen for any "you alls" to fall from his lips today, you'll be disappointed. In fact, making Cry Of The Swamp down in Waycross, Georgia, not long ago Jeff had to keep a tape recorder turning to catch the native patter so he could copy it for his Cracker character. That's because, almost before he could get used to his grits and gumbo, the depression made Yankees of his folks and switched Jeff into the first quick change in his life. His dad, a refrigeration engineer, moved North to get a job in Milwaukee, and that's where Hank grew up, right by nippy Lake Michigan in the Whitefish Bay part of town.

JEFF'S inclinations toward the drama were just so-so for a long time until he got his more gnawing athletic ambitions smashed along with his nose, several ribs, collar bones and assorted parts of his chassis. He was only a normally show-off kid who liked to fool around with puppets and collect pennies from backyard magic shows. Sometimes, too, especially when it involved little girls he liked, he romeo-ed in kiddie plays at school.

Once, in eighth grade a doll named Sally, who was his real life passion, teamed up with him in "The Birds' Christmas Carol" but it was very rough putting out artistic emotion with the whole football team, who knew how things stood, yelling cat-calls in his flaming ears. He didn't run across anything quite so mortifying as that until he hit Hollywood and had to smooch heavily with Jeanne Crain right after they'd been introduced.

But mostly what made Jeff tingle as a boy was sports. Football, basketball, baseball, track, skiing, swimming—whatever was in season, but football was his big charge. When he was only 11 he copped an All-Wisconsin junior gridiron contest for punting, passing, and dropkicking, and from seventh grade on he fullbacked and usually skippered a championship squad.

"At that point, I had only one ambition in life," Jeff admits, "college football." So, of course, that's what he didn't get.

He bruised too easily. It became a discouraging family routine setting Jeff's bones and sewing his rips and tears. After the last play of a championship game in his high school freshman year when Jeff's tackle reaped a face full of cleats, blood and a prolonged trip to dreamland, his mom laid down the law.

"I know you'll play football," she said, "so go ahead. But don't expect me to watch you. I can't take it." And she never saw another game, although Jeff kept on playing until a splintered arch sent that varsity hero dream glimmering for keeps. But by that time he had plenty of other interests.

Jeff had been exposed to piano lessons and they took (today he pats a keyboard beautifully, plays the organ, too). He was channelled to dancing school, and he got family applause for every bit of personality expression from the Tom Mix makeup kit on up to class plays. Result was that by the time he'd graduated from Whitefish Bay High School, there wasn't much he had missed in spreading his talents around. Jeff was class president, student body head, and—most important to him—a big operator in local radio programs, notably "The Children's Theatre of the Air" and "Those Who Serve." These brought him his first paycheck ($12.50) a tuxedo, and a radio course scholarship to Northwestern University. Only, before he could use it, Jeff was in the Navy.

At Great Lakes he struck for a radar technician's rating, but he soon discovered they had too many "sparks" already so he went back to primary training hoping to get to Japan. He wound up in sick bay with measles, complications and a medical discharge.

Then came Northwestern where Jeff called his shots for three years. He majored in speech and radio, minored in psychology and English, acted in the University plays, the NWU Radio workshop and guild. Summers he collected credits at the NBC Radio Institute in Chicago, and played summer stock in Pennsylvania. Along the way he found time for campus hi-jinks, parties and escapades—and in the date department—if Jeff didn't have a new girl pinned every semester he thought he was slipping.

After collecting his sheepskin, Jeff headed for Hollywood in a new car his dad gave him for graduation. Jeff knew, as anyone does, that the big league of radio is right in Hollywood. That he got switched soon to the other Hollywood big league was purely by accident, not design.

"All I knew about the movies," Jeff will assure you, "was what I learned on a family trip when I was 13. Nothing."

When his next studio visit rolled around —for that Paramount test—nine years had passed, but the sight Jeff saw this time was definitely more enchanting and significant in his swift changing young life. Specifically, he saw pretty, doe-eyed Barbara Rush, a Pasadena Playhouse alumna from Santa Barbara, who was one of those Paramount "Golden Circle" starlets. And when Jeff saw her he wanted to see her again, so he did. Neither Jeff nor Barbara, however, will pretend they had any idea of making a team at first. In fact, their first date was a very incompatible affair.

THE way Barbara tells it, Hunter first trapped her foolish heart by promising a day at the beach. Picturing a lazy idyll on golden sands lapped by soothing surf under an azure sky, "I went all out Vogue," Barbara remembers. "New tailored slacks, gay blouse, floppy hat and cute gold sandals. I even bought a stylish picnic hamper and had my hair set."

Well, Jeff stopped his car on the dizzy brink of bleak Point Dume. He lifted up the back end of the car and hauled out a rubber boat, spears and fins. How she descended the face of that precipitous Gibraltar Barbara will never know, but at the base there were jagged rocks, crashing waves and carnivorous seals who chased her—she swears—with slavering jaws. She spent the day bobbing about in the rubber craft, holding on for dear life while Jeff disappeared happily in the maelstrom, coming up now and then to drop a wriggling, impaled and bloody fish in her lap.

"I must have loved him," sighs Barbara, "or else I suppose I'd have murdered the man." Instead she agreed to a second excursion, which was more her style for romance. They went to the Santa Ynez Inn for dinner and after that walked to a promontory of the Pacific Palisades to look at the sea.

"Nice spot," observed Jeff. "Someday I'd like to build a house here—that is, if you'll marry me." Barbara had run into that kind of fast work before, but Jeff seemed to mean it so she said she'd think it over.

She thought it over while Jeff made two more pictures and then he thought she'd thought long enough. So even if she did yearn wistfully to be a June bride, last December, after finishing Take Care Of My Little Girl, Jeff drove to Sedona, Arizona, where Barbara was on location, and got pretty masterful about it. They hookeyed off to Nevada and were married December first at St. Christopher's in Boulder City, had a two-day honeymoon at Las Vegas and then Jeff was yanked back from bliss and exiled for two long months to the Virgin Islands to make The Frogmen. And that "hello-goodbye" kind of married life is what the Hunters have been up against ever since.

In the 16 months that they've been Mr. and Mrs., Jeff and Barbara have been together exactly eight. Unfortunately, both of them seem to draw distant locations—when the only location they dream about is a certain apartment high on a sunny hill in Westwood Village.

For a long time after they set up housekeeping there, the Hunters parked on the floor and slept on a mattress right on the rug. By some frantic shopping they finally assembled a bed, a stove, refrigerator and a couple of chairs. Now their home's cozily furnished in Early American things, and boasts a piano and electric organ. But it took over a year. No wonder they don't want to desert it, even for Hollywood's most brilliant affairs. After leaving one the other night where the hostess eyed them blankly and said, "How do you do? Who are you?" Jeff told Barbara, "Honey, I guess we're both just too homegrown to make the glamor grade."

Maybe they are. The old empty-headed giggle girls and whoopee boys who used to paint Hollywood red seven nights a week are few and far between these days. Most of them—like the Hunters set of best friends—Dale and Jackie Robertson, Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner, John and Pati Derek, Nancy Gates and Bill Hayes, Peter Hansen and Betty, Mitzi Gaynor, to name a few, are young people with resources and interests for themselves beyond the schools for scandal.

With that gang, quite often Jeff and Barbara roll up to a mountain cabin at Big Bear for a week-end of sports—skiing in the winter, hiking and sailing in the summer. Or they dance at the Palladium, roll down to a beach beauty spot for a picnic.

Neither Jeff nor Barbara smoke. Jeff takes a drink when he wants it, Barbara doesn't even do that. They like food and the fun of cooking it (they almost set the kitchen on fire the other night with one of those flaming dishes a picture magazine plugged). They like music—Cole Porter, Jerome Kern and the modern classics. They both play the piano, still study it too. They like books; Jeff's a worm who haunts the UCLA library up the street. They like sports—swimming, spear diving, touch football, handball for Jeff and swimming and hiking for Barbara. They like the arts; they have serious hobbies—photography, painting. They trade ideas and are purposeful about improving themselves in the business they're in. At home Jeff and Barbara keep their tape recorder winding constantly, checking their speech; they try out their parts on each other. "I could have stepped into Jean Peter's job any time she got sick," grins Babs, "I knew it by heart." There's a group going every Monday night skippered by Estelle Harman, Jeff's former drama teacher at UCLA, where young professionals from radio, TV, the movies—budding actors, song writers, script writers, even a night club singer join in to kick new ideas and notions around. "To tell the truth," says Jeff, a little guiltily, as if it's against the Hollywood rules, "We find it's fun to work and improve. I don't see why just because you're an actor, you have to be a screwball, too."

Jeff's got the straight thinking good sense to realize that the easy gravy days are over for his generation. He knows he'll have to work and prove himself—and often change himself—and so far that's just what he's done. He gives the mossy old Cinderella success story a flip with the back of his hand and about time too. In fact, Jeff Hunter has a favorite line for that: "Luck," he'll tell you, "is just when preparedness meets opportunity."

That's the way it's happened to him—and that's a good line to paste in your hat and keep there, as Jeffrey Hunter has, whether you're chasing success in Hollywood or anywhere else. END

(Continued from page 31) arrived in California the next day and did everything he could think of to get in touch with his wife, but by this time lawyers were involved, 'loyal' friends had moved to Chata's side and it had been decided for her that it would be best if she didn't see Duke anymore—at least not until after the divorce. John Wayne slept that night in a twin bed, with an actor pal snoring in the other. But before he went to sleep that night he said something to himself that he had said many times before. "I'll be waiting."

A few weeks later, loafing about in search of something to keep his mind occupied while waiting, John Wayne was in Monterey, California, visiting some friends he hadn't seen for a long time. They were all sitting around chinning late in the evening and Duke decided to take a walk outside. He hauled himself out of his chair and started for the door. A rug flew from under his feet and he fell heavily to the ground and slid along a fieldstone hearthstone almost into the fireplace.

His friends rushed to his side and helped him up and it was then they discovered that his right ear had almost been torn off in his skid on the stones. A doctor was called and Wayne was promptly put to bed where surgery was performed on the ear. Someone present decided Wayne's wife should be told of the accident, so a wire was sent—and everyone went to bed.

The next morning a florist truck stopped in front of the house and a huge, tasseled box was delivered, addressed to John Wayne. Wayne looked at the box with an expression resembling horror when it was brought into his room.

"What the devil is that?" he demanded.

"Looks like flowers," said his host, grinning. "Imagine a big fellow like you getting flowers."

"Get them out of here," roared Wayne.

"Aren't you even going to open them up?" asked his host. "They might be pretty."

"Get them out of this room!" Wayne howled.

"I'll tell you what," said the host, "I'll just put them here by your bed—and if you want to you can have them put in a vase later. 'Bye, dear."

He ran before Wayne could throw a lamp at him.

After looking at the box for a few minutes, Wayne pulled at one of the tassles and a ribbon came off. He peeked beneath the lid and then quickly tore it off and stared into the box. On a bed of ferns lay a bundle of tall-stemmed red roses. Wayne flipped through them looking for a card, but he couldn't find one. Then he dumped the roses out on his bed and one by one counted them. He counted them twice to make sure. There were 17. He didn't need a card.

With a howl of pleasure that must have been heard a mile away, Duke Wayne leaped from the bed and began dashing about looking for his clothes. The other members of the household came running into the room.

"What's the matter?" someone asked.

"Nothing's the matter," said Wayne. "I just want to get my clothes—I'm getting out of here."

"But you can't," said his host. "The doctor said. . . ."

"I don't care what the doctor said," cried Wayne. "I've got to get home. There are 17 roses in that box. Don't you know what that means?"

The host shook his head.

"Of course you don't," said Wayne pulling on his pants. "The trouble with you is you haven't got any sentiment. Out of my way."

And in ten minutes John Wayne was tearing down the highway headed for Hollywood.

That was the most important incident in The Romance of the Seventeen Roses —the love story of John and Chata Wayne. It was the cue for the reconciliation, after a misunderstanding that had threatened to break them up. And it had a background that you shall hear about later.

ACCORDING to John Wayne's mother, "Duke only had three girl friends in his life—and he married two of them."

The first Mrs. John Wayne was his high school and college sweetheart, a fine girl and mother of his four children. They'd have been married to this day, his friends feel, if it hadn't been for two things. One, the first Mrs. Wayne was a devoutly religious Catholic, steeped in church work, and John is a Presbyterian. He couldn't and didn't join her in this work. The second reason was that Mrs. Wayne was highly social and Duke Wayne hates society folks with a passion. They had no common ground after they had matured.

It seemed, for a long time after Duke Wayne was separated from his first wife, that he would never again have any interest in a woman. He was a solitary man who refused to date a girl for any reason, no matter how silly it looked for him to stag it. But one day, in Mexico City, he accepted an invitation to lunch at the Reforma Hotel—and seated across from him he saw a tall, dark-haired girl with a smile that cracked the ice around his heart in 30 seconds. He was polite and pretty formal and when the luncheon was over he left with a casual handshake and a "nice to have met you."

But later on that afternoon a messenger appeared at the girl's door.

"Flowers," he said, "for Miss Esperanza Baur. Sign here."

Miss Baur, then a motion picture actress in Mexican films, opened the box and saw 17 red roses and a card which read: "Today's the seventeenth of November. Seventeen will always be my lucky number. . . . John Wayne."

The next day they drove to the floating gardens of Xochimilco, a fabulously beautiful place near Mexico City where lovers can rent gondolas and be poled through acres of exotic species of flowers while troubadors follow in another boat singing romantic ballads. There John Wayne bought Esperanza 17 blooms again—and, because she had a pug nose, called her the Spanish translation, Chata. That's what he's called her ever since.

Six months later, on the 17th of January, 1946, Duke Wayne and Chata were married in the same chapel in Long Beach where his mother had been married. And as they left the church, John handed her another bunch of roses—17 in number—and he said: "Remember? I told you 17 was my lucky number."

Until late in 1951 there was never a breath of gossip about the John Waynes. Their home life was idyllic. It was, of course, no wishy-washy marriage. They had their quarrels and their minor differences of opinion, but there was never anything to amount to a hill of beans.

Early in the marriage there was the incident of the bed. Six-foot-four Duke Wayne just didn't fit in the bed he shared with his wife. He is a restless sleeper anyway, and after a few tosses and turns the covers always came out of the bottom of the bed and John's feet would stick out. When they got cold, he woke up—mad. And by that time Chata was getting sore because of the squirming and muttering and pretty soon they'd grow really furious with each other. That first bed might have amounted to something big if Duke hadn't gone out one day and bought a huge couch, six by seven feet, which they still occupy.

There have been times during the marriage of Duke and Chata Wayne when his yen for manly pastimes has been an issue. Maybe he'd stay out too late, held by a poker game that just wouldn't end. But Chata, as she grew to know him better, made concessions for Duke's restless spirit. She did the smartest thing possible. She found a big barn of a house that had enough room for all of Duke's friends —and moved the family into it before Duke knew what was happening. The house has all the comforts a man dreams of. Horses in a fine stable, a riding ring, a pool, a gun room and a working bar where a fellow can put his feet on a rail and swap stories with a pal.

The differences of opinion that brought about the Wayne separation of a few months ago have never been made public. It is judged that they came about on what had been planned as a vacation trip to South America. Duke had just finished a couple of pictures for RKO and Howard Hughes, as a gesture of gratitude had offered him the use of a fancy airplane and a couple of pilots for a tour of the Latin American countries. Duke, Chata and a few close friends set out in fine style, but before long it seemed that everything was going wrong. They had plane trouble. They had weather trouble. The whole thing grew pretty tiresome.

One night Duke found himself a short distance from a remote Marine base and, being a staunch supporter of that branch of the service, he made a solo side trip to say hello to a small group of GI's stuck in the bush right next door to nowhere. The party he gave them, they say, went on for a couple of days and when Wayne got back to his friends Chata was pretty mad. Then, just when the trip began to look as though it might develop into fun after all, Duke got a rush call from John Ford to fly to Ireland to start a long-time Ford project, The Quiet Man.

Mike Curtiz, my favorite character, asked, "What's a big word for colossal?"

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

Intimates of the pair say that Chata didn't like that either and even though she joined her husband in Ireland for a short stay, the whole business rankled her. At any rate, she came home alone—and when Duke got back they had that conversation and he took off for Mexico to think things over.

ANYBODY who saw John Wayne during that period of bachelorhood can tell you that he was a miserable man. Maybe, though, if you didn't know him you couldn't have told it, because he pretended in public to be having the time of his life. But he'd sit in the sun and remember Chata and the song, "J'attendrai" and what it meant in English. And when he'd decided that he had had enough of waiting and went home to do something about it and couldn't get to talk to his wife, he was sure that Chata was lost to him forever. Then he really suffered. And his journey to Monterey was a melancholy one.

The day Duke Wayne got the 17 roses without a card was the shortest he ever remembers. Driving to Los Angeles was like floating along in a dream, and that night when he got into town he didn't pause to wash up, he just drove home and into his driveway and parked and walked to the front door of his house. He rang the bell and Chata answered the door. Duke stood there with his hat in his hand and that shy grin on his face—and Chata let out a small cry when she saw the massive bandage on his ear.

"Are you all right now?" she asked.

"Sure—I'm fine now," said Duke, and his wife opened the door so that he could come in and she could take care of him.

Later that night, with Chata in his arms, Duke was happy again.

"Remember our honeymoon?" he asked.

"Sure I do," Chata said. "We went to Honolulu and it rained all the time we were there."

"They tell me," said Duke, "that the weather in Honolulu is great right now. They don't expect rain for months maybe."

"You want to go to Honolulu?" Chata asked.

"How'd you like to try that honeymoon again?" Duke asked.

Chata wanted to.

It was raining the day the Lurline sailed. Los Angeles was in the grip of the worst storm in years. Everything was at a standstill. The huge dock that is generally crowded with people on sailing day was almost deserted. Only a small crowd of hardy residents of the area were there to see friends and family off and they were gathered in a tight knot, huddled together against the wind and the rain in a dripping shed near the gangway.

A long black limousine pulled to a skidding stop on the flooded macadam fronting the dock and Duke and Chata and a party of their friends got out. With his coat held protectively about Chata, Duke ran her to the gangplank and, after a hasty showing of tickets, skipped her up the slanting loading ramp into the warm belly of the ship. Their friends followed them—all in a jolly mood.

In their suite, the party toasted the voyage and the second honeymoon. The sailing was delayed because of the fog conditions in the harbor, so Duke and his guests sat in the room and made happy talk until the throaty whistle on the smoke stack announced that the trip was to begin. Then they shook hands all around and Duke and Chata were alone.

They stood in the lanai that was part of their suite and watched the berth slip away and then the other ships in the harbor disappear astern. Then they passed the breakwater and ahead of them was the broad expanse of the Pacific that, this day, was chopping and rolling in the storm.

"It's sunny out there," Duke said. "Maybe tomorrow we'll see it—and then Honolulu."

Chata didn't say anything, she just looked as happy as she was.

After a while there was a knock on the door. Duke opened it and admitted a steward with a big white box.

"Come in and put them in a vase," he said.

The man opened the box and, after putting water in a vase, inserted, one by one, 17 long-stemmed red roses. And Chata just looked at them without saying anything, sure that if she spoke she'd cry.

When the man was gone, Duke put his arm about his wife and turned her around so that she faced him.

"You know what day this is?" he asked.

"No," said Chata, "should I?"

"It's St. Patrick's Day," Duke said. "The 17th of March." And he looked over her shoulder at the roses. "'I told you that 17 was my lucky number."

"I never forgot," said Chata.

And the steamer ploughed through the murk and the fog and it never carried a happier pair of honeymooners to Hawaii—or anyplace else for that matter. END

Hollywood is still chuckling over the five-day engagement last year of Betty and writer Norman Krasna. It is, according to the cynical comics of the town, still one of the funniest bits they've run across. Imagine a girl meeting a fellow, getting engaged to him in a few days—and then, after a week or so, calling the whole thing off without reason. Well, it isn't funny at all.

The engagement of Betty and Norman was a dead serious matter to her—and the breaking of it was more serious. It was a flash affair that had all the elements of a lonely boy and girl elopement—with both depending on time to bring them love. It is very unlikely that Betty was any more in love with Krasna than he was with her. And the ardor they both professed was much more likely the expression of a wish than the statement of a reality.

Betty Hutton is by nature a person who can not stand being alone. She has to have someone around to laugh or cry with, someone to tell her troubles to. She plays hoydens on the screen, but in private life she is as sentimental as a pixie and as emotional as a small child. And after a couple of years of having no one, almost any man who came along and read her a sad poem or played a prank with her could have had a big portion of her heart.

Norman Krasna was a man who did both—and to top it off he showered the unhappy Betty with the attentions a prince would tender a princess. He was kidding himself, it turned out, but he felt such a passion for the lovely Betty that he sent her an expensive piece of jewelry as a present every day. And Betty swooned under such treatment and told the press and everyone who would listen that at last she had found love—and a man of her own.

The reason for the breaking of the engagement has never been divulged, but those in the know say that it was just that they both realized one night that they were kidding themselves and that it wouldn't work. Like sensible people they broke it off fast.

A friend who talked to Betty Hutton a day or so after the press got the news of the split says he has never spoken to anyone more despondent. And she wasn't weeping because she had lost Krasna, but because a dream had been shattered, a pretty picture of a full life with her own man was in ashes. She took it very hard.

You may recall that you never heard Betty quoted as speaking of marriage to her current boy friend after that. She was the constant date of a musician named Pete Rugolo for months, but whenever a reporter asked her if it might develop into a wedding, Betty would give some version of the expression, "Are you kidding?"

Even when she met and began dating the handsome O'Curran it was the same thing. Sure they looked like people in love. They held hands in public and they danced cheek to cheek, but they didn't expect it to mean anything.

EVEN though she didn't realize it at the time, the meeting of Betty Hutton and Charlie O'Curran was different. A hint that it was different might have been taken from the picture they were both assigned to work on—the story of the long marriage of Benny Field and Blossom Seeley, called Somebody Loves Me. O'Curran, a comparative newcomer to Hollywood, had been signed by Paramount as the dance director of the show. Betty was introduced to him in the studio rehearsal hall, but as far as she was concerned, he was just another dance director—and they generally had a different one on each of her pictures.

If there is ever a setting in which a couple of movie people can get to know one another well, it is in the rehearsal hall, for the principals of the picture must spend as much as eight hours a day learning and practicing routines. During this time the star either grows to hate the slave driver who tells her she is not doing it quite right yet—or she develops a rapport with him, admires his talent and grows to like him personally. The latter is the way it was between Betty and Charlie.

All during the rehearsals for Somebody Loves Me and during the shooting, the relationship between Betty and Charlie was a business-like one. On the set they had a lot of laughs, but when the six o'clock whistle blew they went their separate ways. That's how it was for about three months until the picture was ended, and they had to say goodbye for good.

If you've ever gone away to a summer resort and met a nice fellow or a girl and had a lot of fun you know the feeling of saying goodbye. Suddenly, for the first time maybe, you feel a lump in your throat and you are surprised to find out that you don't want it to end right there. That's just about what happened to Betty Hutton and Charlie O'Curran. It was at the quiet little party the stars and producer threw for the cast and crew of the movie on the last day of shooting. Everybody was telling everybody else what fun it had been working together. People were shaking hands all around and saying, "Hope we work together again sometime."

Betty Hutton took Charlie O'Curran's hand and they both murmured something like: "It was swell. Maybe we'll see each other around the lot." And then they both knew that they didn't want it that way at all. And Charlie said something like: "It was wonderful, but now it's over. Why can't I call you and we can have lunch . . . or something?" And Betty couldn't help herself and said something like: "Gee—I wish you would. Is tomorrow too soon?"

NOBODY in Hollywood paid too much attention when Betty began dating Charlie. Everyone knew, or thought they knew, that she was on the rebound from Norman Krasna—and that any guy she went out with was just a shoulder to weep on. That, of course, is because Hollywood is not able to detect the subtle signs of a growing affection. Betty is very demonstrative, so Hollywood paid no attention when she held Charlie's hand. Hutton always did that.

Fate soon took a hand in the relationship between Betty Hutton and Charlie O'Curran. Betty had decided that, having a few weeks off, she was going to make the journey to Korea to entertain the soldiers there. And, knowing that the boys might not see a real bang-up show for a long time, she decided to give them an entertainment something like they'd be able to see on Broadway. She asked Charlie to help her with the dances and they went to work back in the Paramount rehearsal hall for another 20 days. Now they were working together every day and dating every night.

Before she left for Korea, Betty got an offer to play the New York Palace Theatre—and she accepted it. That meant that once again she'd have to have Charlie's help in the routining.

Then one cold winter morning, she took off from the Los Angeles Municipal Airport in a huge airliner for the hazardous flight across the Pacific to Japan. She sat in a window seat, surrounded by the other members of the troupe and looked out at the crowd seeing them off. When the powerful motors began to whine and then roar into action, she suddenly felt a pang of unhappiness. She searched the crowd outside and finally saw Charlie standing off by himself watching the plane with a glum expression on his Irish face. She wept—and she never took her eyes from him until the ship lumbered down the runway to the take-off point and the knot of friends and Charlie was far in the distance. But she knew then that he was what she wanted to come back to. He was a dear friend—and maybe she was in love with him.

No movie star ever worked harder, or experienced more hardships than Betty Hutton did on that tour of Korea. Several times a day she got into the costumes of the show and sang and clowned about the make-shift stages for those endless stretches of lonely faces. She was never without a joke or a loud, raucous laugh for the GI's. But she couldn't forget that she was looking at misery and want at every performance. She did her best to help the soldiers, but she couldn't seem to help herself, or wipe out the picture of sadness that was always before her.

She was singing a ballad, a love ballad, when she knew what she wanted. All of a sudden she knew she wanted Charlie, not as a dear friend, but as a husband and a father for her two children. It was then that she knew her cynicism was not good, and that she had to forget the disappointments and heartaches of the past and give love a real chance with Charlie.

Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis habitually whoop it up in the Paramount Studio commissary every lunch hour and, as a gag, studio head Y. Frank Freeman generally walks over and offers them a couple of bucks to keep quiet. The last time he tried to silence the boys, Jerry Lewis screamed: "Don't try to put on airs with us, Freeman. We knew you when your name was Mona!"

Mickey Novak

BETTY HUTTON proposed to Charlie O'Curran. She had been home almost a week and although there had been a warm reception for her when she got off the plane, she and Charlie had drifted back into the old rehearsing in the daytime and dating at night routine. On St. Patrick's Day Betty and Charlie worked on the dances for the Palace engagement. When they finished, shortly after six o'clock in the evening, they drifted across the street from the studio to a restaurant for a bite of dinner. They were accompanied by Betty's secretary, Betsy Dalton, Charlie's assistant, Bea Allen and Buddy Fraker, a Paramount studio photographer. They had dinner and were sitting around with coffee and cigarettes. Suddenly Betty leaned toward Charlie.

"Okay," she said, "do you want to or not?"

"Want to what?" asked Charlie.

"Get married," said Betty.

Charlie nearly leaped across the table. "Do I want to?" he cried. "That's all I'm able to think about!"

"When do you want to do it?" asked Betty.

"Right this minute," stammered Charlie. "Right now. It's St. Patrick's day."

Betty almost leaped across the table this time, but somehow order managed to creep into the situation. Charlie was too nervous, so Betty's secretary got on the phone and called the Paul Mantz Air Charter Service and had them warm up a plane. Then the five of them piled into a car and without stopping for even a tooth brush, dashed to the airport. Within half an hour they were on their way, but they were not sure whether they could have the ceremony that night. It seems that the only person in Las Vegas that Betsy Dalton could get to listen to her, because she had made the arrangements in her name, was a bell boy at Wilbur Clark's Desert Inn.

When the plane landed at Las Vegas it was close to midnight. The bell boy was there, the only local greeter. When he learned who was really to get married he went into high gear. He arranged for a license clerk to meet the party at the courthouse and issue the certificate. Then he got Judge Frank MacNamee out of bed and headed for the wedding chapel. The group assembled there and in a few minutes, after a quiet ceremony, well studded with tears all around, Betty Hutton became Mrs. Charles O'Curran. And the hugs and kisses the bride and groom shared when it was over were warm and sincere, for now they never had to be alone again.

Still guided by their friend the bell boy, the O'Currans repaired to the Desert Inn where they were given the bridal suite and everyone sat down to weeping and laughing and drinking champagne until the small hours of the morning.

The news of the elopement came as a surprise to Hollywood, but it was happy news. The couple came back the next day and held a small reception and press conference for their friends and reporters. Photographers took their pictures, but had a hard time getting Charlie and Betty to stop looking at each other and into the camera. When the party was over, the newlyweds went right back to Paramount and the rehearsal hall where the work at hand went on as usual. Except that now when Charlie addressed Betty, he called her Mrs. O'Curran.

It was there that George Fisher, the CBS man, interviewed them again. When the tape machine was set up, he advanced with his microphone and asked Betty to explain what had happened in the short time since she'd told him, on the same program, that she had no liking or use for marriage.

With Charlie holding tightly to her hand she thought it out very carefully—and then she said what we told you before.

"Loneliness is a terrible thing," she said. "Nobody knows how lonely a movie star can be. Everyone thinks that because a girl is in pictures she can have all of the men and the love and affection she wants. I know different. I know I was feeling sorry for myself when I used to say I'd never marry again. It was just that maybe I'd lost faith. I'm glad I found that faith. I found it in Korea in the faces of the men I sang and danced for. I guess when I looked at all those men and realized that not one of them was really mine, I decided I wanted to be married."

Betty Hutton's two children, Lindsay and Candice, have known Charlie O'Curran for a long time, but there had to be a formal declaration of his new status. Betty, as soon as she got home from Las Vegas, told them both that there was now going to be a new head man around the house. The children like Charlie very much, and Candy took the announcement with evident delight. Lindsay, who is bound to come around one day, took a philosophical view of the whole thing, but she had a single reservation.

She looked Charlie over carefully, decided to accept the situation, but had to add a comment. "Shucks," she said, "I wish it had been Roy Rogers!" END

the girl in white

(Continued from page 51) near perfection in every way would have been required, as well as patience and humility to meet opposition. I talked to Dr. Jones about it—she's the woman doctor who's head of the hospital on the MGM lot, and she gave me an even greater interest in my role. She began 50 years ago when Dr. Emily did, and had the same difficulties. Once she walked into the hospital room of a little boy who was a mastoid case, and he looked at her in horror.

"Go 'way," he said. "I want a doctor, not a nurse!"

"But I am your doctor," she told him.

"Huh," he sniffed. "You sure look like a lady to me!"

After my talk with Dr. Jones I grew so interested that I invited even more than the usual crew of doctors to dinner at our house. It's a lucky thing Richard enjoys them, too, for our table has been visited by allergists and psychiatrists, pediatricians, obstetricians and diagnosticians. The whole works. I learned a long time ago not to start talking medicine when you're socially involved with a doctor, but our friends in the profession always get around to it sooner or later, maybe because they know how interested I am. I sit there and forget to eat, and Richard says it's the only time I stop talking.

The picture was fun all around—the challenge of the role and the days on the set. Richard came down one day and took a lot of crazy pictures, as is my husband's wont. And another day, when Pamela had the sniffles, she told Richard that she wanted to go to the studio.

"But why?" he said.

"Mommy's a doctor today and she can make me well."

So Richard gave in to her, as he always does unless I'm around, and brought her down. They put her in an ambulance driver's uniform—a miniature copy of mine, and by the time she was decked out in that, she'd forgotten all about her cold.

Gary Merrill is a lovable madman, and wore his Bermuda plaid shorts around the lot (he always looks as though he's going to take off on a safari). Once Bette Davis came to visit him on the set and walked around all day in her stockinged feet. That made me feel pretty good, because it's my own favorite way of walking. It was the eating-est set I've ever been on, which was a good thing for me, because I'd had a rough case of the flu before the picture began and had lost a lot of weight. There were whole days of eating scenes—dinner with the men and tea with Mildred Dunnock—and I began to gain a few pounds. As if those scenes weren't enough, Gary always kept a bag of popcorn hanging on the side of the camera.

Funny thing about the picture. Usually when I begin a film I work so hard at first that in two weeks or so I begin dragging around the set. But in my role as Dr. Emily, I felt responsible in an odd sort of way. I knew she wouldn't have given up, so I just plain forgot to grow tired.

WEARING the doctor's white coat was a real thrill, and so was the time I saved children from a burning building, and the time I mended the shoulder of a man who'd been injured. Then there were the guinea pigs for a laboratory scene—when one got loose and went scurring around the set all the women were climbing walls. Me—I wanted to take one home for the children. But I was most excited about the scene where I watch Arthur Kennedy experiment with radium.

(In the picture, he wants to go to France and work with a woman whose name is just beginning to make news—Madame Curie—and he works with radium in his spare time.) I stand beside him and watch as the jar lights up. I really lost myself in that scene. It was as if I were witnessing a real radium experiment, and of course that captivated me, because science was always my best subject in school.

I was so wrapped up in the picture that I wrote about it to my brother Arthur, who is studying medicine at Columbia. He didn't seem too impressed, so I suppose he's going to be prejudiced against "hen medics" just the way all the men in the movie are. Well, even if Arthur wasn't impressed, I'm still immensely proud of him. It was one of the greatest thrills of my life when, during his sophomore year at Culver Military Academy, I asked him what he wanted to do in the future. He just looked at me in that quiet way of his and said, "I want to be a doctor." He stuck with his decision, too, even when at graduation time Richard tried to talk him into attending Annapolis.

"I want to be a doctor," said Arthur.

"But with the world situation," said my husband, "you might be better off to think about—"

Arthur just smiled. "Maybe brain surgery," he said, then looked at me and winked. I've never been able to figure out whether he was enlisting my help against Richard's advice, or deciding I might need help some day myself.

He's working awfully hard now. The other day he sent me a letter he'd received from the University, commending him on his grades. There were none below B plus. I got funny and told him there was nothing wrong with straight A's, but then I was sorry when I got a letter from my mother. She reports that he does nothing but study, and when she suggests that he relax a little, he says, "I can't. I promised June I'd do my best. And this is it."

I'm proud of him all right, because he's making the grade even if I didn't. I hope that after he sees The Girl In White, he'll think twice before refusing to sympathize with some beleagured female doctor. As a matter of fact, I hope the picture helps, even in some small way, the women doctors of this world. I enjoyed it, and I hope you will. END

it's not all gravy

By nature, Mario is a plain, generous, easy-going man. He likes to relax, loaf, travel, talk all night with his friends.

Ever since success came to him, he's been able to do none of these things.

A few weeks ago, when Al Hall, the director of Mario's latest picture, Because You're Mine, was hit by the flu, the film shooting came to a halt. Mario had a week off.

"I feel sorry for Al," he told Betty that night, "but just think of it! I've got seven days off. Where would you like to go?"

Betty thought for a moment. "Why don't we go to Las Vegas?" she suggested. "Andy opens there next week." Andy is Andy Russell, the crooner who is one of Mario's closest friends.

So the Lanzas flew to Las Vegas. On the night of their arrival Mario and Betty sat down at a table in the hotel dining room. Within three minutes at least a dozen guests had recognized Lanza. They crowded around his table asking him to sign autographs. Mario smiled and scribbled his signature across the menus. Then two girls came over and uninvited, pulled up some chairs. "We're from Philadelphia, Mario," they said. "Do you mind if we join you?"

Mario grinned wanly.

"But we're expecting other guests," Betty said.

"That's okay," the girls said. "We'll leave when they get here."

The Lanzas tried to order some dinner, and eventually they did—but they never got to eat it. Word spread throughout the hotel that Mario Lanza was in the dining room, and an estimated 80 people flocked in for autographs.

From that point on the Lanzas had to take all their meals in their room. They couldn't eat in restaurants, clubs, or hotels. Everywhere he went, Mario was mobbed.

One morning, Mario received a long distance call from Los Angeles. "Don't forget," his secretary warned. "You have to fly in by noon today. You've got your radio show to do."

So Mario flew back to Hollywood and sang his heart out. Then he caught the midnight plane back to Las Vegas. When he arrived he was dead tired, and went to sleep almost immediately.

They woke him at eight the next morning. The sun was very bright, and the photographer from the studio publicity department wanted to get some good color stuff.

It was a great seven-day vacation. Mario did absolutely none of the things he wanted to do.

"Now that I have a few bucks," Mario says, "I don't even have the time to spend it. I get $25 a week spending money from my business manager. The other day I put my hand in my watch pocket and I found three weeks' allowances."

"That's nothing," his wife says. "Tell about the time we went to Honolulu. We thought we would have a wonderful vacation. After all, Hawaii is such a beautiful resort spot. Well, Mario was talked into doing one concert for Freddie Matsuo, a great guy. Only the one concert turned into four, and Mario didn't even set foot on Waikiki Beach. He came back home more tired than when he left."

Every now and then, Mario entertains the idea of quitting motion pictures, and restricting his activities to making a few records and perhaps one concert tour a year.

When Laurence Olivier portrayed Nelson after he has lost an eye, Olivier had to wear a false lid of his own. Shrugged Vivien Leigh when asked what she thought of her husband's disguise, "What does it matter? Larry can do more with one eye than most men can do with two!"

But this is an impossibility, because Mario's career gives employment to at least 100 people, and he's the kind of man who thinks of others before considering himself.

IF MARIO misses one recording date, 65 musicians receive no salary that week. If he gives up one radio show, another 20 musicians go without pay.

No one knows exactly how many people Mario Lanza is supporting out of his own income. When you ask him, he says modestly, "Who cares? I believe money should be spent. The man with money is the man with headaches."

Mario not only supports his wife, two children, three in help and two secretaries, but also his parents.

When Mario first signed at MGM, he was earning $750 a week. He sent for his parents at once and rented a home for them on South Crescent Drive. He then ordered his business manager to see that they got almost half of his monthly movie salary.

While at Metro, Mario met a man in the research department named Felix Wayne. When Metro let Felix out, Mario put him on his personal payroll as an executive.

When Coca-Cola began to dicker with Mario for a radio show, he was willing to listen. "Fine," said the men from the advertising agency. "Your musical conductor will be Percy Faith."

"No," Mario said. "My musical conductor will be Ray Sinatra."

"Who ever heard of Ray Sinatra?" the agency boys asked. "Percy Faith is a conductor of stature, an orchestra leader of renown. We have him all signed up."

"That's great," said Mario. "But you don't have Lanza."

The agency boys went around to see Betty. "Why is your husband so insistent about having Ray Sinatra?" they asked.

Betty smiled. "I guess," she explained, "Mario thinks he can use the work."

A year or so ago, a Hungarian composer named Nicky Brodsky, was stranded in New York. Brodsky, who had composed some of the finest operetta music in the Balkans, wanted desperately to come to Hollywood. But no one in Hollywood had a spot for him. Mario not only brought Nick Brodsky out to Hollywood but paid his expenses, and soon Brodsky got into Metro where he composed "Be My Love" for his young sponsor.

Mario also sends his mother-in-law a weekly allowance. Practically no other motion picture star can make this claim. Betty's mother works as an interior decorator in Marshall Fields Department Store in Chicago. She is 56 years old and has three daughters to support, and Mario thinks it only fair that she have a little extra spending money.

Only recently, Mario lent his name to his uncle Arnold for use on a brand of supplies to be known as Lanza Groceries. Any profits from this business will go to the Lanza relatives.

During his Oregon workout last year, a workout in which he cut his weight from 240 lbs. to 180, Mario met Dale Goodman, an ex-GI who had parted with a lung on Iwo Jima. Mario learned that Dale had always dreamed of owning a chicken ranch. Mario purchased such a ranch and went into partnership with Dale.

One evening last October, Dale phoned Mario. "I hate to bother you with this, Mario," Dale said, "but our new baby is suffering brain hemorrhages. The doctors around here don't know what to do. Is there anything you can suggest?"

"Try not to worry," Mario pleaded. Mario got on the phone, and in a couple of hours, two top Chicago specialists were flying to Rogue River.

Ask Mario how much that little bill came to, and he grins, "Two ninety-eight," he says.

A month before this incident, Betty's aunt May from McKeesport, Pa., sent the Lanzas some newspaper clippings. The clippings told the story of a one-day-old infant who had been abandoned in an apartment house vestibule. The baby had been sent to the Pittsburgh Hospital where, because of his lusty cries, the nurses had nicknamed him, Mario Lanza.

Mario was proud as a peacock to think that strong, lusty volume was almost synonymous with his name. That night he said to Betty, "Is it okay with you if I send that little baby in Pittsburgh $500?"

Betty answered with a kiss.

When no one claimed the foundling at the Pittsburgh Hospital, he and his $500 were sent to the Roselia Foundling Home where he was named Mario Lanza II. As soon as this item hit the press, the Mother Seton Sisters of Charity who run the Home, were swamped with adoption offers. Hundreds of couples wanted little Mario for their very own.

By the time you read this article that blond little blue-eyed baby will be living comfortably with his new parents in a healthy decent home. What counts, too, is the fact that the Mario Lanza Fund is now established at Roselia, and Mario will add to it each year.

One more illustration of where the Lanza money goes and why Mario can't quit. Remember 11-year-old Raphaela Fasano, the little girl from Newark who lapsed into a coma last September because of the supposedly incurable Hodgkins Disease?

Well, Raphaela has improved so much that she is now attending fifth grade at the Dayton Street public school. She attributes her miraculous recuperation to Mario Lanza. It was he who not only sang to her on the phone from California but paid all her expenses to Hollywood. He supplied her with the best medical care and imbued her with the will to improve. Mario still phones Raphaela whenever he gets a chance.

"I DON'T mind the responsibility that comes with success," Mario explains, "because after all that's a man's role in the world—the acceptance of responsibility. The thing that gets me about success is the way you become a target for every Tom, Dick, and Harry. As soon as you're in the public eye, people begin taking potshots at you. You ask for a little favor, and all of a sudden they accuse you of being temperamental. You don't hear what one guy is saying, and right away you're a snob. You have 103 temperature and the doctor orders you to bed, and right away they say you're a baby, and 'My, doesn't he take care of himself.' You make an innocent statement like 'I'll always have a soft spot in my heart for Kathryn Grayson because she was in my first two pictures,' and overnight the newspapers are building up a big Grayson-Lanza feud.

"When you're married to someone like my Betty, feuds are impossible, anyway. As soon as someone gets angry with me, Betty rings him up. She believes in clearing the air at once. She tells everyone how I'm really such an angel and how hard I work. They don't fall for that angel routine, but they realize that I work pretty hard and that constant work will keep anyone pretty tense."

What can Mario Lanza do about his work schedule? Friends predict that eventually it will cost him his health and his voice. "He cannot make pictures," one voice coach recently pointed out, "and also do radio shows, recordings, concert tours, and study opera. Not even Caruso would dare tax his voice that much."

Mario's answer is, "I can't help it. I'm a man who likes to sing. I sing for pleasure not for money. Money has given me a lot of headaches and fame has taken some of the fun out of life. But when I sing a song and people's eyes light up, that's worth all the bother, all the responsibility, all the headaches. As to how long I can go on singing—that's in God's hands." END

In the swim

One-house woman

WHEN IT COMES TO PERFUMES, why do I have to go crazy about one like Tuvaché Zezan, which nobody can afford to give me? . . . and which I haven't got. Otherwise I like simple things. I like mountains better than deserts, trails better than roads, grass better than asphalt. And maybe a simple, black mist mink. The other night I had a dream. I was an international perfume thief. I jimmied my way into the perfumery, poured some Tuvaché Zezan all over myself, got home and squeezed a fortune of it out of my clothes into a handy little container. Naturally it was a silly dream. Any woman wafting out a scent like that would never reach home. She'd have to call the police to help beat the men off her! Oh, well, I do have some negligees by Tula of New York to lighten my life. Which is a roundabout way of getting to an idea that has been in my mind for some time: that the real test for any article of clothing is whether you still like it long after you have bought it. By this test, you'll be surprised to note, price tags don't mean a thing sometimes and Ohrbach's (just sometimes) can beat out Magnin's. Anyone who doesn't think of clothes in terms of long wear these days is either crazy or has fallen into a Texas hole in the ground and come up all covered with oil.

DON'T YOU GET TIRED of movie stars who complain about taxes? Well, lie back and relax . . . here's more of it. To live the way I have to live if I am going to continue to earn a livelihood in this business for my brood and myself is practically a rat race. It's not just a question of not being able to entertain, or keep up a wardrobe, or maintain myself in a style to which I wish I hadn't become accustomed now. I have to have someone to do the cooking when I am working so I have to have a cook. I must have someone to look after the children while the cook is watching her pots and I'm away at the studio, so I have to have a nurse. Letters must be answered if you are in public life, aside from the fact that I love to answer them anyway, and that means someone to help handle the correspondence. But how? You work and get a lot of money at the paymaster's window and then you must walk over and hand it to the man at the treasury department wicket. He counts it and gives you a look that says: "I don't know. I kind of expected more. What did you do with the rest?" My only answer could be, "Brother, I just lived. That's all. Just lived. I'm not a dime ahead and a hundred headaches behind!"

THE ABOVE WILL BE my only discussion on politics. I know that last month Jan Sterling said she thought a movie star is as entitled to say what she thinks about the Republicans or the Democrats as any ordinary citizen. Jan is right. But an ordinary citizen doesn't command the attention or criticism a movie star does . . . and who is there to prove that the latter knows any more abou it? When it comes to making faces at the camera maybe I can show you a trick or two. But when it comes to the art of government, well, I have four children I'm supposed to govern around my house and I'm still learning about that. What I think I have learned in that department is that you have to give a child a line to follow. You must show that you love him as you make him follow it . . . but follow it he must. This is in connection with the living you do together, the art of becoming a harmonious member of the family group. You do not attempt to take possession of their souls or their future. That belongs to them, to be decided by them . . . with your help, if called on, but not your influence. I insisted that the kids learn to swim (actually I didn't have to insist) but after they knew it was up to them whether they wanted to go swimming or not.

GETTING BACK TO TAXES for just a split second, even if I promised not to—I just remembered that once in my early heyday I threw a party for 722 people. Just imagine! I get sick thinking of it. I could feed the whole family and staff a hundred meals now on what that shindig cost, probably more. But . . . that was Crawford. Before that party there were times when I scrubbed floors. I might as well be honest—there are days now when I am back at it. You are walking through the house, everybody is busy, and there is a dirty floor. I don't know what dirty floors do to other women but they just STARE at me! I can remember women in my family saying they were old-fashioned—they liked to cook on coal stoves. I'm old-fashioned too, I like to cook with gas. When I get near an electric range I feel like the warden about to turn on the juice and execute the poor condemned. I guess that's why I like real logs in a real fireplace. I just can't imagine anything inspiring or romantic about one of those electric fireplaces that look like someone's Christmas tree fell over in it.

Nurse Margaret Kissack advises you on:

How to use a feminine syringe

"In my book mentioned below I have a number of suggestions about how and when to douche, sick care and feminine hygiene. One suggestion is that it's best to use a gravity-flow type of syringe as we do in the hospital, because its gentle action will not irritate delicate tissues. B. F. Goodrich syringes are available in several styles, regular fountain syringes, folding syringes and combination syringes. They all operate on the gravity-flow principle. The folding syringes are easy to use, and fold into a compact, water-proof travel kit that packs as easily as your toothbrush. All of these syringes have full 2 quart or more capacity."

a poodle dog. I put Cliquot, my poodle, on my head and studied the effect in the mirror. I'll take my poodle with four legs. I'll also take Sheila O'Brien as my clothes designer, and, for that matter, I am fashion and design consultant for Peter Pan foundations myself. I'll also take the train when it comes to traveling. Give me the Chief and Super-Chief and 20th Century Limited. You can jet. I won't fly. I'm frightened period. I hate fast driving. To make sure there is no fast driving I do the driving sometimes even when I'm out on a date. I learned on a Ford, now have and love my Cadillac. I think the greatest drivers in the world are New York cab drivers but not when they insist on talking to you. They're always leaning back with their face turned towards you while the car is shooting like a bullet in the other direction. Their talk's all right, but I'd rather keep quiet—and live.

A FAN ASKED ME the other day what kind of men I like. I thought about it and the answer was just men. I'd rather he not be handsome (also he shouldn't look like a grizzly) but the main requirements begin and end with his being a man. I think that more than his looks would be a character trait or two—for instance honesty. . . . The older I get, the more I've been around, the hungrier I am for the honest word. I'd rather hear something disagreeable from someone who means it than the greatest compliment in the world from someone who will say anything to please you. With the first you are at least not wasting your time. With the second, anything said, good or bad, is an insult. I can forgive such a person, but I'd much rather—and do—forget him!

WHEN DR. ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL invented the telephone he practically helped create a part of Joan Crawford. I'm on it from open eye to shut eye. I'm supposed to be the only player in Hollywood who can make up while speaking over the phone; that's the best part of having square shoulders—you can cradle on either side. I've talked over the phone while getting my hair touched up (you know I've always lightened it to get the proper highlight effect for the camera). I can knit, read the comics and smoke a cigarette all while on the telephone. I've even done a one-handed Lux job on some underthings and carried on with a long-distance call.

MY LIPSTICK IS MADE especially for me by Henri Bendel of New York and I carry it and the rest of my make-up in a Hopalong Cassidy pencil box for kids. Handiest thing I have. If you would like another contrast I am crazy about imported black caviar and find it almost as good as hot dogs at a beach picnic with the kids. And even if I do like Tula negligees (as I've said before) there is nothing like a long-sleeved, fingertip nightgown to sleep in. For some reason this reminds me that I once lost my shirt investing in a beach club. From now on when it comes to the beach I'll put my money in nothing more expensive than a beach umbrella. And any time I get an urge to buy anything I know just what to do—head for the five and ten!

EARLY THIS SPRING I asked a friend what was good for dishpan hands and she said, "Lunch at Romanoff's." I suppose dinner at La Rue's wouldn't hurt either. Another friend advised Ethyl gas. "To wash in?" I asked. "No, to get away from the kitchen," she replied.

ALL MY LIFE green has been my lucky color. The other day I found out that among racing drivers it is the hoodoo color. You'll never see a racing car painted green. Shall I do over my ultra-marine and white bathroom or let it go for another 500 laps the way it is?

IT'S BEEN YEARS since I haven't had to plot my day even as I awake in the morning. It's been years since I haven't listened to the radio on a Sunday. It's been years since I've worn slacks on the street, if I ever, which I didn't. It's been years since I had a real estate problem—20 years nearly since I bought the first house I ever owned, the one I'm still living in, the one I will never leave for another. It's been years since I decided that chewing gum is all right if that's the way you feel about it, just like jiggling your left foot when nervous in the presence of strangers. It's been years since I've had water to drink except between meals and then lots, since I could sit and do nothing, since I could sleep late, since I gave any thought to diet.

I THINK anyone who has thoughts of success must prepare themselves for it. I'm not sorry that I took French, music, singing, opera and studied Shakespeare with no chance to use any of it in my work. I'll take that back. In the picture I am now making, Sudden Fear, there is some Shakespeare. Yes, Crawford takes off on the old Bard for passages from Romeo and Juliet and Mid-Summer's Night Dream. Now there is TV ahead and I am going to get into it. I'm prepared in every way except the ability to get up in front of the mike. That's still a bugaboo, so my TV will be on film. But so will most of planned TV entertainment, I'm certain. I suppose I'll have to get up just as early, work just as hard . . . and keep just as little. But I wasn't going to talk about that any more!

THE WORLD DOES CHANGE, people think more about what's going on than ever before, yet so much is afoot that they know less. Psychiatrists are having their day and girls whose phones don't ring often enough to suit them are convinced it must be because they secretly hated their Aunt Mollie. Kids think anything you want of them is a gag and there is nothing serious until they don't get what they want, at which time it turns tragedy! Through all this I walk around the house carrying a bunch of keys that would weigh down a jailer. What have I got under lock and key? Nothing in particular, come to think of it. There is only one key that counts, no matter how the world changes, and that one opens up our lives for love. It is the key to the heart. I think I'll throw the others away.

Yours sincerely,

Joan Crawford

The publicist drew his hand slowly over his face in a slow burn. John couldn't be perfect, of course, he told himself. Here he was, handsome, talented, well-liked by everybody. He'd been given the Golden Apple by the Press Club last year in appreciation of his cooperation. But there was one trouble with John; he simply refused to tell anything but the truth, the whole truth, regardless of the glamorless impression it made.

John feels there is no reason for him to embroider his true qualities. When people ask him a straightforward question they get the same type of answer. Once, he was asked the approximate cost of producing a movie, and by the time he finished replying the reporter had the entire budget in his lap, down to the electricity bill and the cost of coffee on the set.

John is innately honest and never gives the quality a second thought. It isn't that he never lied. When he was a kid he sometimes ditched his homework and played hookey and alibied his way out of punishment. He used to crawl under the house to smoke and come out hours later, confident that the odor of tobacco had left him. His father, overwhelmed by the stench that had clung to John's clothing, would wait until after dinner to say casually to his son, "You don't smoke, do you?"

"No, sir."

"You ought to try it some time. Maybe you'd like it."

"I'm just not interested," John would fib.

But his honesty increased with age. In school he had a science teacher who, in John's estimation, was a double droop, not only lacking general intelligence but also knowledge about the subject he taught. John didn't like school and he didn't like teachers, and one day in science class the teacher began needling him. John stood it as long as he could, then announced in clarion tones, "You don't know any more about science than any one of the kids in this class." He was promptly expelled, but he'd spoken his mind—and maybe it was the truth.

JOHN is not timid. If he has a gripe he says so. When he was a private in the army, he was the natural victim of many a bully. He didn't object to an order to pick up a piece of paper, but if a sergeant began bellowing that Pvt. Derek was not picking up the piece of paper to his satisfaction, John would straighten up and look the man in the eye. "Why am I doing it wrong?" he wanted to know. "What improvement can you suggest?" Naturally, he spent a lot of time doing extra detail, and some of it was because officers, noncommissioned or otherwise, had been foolish enough to ask John's opinion on some matter. Even when it was a question that required a diplomatic answer, John wasn't diplomatic. He said he thought the policy was all wrong or that Ordinance was completely snafu, or the Lieutenant's belfry was full of bats.

John doesn't like to hurt people's feelings and avoids it whenever possible. If he meets a woman acquaintance whose new hat, in John's opinion, is for the birds, he refrains from any mention of it. But if she asks him how he likes it, she invariably wishes she hadn't.

In the same vein, he assiduously avoids asking people their opinion of his pictures or performances. If one or the other or both happened to be bad, John knows it only too well and doesn't want to force anyone into a tactful lie. One of the reasons he shuns Hollywood cocktail parties is because they're always filled with people anxious to gush over each other, and to lavish praise on any actor's latest picture. "Half the time they haven't even seen the picture," John says, "and you know it by the way they gurgle a compliment and then change the subject, afraid you'll ask them about some particular scene. It just seems to be standard practice to tell an actor you enjoyed his performance.

"Hollywood's a funny business, anyway," he continues. "There's a sort of double talk that goes on all the time."

John's conversation stays out of the slot reserved for movie stars, where a typical question-and-answer session would sound like this:

Question: Are you flabbergasted by the success of your career?

Actor: Oh, my word, yes! Sometimes I wake up in the middle of the night and have to pinch myself. There I am, lying between silken sheets in a room papered with Picassos, and it seems that only yesterday I was sleeping in freight cars!

John Derek's answer to the same question: "Gosh, no. I just wonder what's taking it so long to get better."

John knows, deep down, that his first break came only because of his looks. The majority of movie actors are signed to a contract on this basis, and studio bigwigs then offer up prayers that these actors will also have talent. The average actor assumes, once he is signed up, that he oozes with talent, or he wouldn't have been given a job. But John looks at it differently. He knows he's been given a chance at movies because of his face. He has no control over his looks, but he can gain control over his ability to act, so he pours all of his energies into the ambition.

He feels a strong urge to prove himself, and when making Saturday's Hero insisted on doing all the football scenes himself. The studio had hired Mickey McCardle, alumnus of the USC team to work as John's double, but John had other plans. Before the picture's start he spent just short of a month working out every day, and the men he worked with were professionals who didn't pull their punches. Before the actual picture was finished John had sustained a slight concussion and his face had been ripped open. Mickey McCardle had appeared in two shots, both of them long shots. Despite John's justifiable pride in having gone in as a rookie and suffered the bone-crushing scenes, he was completely truthful when strangers asked if a double had been used for him. "Yes," he said, and then told them about Mickey McCardle.

Recently he was asked if this had been wise, and it was pointed out to him that people hearing about McCardle would then take it for granted that the USC halfback had done every single one of the action scenes. "No," said John. "The way I look at it, they didn't believe I did the work before they asked me. And if I'd said no—I didn't have a double—they wouldn't have believed that, either."

JOHN has a sincere feeling that truth is recognized and appreciated by people. He feels this particularly when appearing on the stage during personal appearance tours. At first he was scared to death, and having little faith in the speech prepared for him, chucked the whole thing and began to talk with the audience. This went along great until he found himself all tangled up in one sentence that had already gone on for two whole minutes. He was genuinely confused and the audience knew it and went along with him. Months later, out on a second tour, he recalled the good reaction and thought he'd try the confused act this time. The audience met it with a deathlike silence, and suddenly John realized they knew he was bluffing. He never again tried to fool an audience.

Once he was told at the last minute that he was to speak to the Junior Chamber of Commerce in a small Pennsylvania town. In less than ten minutes he was plunked at the speakers' table in a great, cold room, and scores of men were sitting there, just looking at him. John stood for a long moment, wondering what on earth he should talk about. Then he threw up his hands in a helpless gesture. "Look," he said. "Individually you're probably nice guys, but as a group you scare me to death. I don't know anything about a Chamber of Commerce. I've never been a business man. What do you want me to talk about?" And the ice was broken.

Another time he was pushed onto the stage of a theater in St. Paul where a Red Feather drive was in progress. Many celebrities had already spoken, and all of them had been billed to appear at the benefit. John was thrown in at the last minute and felt it wasn't his audience. They hadn't come to see him.

"You know what?" he began. "You didn't expect to see me up here and I didn't expect to be here. I feel pretty silly. I'm staying at a hotel across the river in Minneapolis, and that's where I belong right now." He added a few words about the charity and bolted from the stage. He got as big a hand as anybody else, and he feels it was because he spoke the truth. "This is what I felt, and I knew I could say it."

He has gone even farther with audiences. More than once he's stood before a group of people who have been noisy and rude, and he has proceeded to tell them so. His frankness wouldn't have been appreciated by an individual, but collective audiences liked it. They knew they'd been rude and vulgar, and they admired a man who had the courage to tell them so.

He doesn't mind admitting when he's wrong, or when he is ignorant of a subject. John will follow a conversation to any point until he is stumped by a twisted meaning or an unfamiliar word, and then interrupts to ask for clarification.

His frankness has often lost him friendships even before they are made. He will tell people the truth for a reason he figures to be to their advantage, but some misunderstand his motives and back away. When a newly arrived actor is walking on air because he's certain of getting a role that John knows has already been decided for someone else, John will pat him on the back and say, "Don't build up your hopes. I don't think you're going to get the part." Or when a starlet's ambitions are bolstered by the fact that the director seems to think she has talent, John will inform her that the director's mind is not on her work.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

I was leaving a Glendale theater after a premiere, when the lady in front of me put her hand back and grabbed mine. As she turned around, I noticed it was Barbara Stanwyck. She had reached for Mary Livingstone's hand, and had gotten mine by mistake.

Mrs. Gordon Cheesman

He doesn't attempt to put up a front. He is on a strict budget, he drives a medium-priced car, and although his home is his only extravagance, the house itself is a small and unpretentious affair in comparison with the mansions bought by most movie stars.

John's entire wardrobe is restricted to one suit and a few pairs of slacks and he feels no necessity for building up a reputation of sartorial splendor. As a matter of fact, he has a small horror of interviews because he knows he's a Hollywood movie star and as such is expected to live up to it by adding gingerbread to the facts and inflating the truth. He can't bring himself to do it, and feels he continually disappoints the people who would prefer to have him a more fabulous character.

John needn't worry. He says he doesn't read much so it's probable that he's never seen the words of a wise philosopher who once wrote, "Truth is the secret of eloquence and virtue . . . it is the highest summit of art and of life." END rita tells all!

"I'm seven minutes late," she called cheerfully, "but I got stuck at the studio. I'm so sorry."

She swept little Yasmine up in her arms, kissed her, tickled her in the ribs and as the little girl squealed with laughter, took her out of the room and deposited her with a nurse.

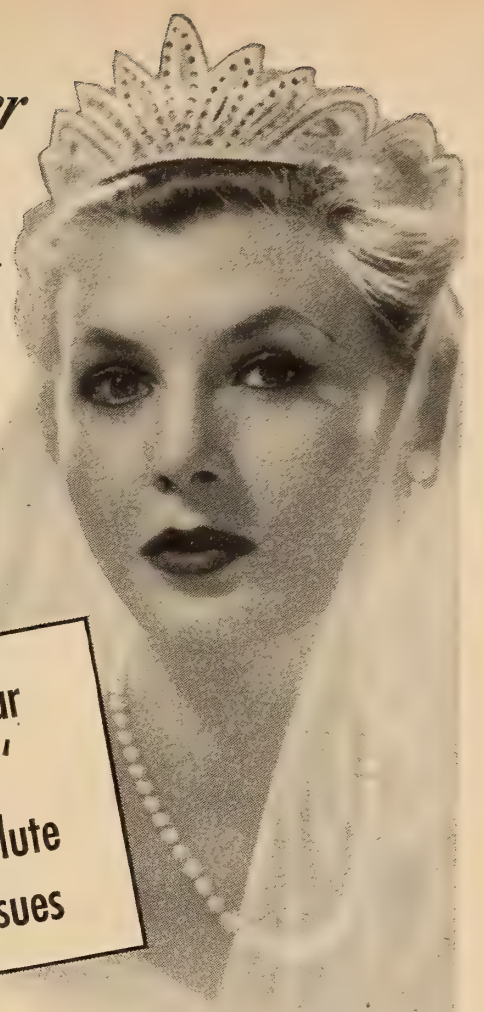
When she returned she explained that Rebecca (her eight-year-old daughter by Orson Welles), who normally would have welcomed me, was down with chicken-pox so she hadn't been able to do the "honors."

Rita sat down beside me on the divan. "It's good, Louella, so good to see you again."

Our hands clasped in that understanding which goes beyond words. And all the misunderstandings that had stood between us since her return to Hollywood cleared away in that quiet renewal of our friendship.

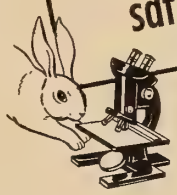
For the next two hours we talked. The fading light of day turned into darkness; and still we sat on the divan side by side, not even bothering to turn on the lamps. And the things she told me made me realize that once again I had Rita's confidence, and that she trusted me to tell her story.

RITA has been a miserably unhappy woman since she left Aly Khan, so unhappy that she has wanted to hide away, even from her friends. Although she had "sat out" the necessary six weeks in Nevada, preparatory step to a divorce, she could not bring herself to file suit then and there from this man she has loved so deeply. Perhaps she will always love him. But she cannot live with him.



I asked, "Rita, are you still in love with Aly?"

Without hesitation she replied, "The hurt is very deep way down inside me. I can't deny that. I had loved Aly so very much that leaving him was almost unbearable—but it is a step I knew I had to take."



"If you loved Aly so much why did you leave him so abruptly in Africa to fly back to Paris, pick up the children and then go to Reno for a divorce?" I asked.

Rita ran her fingers through her glamorous long hair. "It may have seemed like a sudden thing, Louella, but believe me

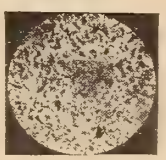
Read how spectacular "Rabbit Eye Tests" prove Zonite's absolute safety to body tissues

It's surprising how many educated women are uncertain about feminine hygiene. They know how necessary complete hygiene (including internal cleanliness) is for married happiness, health and deodorizing purposes. Yet they still worry about what antiseptic to put in their douche.

Older women, from bitter experience, have warned them (and rightfully so) about caustic and poisonous antiseptics. To what antiseptic, then, can a perplexed young wife turn with confidence that it is powerfully effective—yet not a poison—not harmful to use. A simple answer is—ZONITE.



Results of rabbit eye tests

The tissues and membranes of a rabbit's eye are unusually delicate (even more so than membranes in the vaginal tract). Laboratory tests show that ZONITE as used in the douche can be put into rabbits' eyes without the slightest irritation. No other popular brand of antiseptic for the douche similarly tested had ZONITE'S great safety. But ZONITE'S safe and non-irritating qualities are not based on rabbit eye tests alone but on clinical tests by a world-famous surgeon and scientist, and on actual use by thousands of enthusiastic women over a period of thirty years.

Always remember, no other type liquid antiseptic-germicide of all those tested for the douche is SO POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues as ZONITE.

Warns against 'kitchen makeshifts'

The modern well-informed woman no longer resorts to weak kitchen makeshifts for her douche. She only has to examine under a microscope (see slide) to see how laden with germs common ordinary 'vinegar' is, and she'd never want to use it again. Besides, such a crude product can never give her ZONITE'S great germ-killing and deodorizing action. The modern woman deserves a special product for this intimate purpose, and she has it in ZONITE.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE completely deodorizes. It cleanses and flushes away odor-causing waste substances and deposits. ZONITE helps prevent infection and kills every germ it reaches. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but you can be sure ZONITE kills every reachable germ. For best results follow directions.

it was not. A strain had been building up between us for six months based on the big and little things that made up the difference in our outlooks on life.

"Aly is a European brought up in that way of life. More than that—he is a Prince, brought up to rule millions of people, both as a head of state and a religious leader. He cannot be judged by the same standards of—say—an American husband. And yet, Aly is a very sweet person, completely charming—as you know. It was easy to love him. It is very hard to get him out of my heart."

One thing is for sure: Princes of India do not have the same code of marital conduct as American husbands. Their wives are set apart as bearing the dignity of their names and as being the mother of their children. But it does not keep them from enjoying the company of many other ladies—and no one is supposed to think anything of this. It is an "arrangement" which has been acceptable abroad for centuries—particularly in the upper social and cafe society sets.

Rita and Aly had been married only a few months when there were reports of his being seen here and there with various charmers—particularly a dancer of international notoriety. There was even a story that Aly had sent for the dancer while he and Rita were vacationing in Africa and that had been the straw that broke Rita's back.

In Aly's code it is possible to love one's wife and still be amused by the company of other women.

The gossip about any women in Aly's life—Rita refuses to discuss. She does say, "Perhaps I did not realize how completely American I am until I was brought face to face with the differences in our ways of life in almost everything.

"One big difference was, we did not like the same people. I would often say to Aly, 'Why do you have these hangers-on around you? They are not your real friends. They come just to drink and eat your food.' He would always laugh and say, 'They are not so bad. Just unfortunate.' Unfortunately, I did not share his tolerance."

I think what Rita was trying to say was, "These people are not my people, nor their ways my ways," to paraphrase the quotation.

"It is wrong for anyone to say or think that Aly was cruel to me. The temperament of his people is to be stoic and never show too much emotion. He never lost his temper with me even when my Spanish-Irish-English disposition flared up. Aly always treated me with consideration—after his fashion. He has a happy, carefree temperament."

I listened to detect the slightest hint of regret that she had left him in her voice.

"Is there any chance of a reconciliation, Rita, even though you have obtained a Nevada divorce?" I asked.

"That is not possible," she said definitely. "Not now."

"But Aly keeps telephoning you from all over the world, doesn't he?" I prodded, "and when his stepmother, the Princess Andree Aga Khan was here, didn't you talk with her about returning to Aly?"

"No," she shook her head. "The Princess Andree and I are very good friends. Remember, at the wedding in Cannes I told you how fond I am of her. Naturally, I saw her while she was visiting in Hollywood. But she was not an 'emissary' from the Aga or Aly to try to influence me against a divorce.

"Aly has called me many times on the telephone. He knows my decision is final. When we talk, it is usually about Yasmine and how she is growing and adjusting herself to her new life in America.

"And, also, I have called Aly several times since the serious illness of his father. I am very fond of the Aga and was distressed to read of his critical condition. I am still friendly with Aly and his family. It is better that way.

"I want Yasmine to always feel that her father loves her. I don't want her to feel neglected as Rebecca often has." (Rita told me that Orson Welles has never sent Rebecca even a Christmas card.)

"I feel I have so much to live for in my two little girls. I'm going to keep working hard to take care of them and give them the advantages they should have."

I then asked her the question that everyone has been gossiping about. "You say you are going to work hard to give them advantages, Rita. Is it true that during your marriage to Aly you spent all the money you had made as a movie star?"

"That's another subject difficult to explain," she said. "Aly was always extremely generous with me. He bought me beautiful, expensive clothes and gave me jewels. But, in his own right, he is not wealthy. He is dependent on what is given him by his father, the Aga Khan, and his allowance does not always cover his tastes.

"But it is absolutely untrue that he ever asked me to spend my own money. I don't know how such stories start.

"When I filed for divorce in Nevada I asked for no money from Aly for myself. I did ask for the support that Yasmine is entitled to. So far, he has contributed nothing to her care, so perhaps that is what they mean when they say I assumed all the financial obligations of our marriage."

"Rita," I asked, "what about religion? Haven't you promised to bring up Yasmine in the Moslem faith? And didn't you, yourself, become a Moslem when you married?"

She measured her words carefully before she replied, "Where Yasmine is concerned, I can see the point of view of the Aga Khan and Aly. After all, Aga is the head of the Moslem religion. It would be a bitter blow to him if his granddaughter were not brought up in his faith. But I want Yasmine to know of the Christian religion—and when she is older, she can decide for herself.

"As for me," Rita sighed, "religion is not just something with a name. It is something inside you that you carry all your life, no matter what outside influences come along. I have never forgotten my vows as a Catholic. The important thing about religion is not what the world may label you—but what you feel in your heart. I want to feel that I am right within my heart—and then no further explanation is needed.

"Many times within the past six months I have drawn deeply on my faith," she said with sincerity and dignity. "It has not been easy to take the bitter criticism directed against me.

"It has helped not to read some of the worst of it. I don't want to feel too hurt. I'm not even upset at the writer who printed some of the worst articles. I know that she has long been Aly's friend and the Aga's, too. I, personally, never read what she wrote; but people have told me some of the things she said. Well, I suppose she has to make a living."

This was certainly a switch. Most actresses usually bitterly lament anything uncomplimentary to themselves in print.

Suddenly, Rita laughed. "I didn't mind when you called me temperamental when I first started my picture Affair In Trinidad and had trouble. I wasn't trying to be difficult.

"I realized how terribly important it was to have a good picture as my comeback. When we reported to work and I found that the script was not even completed—I refused to continue. So I was put on suspension. The minute the screenplay was finished, and it was good, I went back to work.

"There never was any trouble between my director, Vincent Sherman, and myself. He is kind, patient and understanding—and I want very much to live up to what he expects of me.

"The trouble is," Rita laughed, "I'm not an actress! No, don't say anything just to be polite. I've never fooled myself that I became a movie star because my talents rival Bette Davis'. I'm a dancer and I'll always be a dancer and—that's it!"

"Oh, come now—" I protested. "Your next picture is Salome and you'll have to act as well as dance in this role. You're wrong, Rita, about your acting. Perhaps you aren't a Duse, but you are a good actress."

She smiled. "Thanks. But I'll always think of myself as a dancer who has had a lot of luck. I mean, luck in my career. Whether or not I'm lucky in my private life is open to argument.

"Three times I have failed in personal happiness. Three times I have been divorced. I can't help but think that some of this must be my fault. In some way I have failed—not only others, but myself.

"I'm in a stage now of trying to work out my future, sensibly and without romantics. I hope some time that I may know the joys of a real and happy marriage. But anything like that is very far in the future. I have to readjust myself to myself and to make a new life for Rita Hayworth—and her children."

Suddenly, she said, "Do you think the fans will be glad to have me back, Louella?"

Without hesitation I replied, "Yes, Rita. I think they will be glad to have you back as soon as they begin to know that you are the same sweet, unaffected person you were before you left to be a Princess. And I'm proud to be the one to tell them that our own Rita Hayworth is back with us again."

"Thank you, Louella. That makes me feel very happy. I want the fans to be glad I'm back because I know now that I really love my work and how much I have really missed it.

"What makes me very happy is that my two little girls are happy here in my town—and that they seem to know, as young as they are, that we three are closer than we've ever been.

"I want to tell you something kind of sweet: Last night I went in to say goodnight to Rebecca who has been so miserable with chickenpox and all that stuff on her little body to keep her from scratching. She took a look at me and said, 'Mama, you have magic eyes.' Then she said, 'Yasmine has magic eyes, too. They smile. Sometimes I have magic eyes, too—but not the way you and Yasmine do.'

"I just grabbed her up, goop and everything, and hugged her. I love her so much."

It was time to say goodbye—and it was my old friend Rita who walked with me to the door and put me in my car.

"When you write your story, Louella," she said in parting, "please do not hurt anyone I have discussed. I'm not angry and I am not bitter. I have made mistakes, but I hope I profit by them."

And I believe her. What mistakes Rita Hayworth has made in the past will not be repeated in the future. For the reckless glamor girl of yesterday has become a mature and philosophical woman who knows what she is doing and where she is going. END love secret liz never told

Of course, all is fair in love and war, and the several men who hoped that distance would not lend enchantment in Mr. Wilding's case, could hardly be blamed for their erratic behavior when a possible conquest of Liz' heart might be the prize. At first, Elizabeth was unaware of the plotting that went on, so secure was she in her new-found love. Telephone calls and flowers she happily ignored. And when they became too annoying, she simply took herself off to a quiet California resort, chaperoned by properly married and highly respectable friends. Here she felt safe and remote from adventuresome males.

This behind the scenes campaign to change Elizabeth's heart and mind would never have come to light at all, save for the fact that a very powerful business man wildly over-shot his mark. (You won't learn his name from me, for believe it or not journalists can be gallant, too.)

What happened was this: The man who hoped to make Elizabeth forget about Mike, through a cleverly planned and extravagant coup, appeared suddenly and casually on the scene of her little hide-away one day. Perhaps he had been fooled by the things he had read in the gossip columns, hinting that the Wilding romance was a mere flirtation. Perhaps, as well, he believed Liz' own and now famous misquotation about herself that she had "a child's mind in a woman's body."

At any rate, this legendary Beau Brummel completely under-estimated the honesty and loyal heart of the bride-to-be. When he charged into her life to press his suit, he did not know that Elizabeth was immediately alarmed. He did not know that she retired at once to her rooms to pack her bags in preparation for the now famous flight to London and her "dear Mike." Not that she was afraid that she might change her mind; she simply would not risk the creation of jet-propelled gossip which might sully the dignity of her love.

If this man had known about her telephone call to Mike Wilding at his Bruxton flat he might not have climaxed his unwelcome attentions as he did, knowing that Liz had arranged not to wait for Mike's return to Hollywood.

Instead, in a matter of hours, this mysterious man laid his very secret proposal at Elizabeth's feet. And this proposal was accompanied by a lapful of beautiful jewelry, the estimated value of which was more than 100,000 dollars! Now, almost any glamor girl might have promptly swooned, quickly recovered, and perhaps postponed her marriage in order to play the delicate game out.

Not Elizabeth Taylor! She was greatly distressed, for she respected the man, and despite his tactics did not doubt his sincerity. All she knew was that she must escape immediately to the charming, kind, elegant and relaxed Michael Wilding. Liz wasn't lured by fabulous diamonds. True, she has a small collection of jewels which she wears with almost bored abandon. True, she has a fairy tale mind that yearns for bright lights, dinner jackets and savoir-faire, but definitely not for explosive, complicated shenanigans.

Hollywood, and the Don Juans in it, have long under-estimated the intelligence and character of Elizabeth. And the story of the man who failed in his startling attempt to change Hollywood's love history, can now be happily forgotten.

I have told all this because people should know that Elizabeth's flight into marriage was not simply the whim of a girl who really didn't know her own mind.

While we are at it, the time has come to correct other false impressions, too, gossipy stories which spread rapidly following that simple ceremony at the Caxton Hall registry. The public circus which surrounded Elizabeth Wilding's wedding service was notable, not for the near riot by British fans, but for the complete lack of turmoil on the bride's part.

There were reports that Elizabeth and her husband were not entirely gracious with fans. However, it is impossible to be gracious to people who are displaying their own bad manners. The truth is that the honeymooning Wildings did not behave at all like a pair of important movie stars. After flying to France, they drove into Paris in an airline bus. They did not stay at the Hotel George V, scene of Liz' last unhappy honeymoon, but at the Plaza Athene in Avenue Montaigne, which is much nicer anyway, if not as elegant.

The restaurant there is one of the best any hotel in the world offers. Friday night after their arrival, they took a taxi, instead of renting a Cadillac as Liz had done on her last trip to Paris. They went to the Tour d'Argent which overlooks Notre Dame, and to which all celebrities must go. For dinner they had pressed duck, and theirs was number 227,181. (La Tour d'Argent, according to long standing tradition, gives each guest a card with the number of the dinner duck, and this has been cherished by brides for years.)

From there they took a taxi to the Chez Carrere, and ran into the trouble which caused the sort of gossip intelligent people must ignore. There were so many fans and photographers, that it was almost impossible to get inside. Fuming at the bad manners of those who would not let them alone, the bride and groom beat a hasty retreat back to their hotel where they were registered as Mr. and Mrs. Grubert of Bristol, England.

When they told their story to a friend, he laughed and said, "You didn't miss a thing. I think the show at Carrere's now is the worst in its history. But the customers at Carrere's missed plenty, Mrs. Wilding, because you are divinely beautiful."

And she was. She wore a ballet length full-skirted gown in black, with a plunging neckline, the bottom of which was fabulously jeweled, and in her white mink stole she looked almost angelic.

THEN, on Saturday morning the Wildings took a train—no special automobile or plane, just an old rickety train—and went off to Grenoble, about 350 miles from Paris. They were met by the proprieter of the Grand Hotel at L'Alpe d'Huez and driven another 36 miles to their honeymoon hostelry. Here they forgot all the hectic problems of the past few hours in a celebration which lasted until almost four A.M., after which they retired and did not re-appear until about two o'clock on Sunday afternoon, when they went for a walk along the snow laden roads.

At last they were alone, and although the curtain must drop briefly on their more intimate moments, I can tell you perhaps better than most, at this point, why Liz found Michael Wilding so much more attractive than the many men who sought to woo her. Liz was never mentally constructed to handle the heavy-handed Hollywood wolves, but she found great delight in this slim six-footer with his light blue eyes and brown hair. (Of which, incidentally, there is a lot more than gossips would have you believe.)

It was while both were house-guesting at the Stewart Grangers' that Liz' enchantment for the Britisher grew by leaps and bounds. It was Mike who slopped around the Bel-Air estate in casual English tweeds and loafers, and after late-until-morning gatherings in the Granger den, awoke at noon with ready quips and feeble attempts to mess up the kitchen for an imaginative breakfast. Afternoons, Mike planned casual drives along California's rugged coastline, alone with Liz, or bought tickets to the circus. Evenings there were all kinds of music, from the sublime to be-bop, interspersed with clever conversation and a lot of teasing between Mike and his best friend, Jimmy (Stewart) Granger. Liz enjoyed herself immensely, and fell head over heels in love.

There are those who've tried to classify Mike as a fortune hunter, which is not true. When questioned by an American friend as to whether he had saved any money in England, Mike cast a horrified glance towards the ceiling and admitted ruefully that he hadn't a bean. His London flat, elegant and compact, is run by an efficient secretary who has had to ride herd constantly to get all the bills paid. Mr. Wilding happily admits to a casual attitude toward high finance. This carefree attitude appeals to Liz. It equally enchants her to be squired in the Mayfair set of select London by Mike who looks the epitome of suave white-tie elegance as he commands the maitre d's with an air that most American glamor boys never quite achieve.

Elizabeth Taylor has many attributes, one of which is a lack of reverence for money. She cast a fortune aside, along with her first marriage, and the prospect of marrying into huge money again was something she refused to contemplate in exchange for the uncomplicated fun she'd be having as Mrs. Michael Wilding.

Besides, almost any minute now may come the news that MGM has renewed her contract, and stepped Liz's salary up from $2,500 to $5,000 a week!

And now that we know this honeymoon couple better, let's get back to them in Switzerland. Every morning their shutters opened about 10:30 and they had breakfast in their room—usually bacon and eggs. Then they sun-bathed on their balcony. After dressing, they strolled to the skating rink. They lunched about three, sometimes in the hotel, sometimes on their terrace. Mostly they dined alone in their room at night, sometimes they went down to dance. They opened a bottle of champagne to celebrate Liz's twentieth birthday.

Liz wanted to go skiing, but she is not permitted to learn by the terms of her contract, which can't use a star with a broken leg. Nor can Mike ski, either. His insurance company forbids it. So, as a substitute thrill they tackled the cable car railway to the mountain top, even though they couldn't ski down.

L'Alpe d'Huez is a very quiet and family-like place. People do not dress up in the evenings, which is proof of the fact that Liz did not have a "pajama and evening gown wardrobe with nothing much between," as some said. Being over 6,000 feet in the air, drenched in sun, it's possible to get a mid-winter sunburn in a hurry, and Liz certainly suffered one, momentarily ruining her bride's complexion.

Hereafter, I've made a vow not to pay much attention to what Liz is quoted as saying in the newspapers. One report from a British paper had Liz saying, "I thought we would have more privacy, and unless we get it, we are going to go somewhere where we can find it." This is ridiculous, because they were enjoying themselves at one of the world's most private places. To be any more private, they'd have had to go to the St. Bernard monastery, nearby, where the inhabitants are snowed in all winter.

The truth was that they were hardly bothered at all when they reached their honeymoon destination, here. They were asked to pose for pictures only once by two photographers. Liz talked willingly to them through an interpretor and made a big hit by her gracious behavior. No one spied on them at all, even when they spent an entire afternoon pulling each other around on a little sled, swooshing like mad over the bumps and inclines near the hotel.

As one French reporter said, "This is a honeymoon in which they scrupulously respect principle and tradition and remain quite to themselves." So you see, Liz' honeymoon, both here and in London, was very different from her first. Michael took her places the tourists never see. And Mrs. Michael enjoyed the whole, uncomplicated business, as she kept on pretending that she really wasn't grown up at all, but was a fairy princess being whisked through pink clouds.

As for Mr. Mike. He is very much all right, and on his honeymoon certainly indicated who wears the pants in his family. END

P.S. London, England: Liz and Mike were not due back in London until Tuesday, March fourth, but on Sunday, their good friends the Wilcoxes (who stood up with them at the wedding) got a wire from Elizabeth, asking when Michael had to be back.

Wilcox answered that they needn't rush, since he would shoot around Mike for the first few days of the movie Trent's Last Case in which he is starring. However, in spite of this reassurance, Liz and Mike suddenly turned up on the Wilcox set Monday, the third, with no warning.

Michael was unshaven, but he and Liz were extremely tan. She had put on quite a bit of weight and her poodle cut needed trimming. Both looked very healthy and happy and Liz said, "I'm not worried about the extra weight as I have plenty of time to knock it off before returning to my own work."

Mike went right to work and left Liz with the days on her hands. It became her practice to sleep quite late and then join him at the studio for lunch (which wasn't much after she began to diet). In the afternoon she shopped for herself and Mike. He elected to stay conservative, however, and wouldn't wear any of the gay things she bought him.

Evenings they went out to dinner and to night clubs, usually ending up at the Ambassador where she liked to stay and stay. They effected a compromise about late hours, for Mike had to be up early to work and he bluntly admitted that he needed rest to be as fresh as possible every morning.

Liz' youth and vibrant energy was a welcome relief on the set of Mike's picture. Austerity-ridden England seemed a gayer place. And though the Wildings' honeymoon-acquired tans faded quickly, no one can say the same of their honeymoon devotion. END

(Continued from page 36) down the other aisle. A man who was sitting behind me said, 'That's a girl who wants to come down both aisles at once.'"

"Exactly!" the first character said. "She does want to come down both aisles at once. She wants to be a great actress, and she wants to be a wife and mother. She wants everybody to love her. She wants everything—and you just can't have everything."

Somewhere in all this lies the truth about Shelley Winters. By the time you read this Shelley will be married to Italian actor Vittorio Gassman, unless something fantastically unexpected happens. She's so much in love it's popping out of her pores. "I love him more than anybody in the world," she says. "I love him more than I have ever loved anybody. He's a remarkable human being. He's so intelligent, and he has a sense of humor. When he was in New York, a reporter asked him, 'When you get married, who's going to be boss in the family?' And Vittorio answered, 'Such a question would never occur to an Italian.'"

But more about Shelley and Vittorio later. Now let's go way back in Shelley's past and find out what makes her tick.

Of her very earliest memory, she says, "It was awful." She was about two years old she thinks, and her family was moving from one house to another in St. Louis where she was born. The moving men had already taken the big furniture and Shelley's father had piled the rest in their old flivver. "He wanted me to get in the car," Shelley says, "to take me to the new house. I think that's how it was. It's all hazy. But he wanted me to get in the car with all the things. I refused. The family was in a hurry; you know what it's like on moving day. And I suppose he wanted to teach me a lesson about obedience. Anyhow he drove away. Only a couple of blocks. He didn't mean to leave me, but I didn't know that. He drove away with our things, and I was standing there alone . . . Well, that's all I remember. They came back of course. I was in hysterics, but I don't remember that. My mother told me about that. I just remember him driving away with our things."

Her first memory was of rejection, a terrible rejection for a small child, although her father was unaware of it. Interestingly enough since her first memory was connected with possessions she is delighted to tell you now, "Vittorio doesn't believe in having too many possessions. He says you have to take care of them."

SHELLEY always longed to be accepted. She wanted the other kids to like her. "But they didn't," she recalls, "or at least I thought they didn't. And that's just as bad. You see, I wasn't pretty and I didn't conform. I wanted to be accepted but I didn't know how to be."

It was during her senior year in junior high in Brooklyn that she went out for a part in a school play. This was staged by the honor society who voted on the kids to include. In order to get in you had to have high grades. "I got good marks all right," Shelley says, "but I guess I was too aggresive. Anyhow, the kids voted against me for the play. I said I didn't care, but I cried for two whole days and I felt as if everybody was trying to do me in. So I swore revenge."

She formed her own dramatic society with the help of her mother and a couple of sympathetic teachers, and she wrote a musical, produced and acted in it at the school. Afterwards, the kids who had voted against her congratulated her and told her they were sorry about the other show. They explained that there were 30 nominations for the honor society and only ten could be chosen, so they had to vote against somebody. Now she says, "I guess that was right. But, you see, I took it personal."

Shelley always takes it personal.

When, after her success in pictures, she was lambasted by the press for being too boisterous, too argumentative, and for going around town in old beat-up slacks, she "fretted and carried on." Nowadays, criticism doesn't bother her so much. "I finally decided," she explains, "that I can't be honest with myself and true to everybody else, too. When you have definite opinions the way I do you're sure going to offend somebody. It used to be that I couldn't bear it if people didn't like me. But I just have to get used to the fact that not everybody will like me."

When Shelley signed her first contract with Columbia, everybody told her she'd have to make herself over. She made herself over, and nothing happened. In her own words, "I stank."

She is extremely nervous but she believes, "This nervousness is one of my assets. I have a great deal of energy, and interference drives me nuts." That's why some directors are annoyed by her. If she thinks a scene is wrong she says so at the top of her voice. But give her a director she trusts—someone like George Stevens or George Cukor—and, as she says, "I'll stand on my head and make faces with my feet!"

On Broadway Shelley fought and scratched for jobs. She was idle much more than she worked. A friend who knew her then says, "Shelley had to listen to everybody else talk for so long that when she finally got in the position where she could talk she decided not to stop."

Although she wants desperately to be a fine actress, she becomes annoyed with being a movie star because: "You can't eat, you're always watching your diet, and you're supposed to be dressed up all the time."

Shelley feels she has a bigger obligation to herself than is expressed by fancy clothes. For example, when Albenezi and Tagliavini were singing La Boheme in Los Angeles for one night only Shelley was working. She finished just in time to make it to the auditorium. So she rubbed off her screen makeup, threw on the old slacks in which she'd arrived at the studio that morning. All the other opera lovers had diamonds in their hair and Shelley was blasted by the columnists. "But," she says, "La Boheme was wonderful."

Vittorio, however, won't let her wear slacks. And when she left the house the other day without lipstick he asked why. She said, "I've got a million things to do so why should I waste time putting on lipstick?"

But Vittorio had her come back into the house and pretty up.

ONE of Shelley's endearing qualities is that she "sells" everyone she likes. Because she was so eager for people to like her, she wants everyone to like the people she likes. But sometimes she oversells until you want to say, "Oh, come off it, Shelley. No one can be that good."

Now, of course, there's only Vittorio. Shelley can't do enough for him. She'll corner a friend and ask, "Will you come hear him do a recital at The Players Ring? He reads Italian poems, and his voice is wonderful. He's a great artist. He speaks the lines, but it's like singing. And I wish you would do a story about him, not about me, just about Vittorio. The way he studies! Every day he takes an English lesson and he speaks it fine now. When I say the few Italian words I know he answers in English. He's working in a picture for United Artists now. It's a good picture. It's called The Glass Wall."

If you don't stop her, she'll tell you the plot.

"I'm going to work at our marriage night and day," she says. "Make it the most important thing in my life. I married young and it didn't work out. Vittorio married at 19, and it was over before I met him. So we know about that. We know that marriage isn't that romantic, never-never land that so many people think it is. It's really taking care of each other and protecting each other. It's having a person to lean on.

"He won't take me out to some glamorous place every night. I'll be lucky if he takes me out once a week. And TV fascinates him. He thinks even the commercials are screams. For such an artistic man isn't that funny? They don't have TV in Italy."

In Italy, according to Shelley, "Having dinner is the big thing. You eat slowly, not rushed like here. And you sit and talk and talk and listen to music. Or you go to the theater. Vittorio can't get used to how fast everything moves here. Rush, rush, rush. But you know what? I can get used to how nice and slow everything moves in Italy."

You can understand why a girl like Shelley, who has pushed so hard, who, "wants to come down two aisles at once," should find Italy her spiritual home. She had to sit around Walgreen's—which is Broadway's Schwab's—listening to the other kids talk about their jobs. She was wretchedly poor. She was told that she was neither pretty nor glamorous. When she finally got a job she was Ado Annie in the umteenth road company of Oklahoma! It is not distinguished to be the last of the Ado Annies. Then came walk-ons and bits in movies, and Shelley felt that time was running out for her. She was afraid she wouldn't have the big screen career, that she'd be a failure.

Now, she is intensely loyal to old friends, and does wonderful things for people she likes. She's always good for a touch, remembering, as she does, the days when she wasn't eating so well herself. Sometimes she fights so hard for her friends she defeats herself. There was the young actor she thought was talented. She had no romantic interest in him whatsoever, but he was a good actor, and he needed a job. So Shelley beat on the doors of the mighty so hard that one man said, "What's with Shelley and this guy? Is he paying her an agent's commission or something?"

She is the original heart-of-gold kid. She hears a couple of makeup girls discussing a play they would like to see, and the next day Shelley gives them the tickets for it. A man in an obscure little shop makes a lamp for her. To the next ten people she meets she says, "You've got to go to my little man for a lamp."

Since she was so eager to play Born Yesterday, and since she and Judy Holliday do the same kind of work you'd think she'd be jealous of Judy. But Shelley loves her. "Judy Holliday is terrific. Such polish. Such finish," she says.

Shelley is not a phony; there is nothing devious about her. She doesn't know how to be devious. If she's mad you know it. If she's glad—oh, boy, you know it! And if she's in love . . . she lights up the sky.

How are she and Vittorio going to work out their living arrangements? She says, "Vittorio hated New York. It was too hectic for him. But he loves California because it's quiet and peaceful, and he loves the people. So we will have my apartment here and one in Rome. We haven't any set plans like six months here, six months there. Vittorio has commitments in Italy. It's so funny; they don't understand that here. When he's talking to a producer and explains this they think he's just trying to get more money. And he's so funny when he's talking about a deal and they offer him a certain amount of money. He's got to work it out in lira counting under the desk on his fingers. Anyhow we'll spend part of our time in Italy and part in California."

Yes, Shelley wants everything. To be a wife, to be a mother, to be an artist.

When she first saw A Place In The Sun she thought she was terrible. "All I could see was how beautiful Elizabeth Taylor was." But after she had seen it several times Shelley made the famous remark about the performance getting better. She did like herself in Phone Call From A Stranger. It's hard for her to discuss Behave Yourself. "I was confused," she says. "I'd look at the rushes and think they were fine, and then I saw the picture and it didn't come off, and neither did I. But I thought Farley gave a very good performance."

Shelley is confused because so much gratuitous advice has been given to her. Suspicious by nature, she accepts advice only if she feels you are for her. When she first came to Universal the publicity woman assigned to her had the feeling that Shelley was on guard. Every time Shelley was told to pose a certain way or wear a certain dress, she'd ask, "Why?" The publicity woman would explain. After a series of what is known in the trade as "seductive art," the press agent suggested that they do a couple of shots of Shelley in a simple white blouse with a black bow at the neck. "Why," asked Shelley. "Because," it was explained, "this is sometimes the way you are."

Shelley thought that over and strung along with it. "After I'd answered her 'whys' enough times," says the press agent, "she realized I had her best interests at heart, and from then on she always trusted me."

Once, while lunching with a friend in New York, Shelley was reading a letter she'd just received from Vittorio. She looked up to see a reporter who had been razzing her in his column. He had accused her of falling in and out of love too often. "I'll show him this letter," she said. "I'll show him what Vittorio thinks about love. Then he'll know why I'm in love." Her friend tried to stop her, but trying to stop Shelley is like trying to hold back the sea. She quoted from the letter to the reporter. Maybe this was right to do, maybe it was wrong, but it was Shelley. You either admire this kind of forthrightness, or you condemn it.

For all her seeming bohemianism, Shelley has a strangely conventional streak in her nature. When she and Farley went to Europe together she insisted that a married couple go with them, not only as traveling companions but as chaperones. And when, shortly after she met Vittorio, a reporter asked if they were engaged she demanded indignantly, "How can we be? He's not even divorced yet." Having established herself as a brash kid it is interesting that she should fall back on the security of convention.

And so we have Shelley complete as of this moment. Ask the girl herself what she's really like, and she'll tell you honestly, "I think I'm a nice girl. Because I'm natural."

She says it with childish naiveté, because in a way, she is like a child, with young enthusiasms and young insecurities, with dreams of having the world, and fears of getting nothing. That's Shelley. That's why she's sensational! END the merry wives of hollywood (oh, yeah?)

(See Shelley Winters now in Universal's Untamed.—Ed.)

One night not long ago, Bill and Rena Lundigan walked out of the Mocambo in wonderful spirits. They'd had a swell evening together celebrating the completion of his last picture. Some fans saw Bill and crowded in. Others joined them and the mob got thicker. Suddenly Rena realized that she was having to fight to keep her place next to him. Eventually, she found herself pushed up against the building with Bill some distance away amidst a mob of kids. Rena has had this happen before, but just the same it is hard to get used to.

SUPPOSE you are Betty Lanza. You glory in your husband's popularity. Even when you go to the premieres of his pictures, particularly one like The Great Caruso, and the girls outside all scream, "Oh, Mario! Be my love!" you take it in stride. They want him but you've got him. Yet, it wouldn't be normal if you didn't feel just a little uneasy about the emotional storm he can create in feminine hearts.

Sometimes the threat is not so indefinite. Take the time another Betty, Macdonald Carey's Betty, bore the brunt of it. The two were walking along Sunset Boulevard after he had returned from location in New Mexico for Cave Of Outlaws, when a young redheaded thing, a little too exposed, waltzed up and began talking to him endearingly.

"Mac, darling!" she cried. "Why haven't you phoned me? Remember all the fun we had while we were both on location?"

As a family unit the Careys are as solid as a rock and Betty, wise to the ways of Hollywood, was quick to recognize a preposterous attempt on the young girl's part to gain publicity by prying herself into a scandal. So Betty stood by while Mac talked to the girl politely, and then they went on without even discussing the incident. But you can count on your fingers the number of other Hollywood couples who could sail through that without ugly suspicion being aroused.

There are other critical aspects of her position to keep a star's wife alert. She must guard against accepting privileges when she trades. Privileges have strings attached, and it is her husband who will fall the victim. The least that happens is that a star's wife gets special treatment when she shops—and finds that she has to pay for it up to double the ordinary price.

At all times she has to withstand close scrutiny herself. Even though her husband is in the limelight she is going to be stared at—sometimes impudently. She will meet woman after woman who will speak warm words but tear her down bit by bit with derogatory looks. And to meet such charmers, she will find, is part of her social obligations. She may think that the wife of the man who is going to direct her husband's next picture is a horrible bore but she dare not indicate it.

One star's wife, who obviously cannot be named, classed this—the number of objectionable people she had to meet—as the greatest cross of her life. But there were other unpleasant features she was able to list. "You can't live casually, take a stroll or walk to the movies without being gaped at. And darn it, you're never quite sure how much the attention your husband gets is a nuisance to him and how much he actually covets it! After all, he is not a painter or a poet or a soldier—he is a male personality and that brings you to the dreaded word, sex! He's supposed to knock women off their pins when they see him. Now—where do I come in, raising a fuss about it?"

While it is true that the hazards of marriage in Hollywood are cushioned by material comforts—rich property settlements, high alimony—a heartache in silk and a heartache in cotton are still plain heartache.

There is a dark-haired girl in Hollywood who probably often recalls how much she was envied by the nurses at the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital when her third baby was born there. The nurses would coo to the infant out in the hall before they'd bring it in to her.

Then they'd compliment her. "You have the prettiest little girl ever born in the hospital. Your husband must be terribly proud of you both."

This was only a few years ago. The baby was named Christina. The mother's name was Nancy Sinatra.

It is little comfort to live in sumptuous halls when they echo coldly to your footsteps. And finding yourself apart from your husband for long stretches of time is practically the rule for the wife of a star.

A little more than a year ago a tall, attractive woman was talking dejectedly to a traveling companion aboard a plane bound for Mexico City from Caracas, Venezuela. She said she felt like someone badly fooled.

"If only he and I could have gone somewhere away from telephones or telegraphs —it would have been wonderful. Think of it, for four years he planned this vacation, our first chance to be alone, and then he left me right there in the middle of it!"

"He" was John Wayne. The woman was his wife, Esperanza, whom he affectionately calls Chata—when he is around to talk to her at all. He is around now, at this writing, because they have reconciled after a separation that followed the interrupted trip. John had no intention of breaking up the vacation. He had eagerly laid out the whole itinerary to match a similar Caribbean tour he had read about in an old copy of the National Geographic Magazine. He chartered a two-motored plane which had every facility in it including a galley and refrigerator.

It was the plane that failed them first. "It makes dandy ice cubes but it don't fly so good," John reported to his associates back in Hollywood. Then John failed. He spent more time talking business than he did vacationing. And before the trip was over he got a wire from John Ford and had to take off suddenly for Ireland and his next picture, The Quiet Man. Chat, "lucky" Chata, came home alone. And this is the story behind the story of why she left him some months later.

THE most sensational Hollywood success in the past few years is that of Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, but there are days —too many days, when neither Jeanie Martin nor Patti Lewis feel like cheering about it. Dean and Jerry are naturally in great demand for personal appearances and nightclub engagements all over the country. Jeanie, with one-year-old Dean Paul, Jr., to take care of, and Patti with six-year-old Gary and two-year-old Ronnie, usually stay home.

One evening, with the boys off on tour, the girls went to a formal dinner party thrown by Alan and Sue Ladd. Their escort, the boys' agent, Henry Wilson. And Jeanie, not yet married three years, couldn't help but bemoan the constant separations.

"Actually, by the calendar," she complained, "Dean has been gone from me oftener than he has been with me.

The comment of Patti was indirect but none the less poignant. "I always used to wonder what it would be like to be married to a sailor," she said. "Now I know."

Of course there is nothing to prevent a wife from accompanying her husband on personal appearance tours—nothing, that is, if she has no children or other obligations at home, and the studio doesn't frown on the idea, but most stars' wives soon learn they might just as well stay home. On tour their husbands are less private individuals than they are back in Hollywood.

The last time Jessica Ryan went along with her Robert was to the San Francisco premiere of The Set-Up. For three days he posed for pictures, gave out interviews and made personal appearances during which time Jessica had the choice of sitting alone in her room or taking a walk alone. There was one press luncheon which she attended, only to find that between her and Robert sat 14 other people.

Jessica never had ideas of marrying a sailor but she did give thought occasionally to what married life with a doctor would be like. She feared that he would always be out on visits. Now there are times when she plays around with the idea of getting Robert to switch to medicine. "At least he'd have to come home to fill the hypodermic needle once in a while," she points out.

THE wife Hollywood probably knows least about is Mrs. Howard Keel. Helen Keel is petite, blonde, and just now expecting her second child. When Howard was hitting big in The Small Voice and Annie Get Your Gun, his newly-acquired fans would have gotten the surprise of their lives had they seen Helen's unglamorous circumstances. She was the mistress of a tiny, prefabricated house, smaller, less pretentious than the average home of the ordinary craftsman in any American town. It stood next to a big, dusty lot in an unfashionable section of West Los Angeles, and was no more than a little compact box divided off into two bedrooms (one hardly more than a cubicle), a small living room, bath and kitchen. Every time a car went by outside the whole structure shook. Every time it rained the house was sure to get muddy because the only approach to it was a dirt path.

The Keels have since moved to a much nicer place, but Helen will never remember her introduction to Hollywood as an exciting one. And she likes to go out and enjoy life. The other night she went to a Bel-Air affair with Howard and with the aid of a clever costume, a silver lamé Mandarin coat over black silk trousers, was able to disguise the fact that she is shortly to be a mother again. Yet the tipoff to the kind of marriage Helen is going to lead as a star's wife has long been evident to those who know them. She will be part of his private life only—the public is to see and hear as little of her as they do of Greta Peck, Dolores Hope or Dixie Lee Crosby.

These last three prefer it that way, of course. Greta will never forget that an ordinary automobile accident suddenly became a front page calamity as soon as it was learned that she was the wife of Gregory Peck. A quiet woman with no desire to share the spotlight thrown on Gregory, she wants nothing more than to be able to live her life quietly in the rambling hilltop house he built for her and their three little boys.

Gregory Peck, John Wayne, Mario Lanza, Burt Lancaster, Bill Lundigan . . . all fine actors. But it is questionable whether they ever have roles as difficult as the ones their wives play . . . every day of their lives. END

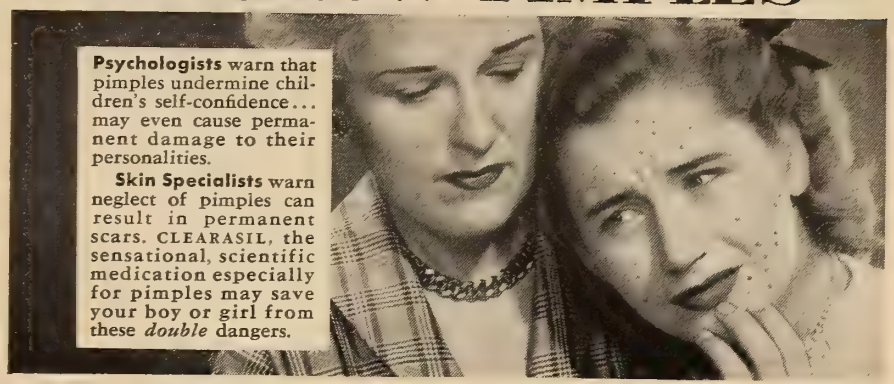
With the motors still roaring in his ears, Howard grabbed a quick sandwich, and without even time to go home and say hello to his wife, Helen, and little girl, Kaiya, he plunged into rehearsals, then sang the Lux Radio Theater version of Showboat with its arduous score.

After the program the producer tendered him an extravagant compliment. "Howard," he said, "you were great—never better in your life. Frankly, after the beating you took I don't see how the devil you did it."

Keel scowled uncomfortably. "I guess the Good Lord just takes care of drunks and broken down bassos," he said, escaping fast.

Of course, Howard Keel is no drunk and certainly not any broken down basso, as anyone who's been going to movies lately and isn't stone deaf will know. Moreover, with all due deference to Providence, Howard is well able to take care of himself. But the incident and the remark is typical of an independent, rugged individualist who asks no quarter and gives none, and who is acutely allergic to any kind of praise, or anything which faintly resembles what he grinningly brands "hokum."



It wasn't very long ago that Howard was parked in the swank Beverly Hills Hotel at the galloping rate of $18 a day, which he could afford like nothing at all. In fact he was not too well-heeled and but for his relaxed attitude might have resembled any other undiscovered actor who hadn't hit the jackpot. In a way, this was all unnecessary because—except for a slight moral principle involved—he could have been staying there with all expenses paid and a nice, fat salary besides.

Howard was waiting for his contract to start at MGM. He could have had that contract a year earlier with the red carpet rolled out. Only then he'd have had to go back on his word, and that didn't set right with him. At that point he'd promised the English producer who gave him his first movie job to make two more pictures. He had no contract of any sort or anything in writing—only his promise. He knew he could breeze away to his big Hollywood break with no legal trouble whatever. Instead he said, "No—sorry, I'm tied up," and watched it go glimmering.

It was only when these two pictures were called off that he sailed back to New York, got in touch with MGM and told them frankly that he was out of a job and ready to sign if they were. They said they'd see. And when they finally saw Howard Keel for Annie Get Your Gun, they didn't see him for nothing. He got everything he wanted.

A holdout when you're hungry calls for plenty of moxie, but Howard Keel owns his share of that. His story is laced with guts all along. He had a rugged road to ramble before he ever clicked in this singing and acting business. He got his ears knocked down and while he worked hard, he made mistakes. He was cocky sometimes, he let his temper get out of control when things didn't suit him. He learned. But also he didn't forget. He never forgot that he was a two-legged man, just as good as the next guy. Yet, it's when he's rated a superman that Howard snorts "hokum" most angrily. And of course by now that's what happens right along.

On his recent South American jaunt, for instance, Howard ran smack into the kind of swoon thing that Frank Sinatra used to get up here in the States. This wild worship tortured him no end but he rallied happily. One night, 25 senoritas stormed into his hotel. He gave them all autographs, but they didn't budge. He kissed each and every one, but that didn't satisfy either. Finally he asked the local official what he could do.

"Senor Keel" said that worthy. "They say they want to marry you!"

"Holy cow!" cried Howard. "All 25?"

That was the night Howard and Kathryn Grayson sang at a theater in Rio de Janiero where the stage was bandbox size, with no stage entrance or even wings. Between numbers they had to sit on a small settee right back of the mike. Every time Howard got up, the audience did. When he sat down the whole house sat down. When he smiled, they smiled back, when he bowed they bowed. There was no escape, and no let up to the devoted imitations. Finally he got really upset. "Isn't there some way we can get out of here?" he whispered to Kathryn. "I'm going nuts. Why, they're acting like we're royalty!"

This is no overgrown false modesty that pesters Howard Keel. It's simply that he levels down on himself as he does with the rest of the world. Nobody can tell him he's right when he thinks he's wrong, or vice versa. He's no sorehead, in fact normally there isn't a wider piano smile in Hollywood than Howard's. But it can turn grim in a wink when once he gets a notion that things aren't what they should be.

Most people, including his studio bosses, thought that Howard Keel did his best work in Showboat. Most people enjoyed it and his singing hugely. Anyone would say a man had a right to be proud of himself after singing the Gaylord Ravenal role in that. Was Howard proud—even pleased? He hated himself and the job he did. He still does. He won't go see it. Ridiculous? Maybe curious? The guy is simply honest with himself—a rare quality in Hollywood.

Naturally, he went to the premiere; MGM talked him into that. But unfortunately he had seen the picture at the studio before. So that gala night, in the dark of the Egyptian Theater, Howard Keel slid down in his seat, closed his eyes and when he thought no one was looking clamped his hands over his ears. "I tried to go to sleep," he confesses. "I didn't because I couldn't, but I tried." And why? "Because, I'd made some lousy mistakes in those recordings," he'll tell you. "I'd already heard 'em and I didn't like 'em and I didn't want to hear them again." Nobody else felt that way and perhaps even Howard couldn't tell you what was "lousy" about them. But to him they were—period.

"I learned long ago not to tell Howard he's good," sighs Kathryn Grayson, who has sung with him not only on tour, but in both Showboat and his latest Lovely To Look At. "He'd never believe me unless he thought so himself and I might just make him mad. But he is good, you know, whether he'll admit it or not."

Not long ago, during Lovely To Look At a publicity girl at Metro who's one of his best friends made the mistake of asking Howard how he was coming along. "Get lost, girl," barked Keel. "Don't mess with me. I'll bite your head off. I've just done the worst job in history with those songs. Go away. Beat it. Leave me alone."

Just the same she talked him into lunch with her, and although the conversation was pretty one-sided, she finally calmed him down to civility. Then the producer strolled by the table and fanned the embers again. "I hear the records you made are swell, Howard," he offered innocently. Keel blew up, stopped eating and prepared to dash out of the place when the man stopped him.

"We think they're swell, but if you don't like them," he said, "of course, all you have to do is make them over again." Howard almost choked.

"Well, I'll be . . ." he gasped, "I never dreamed the studio would stand the expense." So he did the recordings he thought were "lousy" over on his own time. He's that much of a perfectionist!

Some of the funniest moments Howard has endured since he came to Hollywood ganged up on him in a dance scene he was supposed to do in Showboat. Dancing is not Keel's forte. He thuds around on Number 12½-D gunboats, and most feminine partners reach about to his belt when he's dragged into the light fantastic. This was to be a merry waltz with Kathryn Grayson—and to put it mildly, the idea was disastrous.

Keel tried, heaven knows, for 35 "takes". All of one day and part of another. He could waltz, after a fashion, in one direction. But he couldn't turn around and go the other way. After Kathryn faced exhaustion trying to steer him they brought in a male dance instructor to teach him that simple maneuver. Dancing ignominiously with another man, Howard only got more confused and embarrassed. It was finally filmed, but Gene Kelly didn't lie awake nights with envy. In fact, after all of this hilarious monkey business, they cut the whole thing out.

Probably the personal low spot in Howard's career occurred when he opened with Oklahoma in England, back in 1948. He'd toured the States with that show as "Curley," and for months he'd doffed his hat after "Oh, What A Beautiful Morning" to let his own naturally straight hair tumble out. Nobody in America seemed to mind this incongruity, but the British, his director assured him, were fussy about details like that. The only thing to do, he advised, was to get a permanent wave. It took a lot of stormy persuasion but finally Howard agreed to the transformation. "Okay," he grudged, "but

That afternoon he sneaked guiltily in the back door of a London beauty shop and in a few minutes, was wired up like the back of a TV set, the current cooking his lanky mop into an artistic arrangement of ringlets and curls. When he sneaked out again, scowling like a mugg from Limehouse, "I looked," Howard still growls to remember, "like a blankety-blank-blank poodle!" When he went on stage the next night in Manchester, Howard was a tonsorial treat, so much so that next morning the critics spent all their superlatives on his coiffure and none on his voice. Oklahoma, rhapsodized one, "certainly has the most beautiful hero!" That did it. From then on, Howard wouldn't even take off his hat in the show until the ringlets smoothed out again, and you won't find those review clippings in his scrapbook today. He ripped them to shreds the minute he read them.

Howard Keel has mellowed somewhat since those first clashes with the artificialities of show business. He's adapted—but not very much. The truth is, there is no native exhibitionism in Howard Keel's nature, nor his heritage. Basically, Howard is a living example of the old saying that "you can take the boy out of the country, but you can't take the country out of the boy." To understand him you have to know the kind of people he sprang from and what he was before his suddenly discovered magnificent voice plunged him into a world of make-believe.

Howard Keel's folks were plain, salt-of-the-earth people, who worked with their hands. His grandmother traveled to the plains of Illinois in a wagon. His dad was a coal miner, but before that he sailed for four years aboard the flagship Tennessee in Teddy Roosevelt's Great White Fleet.

Howard Keel himself stood on his own oversize feet for a good many years before he ever saw Hollywood fame. From the start he was the kind of a kid who could handle his own affairs, and preferred to.

Once, in his early teens, Howard bagged the family Lizzie for the first time to see a girl he had in Staunton, an Illinois town near Gillespie. Flushed with his first solo turn at the wheel, he raced her around town, cutting corners on two wheels. After he'd finally dropped his date off home, he continued the exuberant spree, unfortunately right down Main Street. When he heard a siren he cut out for home. But they caught him, of course, and said it would be eight dollars—or jail. The two bucks he had for the big evening were long gone and Harry was broke. "You'd better call your folks," the cops counselled. "Nossir," said Harry, "I'll go to jail," which is just where he went. The police called Gillespie anyway and sometime in the early morning his family came down and bailed him out. He thought he'd catch it for sure, but nobody said a word. Harry went to work and paid back the eight dollars.

THERE's another little episode picked out of Howard's untold past that might give a slant on the way his straight shooting mind works, and what happens if you cross it up. It happened down in Fallbrook, California, where the Keels came from Illinois when Howard's father died. Howard was quite a fighter then. He went in big for amateur ring bouts at high school and the CCC camps. He'd won two matches in an elimination tournament when he was pitted against a close friend he chased around with. "Look," his pal approached him before the scrap, "you'll take me easy, so let's take it easy, huh?"

his chum threw him a haymaker square in the mouth and he almost went down. He thought it must have been a wild swing—but soon he knew it wasn't. In a minute he was back on the ropes beneath a vicious attack that left little doubt as to what went on. His friend was tricking him into a knockout. Furious, Howard waded in and the referee stopped the fight. But the episode sickened and soured him. He never pulled on a glove after that. Maybe that's why he's a slow friend to make and standoffish today.

There's just one more—and maybe this one explains why today with Howard Keel "it's got to be good," why he's his own severest critic. He had a good job at North American Aircraft and one day he quit it. He'd found he could sing and in the first flush of that glorious discovery he grandly told everybody what he was going to do. "To hear me talk," he'll scowl wryly today, "I was going to be the sensation of the nation." Well, he wasn't. The first singing lessons he took didn't take, he found the road ahead was long and rough. He got some piddling song spots, singing waiters and such, and he quit them in disgust and in temper. Then he was broke and he had to have a real job again. But he wouldn't go back to the place he'd left where the job he needed was waiting. He'd popped off and he was ashamed. He went to another plant where he didn't know anybody. And he never popped off again. Not even when later on, he had a right to. Not even now.

By now, Howard Keel's formative days are over. He's in his thirties, a settled family man and not mad at anybody—as long as they don't tread on his toes—and he yields practically no opportunity for that. The new Brentwood house where Howard and his pretty blonde wife Helen live with Kaiya and their boxer pup, Mouka, is Keel's castle. Photographers have never been inside it and, Howard declares, never will.

This self-imposed isolation has made Howard somewhat of a mystery man in Hollywood, heightened by the fact that outside of Kathryn Grayson and Louis Calhern, the Keels have practically no close Hollywood friends. They never go night clubbing, and even when he shows up at a Hollywood grande affaire Howard has a maddening way of appearing and then suddenly disappearing into thin air—which for one of his substance and stature is a fairly neat feat.

Occasionally, Howard relaxes, if you can call it that, at golf, sometimes with a foursome including Vic Mature, Davy Wayne and Lex Barker. But while he's whittled his score down into the seventies, the process remains painful. Seeking perfection at that exacting sport sometimes mesmerizes Howard so that he forgets he's playing a game. "If he starts slicing," says Vic Mature, "he'll take every bloody ball in his bag and bang it out of bounds until he hits one straight. Sometimes, we just leave him there digging up the fairway, go on and catch him the next time around."

It's really at that carefully guarded home of his that Howard Keel lets down and lives. He sleeps in a specially built, over-long bed from which his toes still dangle. He eats anything that tastes good and personally barbecues "one devil of a steak." He collects his friends around him—his closest are three old buddies from the aircraft plant days—feeds and drinks them well (he can't drink himself, he's allergic to alcohol). Then they sit around until all hours chewing the fat, dreaming about a South Sea sailing trip, spinning Howard's endless collection of records. He has a little workshop out in back where he dawdles making this and that for the house because it relaxes him to work with his hands.

It's not an exciting home picture, but Howard Keel doesn't want it exciting. At home he just wants peace, comfort and his family. That group will be adding up to four about the time you read this, because two-year-old Kaiya's expecting a brother or sister any minute. If he can have at least two more children Howard Keel thinks he'd be happy, and if and when they arrive, he'll have at least five people in this world who can boss him around. Because currently a couple of blondes in Brentwood, California, are the only two who can tell Howard Keel just what to do and make it stick. One of them is his wife, the other is his daughter. END people might say she's in love

Some of the people who hint that romance has come to Debbie at last don't know what they're talking about, of course, but others certainly should. The other night, for instance, out in Burbank where Debbie lives, her dad, Ray Reynolds, addressed a remark to his wife, Maxene.

"I don't know about Sis," he puzzled, "what do you think? Looks like she's got herself a steady boy friend."

Debbie kept right on eating as if she hadn't heard. Her mother said, "Now, Ray—" but that didn't stop him.

"Well, you know," he continued teasing, "Sis was never much for the fellows but now—uh—" and he gave her a look.

"Daddy," said Debbie, "do you think it'll rain?"

And at approximately the same time over on Stone Canyon Drive in Bel-Air another observing father was holding a similar discusssion with his wife. He said, "How do you figure R. J., Chet? Looks to me like the boy's gone, don't you think?"

"S-h-h-h, Dude," protested Mrs. Wagner, "you know that's not true—"

"I don't know," Mr. Wagner raised his voice, "he's never been this hog-tied before. Wonder what's cooking?" Then he heard the front door slam and chuckled. "There he goes now. Not going away mad, I hope," he added.

Bob wasn't mad, but he was in a hurry. It's a haul from Bel-Air to Burbank, and if there's one thing he knows Debbie hates its a date who's late. He got there on time that night, even ten minutes early, and they went to a show. That happens these days pretty regularly, at least two or three times a week, with lunches in between. Then there are dance dates at the Palladium and sometimes when Debbie feels like getting "all jazzed up in an outfit" they even take in Mocambo. On free afternoons she's teaching Bob to jitterbug or else meeting him at the Bel-Air club after golf for dinner. And sometimes on weekends there's a trip up to the mountains or down to the beach with their gang.

And you can bet all this hasn't gone unobserved in Hollywood, where merely one public appearance of two attractive unattached young stars is good for an engagement rumor, and two weeks of steady dating can have them practically married and settled down. In fact, during the past few weeks, there's been so much Debbie Reynolds-Bob Wagner romantic smoke that it seemed high time to me to poke around to see if I could find a fire. And in a situation like that there is only one thing for a reporter to do with a straight talking girl like Debbie Reynolds: ask her. So I called her up.

"Is it true, Debbie," I said, "that you and Bob Wagner are the greatest romance since Romeo and Juliet, or is it not?"

"I could hit you in the head," replied Debbie. "You kill me." But she said she'd answer any reasonable questions with true talk and I knew she would. So I met her over at Bob's house that afternoon and we went into the matter.

"R. J." as Debbie calls him, is a big athletic six-footer as handsome as they come, and he cracks a grin that's absolutely devastating. You can't miss it when you see With A Song In My Heart. "R. J. simply just broke me right up with that grin," she sighed. "Why, when I first saw him I said, 'There's a crazy cat.' "

The way Debbie told it, she was over at Fox visiting her friend Camille Williams, who was dancing there, and they were just coming out of that huge rehearsal hall heading for casting, miles away, when this boy rolled up in his car and yelled, "Hey, can I give you a lift?" Well, it was better than walking in the hot sun and Camille said she knew the character, so they hopped in and the minute Bob opened his mouth, well, he just killed her. "I didn't get to say a thing," Debbie recalled. "I just laughed. Just shook my sides."

Sarong: A dish towel that made good. Dorothy Lamour as quoted by Irving Hoffman in The Hollywood Reporter.

That was about two years ago, when Debbie first came to Metro, and for three months absolutely nothing happened. But then one night the phone rang and it was this boy but she couldn't remember him until he talked on and on and then she did. But she was a little sore that it had taken that long so she gave him a real hard time. "Oh yes, I remember you," she said finally, "what do you want?" He said he had two tickets to Little Boy Blue and he wanted to take her.

"It sounds very nice," she told him coolly, "but I can't. I'm beat. My hair's straight and I haven't a thing to wear."

"That's perfect," she got back. "I'm practically at death's door myself and the moths have riddled my best suit. Tell you what, I'll go by Utter-McKinley's, pick up a hearse and be right over." So before she knew it she was laughing and saying okay and then slipping into her purple formal and brushing off the white cape.

WELL, what followed, as Debbie recalls, was "just one of those nights, one of those fabulous flights." At the show they ran into Rory and Lita Calhoun and Janet Leigh and Arthur Loew and a mess of kids. So they went on to Mocambo, the Kings, the Savoy and the Sphinx, talked on the air with the disc jockeys, wound up at Rory's singing and dancing, and in general had themselves a ball. And since then there have been big nights and little nights, but scattered over months and months. It hasn't been anything near a "gruesome twosome" with Bob and Debbie until very lately, and it's not strictly exclusive even now. Debbie has scads of beaux and always has—Craig Hill, Dick Anderson, Stumpy Brown, Bobby Van—not to mention the college boys who take her out now and then. As for Bob, he's no Johnny One-Note either, as Barbara Lawrence, Susan Zanuck, Barbara Darrow and Mary Marshall, to name a few, can testify.

"They call him the Beau of Bel-Air," kidded Debbie.

"She's the Belle of Burbank," Bob parried. But never has Debbie teamed up so often with one date, before. And neither has Bob.

Debbie and Bob really got solidly acquainted taking in Hollywood premieres together. But soon Debbie had to rocket off on those long personal appearance tours of hers and Bob traveled away on locations. Then last summer Debbie had a "christening" for her new swimming pool in the back yard, and invited all her new Hollywood friends, including R. J. Wagner.

"But I was the busy hostess," said Debbie, "and of course he got there late and wouldn't go in swimming. So we didn't say much more than 'hello'."

"I was coming down from Arrowhead, I'd been water-skiing all day and I didn't want to get wet again. Besides I was late for dinner at home," explained Bob.

Anyway, things really didn't pick up again until one weekend last winter when Debbie went to Lake Arrowhead for some picture layouts in the snow, along with Barbara Ruick, Dawn Adams, Dick Anderson and some other kids. She was strapped up on skis for the first time in her life, and was too terrified to even move, when this hearty character loomed up out of nowhere, yelled, "Hiyah Debbie" in her ear and gave her a playful shove.

"She fell for me that time," grinned Bob.

"You knocked me down, you mean," said Debbie, "right on my seat. So I had to get even."

How Debbie got even was inviting Bob to dinner. "As long as you've crashed the party," she told him, "you might as well eat. Leave everything to me."

Debbie went to work in the cabin that night over some stuff she called "goulash" for want of a better name. It was a collection of just about everything lying around including spaghetti, but to tell the sad truth, she couldn't even cook that. Everything came up raw. "I took one bite and excused myself," Debbie remembered. "Dick and Dawn took a few polite mouthfuls and had cramps all night. But this Wagner—he cleaned up his plate and said it was wonderful. 'What a liar!' I told him."

BUT she really felt bad about it, and was so impressed with his gallantry so she told him she'd make it up with a dinner in town. Bob's been having quite a few of these at Debbie's house ever since, when she isn't having them at his—or at least some place together—and that's how all these romance rumors got going at last. Well, what about them? True or false? You ask Debbie Reynolds a question and she tells you.

"Why, no," she said honestly. "It's no romance with Bob and me. We're not even going steady. I don't believe in going steady, not for me. I'm too independent. It's just the way I'm made, I can't help it. And R. J.'s the same way. We both feel exactly the same way about this. Why, can you imagine me telling any boy not to go with another girl—or any boy saying 'no other guys' to me? What a thing! Look," said Debbie, warming up to the subject. "I was just 20 years old on April First. R. J.'s only 22. We're too young for anything exclusive. Both of us are just starting careers. Wouldn't it be too ridiculous to get all tied up? Why, we've never even considered it. It hasn't come up. I'll tell you what we do have though—and it's pretty hard to find in this town—that's relaxed companionship. If we feel like it we go out and have fun. If we don't, we don't and nobody gets mad."

Bob backed her up there. "That's what's so great about Debbie," he said. "No tricks. No act. No grand production."

"And you know what's nice about R. J.?" put in Debbie. "He's considerate. He understands. A lot of boys in this business don't understand. They think you're indestructible."

The other afternoon, related Debbie, she was tapping and sliding all around an MGM stage in a rugged number with Bobby Van for Skirts Ahoy. She had a date with R. J. that night, and he spent a few hours watching her rehearse. It exhausted him! When she finished she told him she'd go change her dress, and be right back.

"But," marveled Debbie, "you know what he said? He said, 'That's off. You're all beat. You go home and hit the rack. Goodbye, now!' Why, I almost collapsed. Most men would have made it an issue. They'd have yelled, 'Hey, what do you mean standing me up?' even if I was on the verge of collapse.

"That's one thing that gets me hacked, but really upset," frowned Bob Wagner. "The way Debbie knocks herself out. The other night she had a fever of 102. . ."

"It was 103, I had the flu," said Debbie, "and all I did was answer the phone. R. J. checking up to see if I was staying in bed. He called five times. 'What on earth's the matter?' my mother finally asked. 'Why, he's mad,' I told her. 'He doesn't trust me'."

"I can't," argued Bob. "Look what you did. You got up with the fever and went to a benefit, maybe six benefits. Somebody hands her a script even if she's ready for an oxygen tent," complained Bob, "and she says 'sure'! I don't want a corpse on my hands, do I?"

There are several things, Bob and Debbie admitted, that get them hacked about each other. Debbie can't stand to have anyone spend money on her, and that upsets R. J. She's so independent that unless the gifts are gags they embarrass her. "Flowers for instance," she says. "I don't dig flowers at all." The only gifts she's let Bob give her are two fuzzy monkey dolls that hang from her chandelier. "The greatest monkeys ever," said Debbie. "They're our kids, just darling." But she quickly paid him back with a corncob pipe and a beer mug on his last birthday.

They make an argument too, now and then, because he likes her hair long and loose and she likes it tight and she likes his short and he likes it long. She gets very nervous when he drives and he gets hacked when she tells him how to go—and then, of course, there's the trouble Debbie has with all her dates, about being on time. The worst experience she ever had was with a certain boy friend—not Bob—who was always late. She warned him, and one night when he rolled in tardy at Burbank he found her backing out the drive on her way to a girl friend's house. "I got lost," he pleaded, but since he'd been to Debbie's house many times before Deb didn't go for that. "Then get lost again," she came back. Well, Bob was a little bad that way but he's reformed.

But the main thing that gets her stirred is when she starts arguing and Bob drowns her out with his fast double-talk jabber. Whatever the issue is, Wagner has a way of smothering the whole thing by rattling, "Okay, swell, fine, now, all right then, girlie, see you later, never mind, nice to know you, good-bye Sam. . ." and so on and on until, well, "I could hit him right in the head," confessed Debbie.

As a matter of fact, those little tugs of war are what make things interesting when two spirited people like Debbie and Bob Wagner get together. But underneath them, I suspected there is genuine admiration on both sides. So when Debbie excused herself for a phone call I asked Bob, "What is it you really like about Debbie?"

"That's easy," he said. "Everything. First of all she's a terrif personality and she's always herself. She's the ideal date."

Then when Debbie came back and Bob had to answer the doorbell, I put the same one to her. I said, "Debbie, what really sends you about this R. J.?" "Why, I thought I told you," she said. "I think he's just wonderful, the greatest guy ever. Everybody does. He's not just a comic character, you know. R. J.'s a serious young actor, he's got brains and talent and he's so sensitive. He's got looks, he's got everything, he's going places. Why, he can even dance. You know how most boys have rhythm in their heads but it doesn't reach their feet? Well, Bob's got the message. We're working up a soft shoe routine right now," she revealed, "to entertain the soldiers, and I'd like to make a picture with him, too."

So I thought I'd try the $64 question and I asked her right out, "What about love then, engagement and marriage?"

I've got to hand it to that Reynolds. She didn't turn a hair or bat an eye. "Why sure," said Debbie, "I'm planning on it someday. When I fall in love, then I'll get married. But I don't think I'll fall in love—boom—like that. I'll have to know a person for a good long time; with me it'll have to grow. You know," Debbie cocked her dainty head and looked pensively out the window, "you go with a person, you like him, he's a nice guy, so you fall in love and you get serious, you get romantic. Well—you can get carried away . . .

"To tell you the truth," Debbie levelled it down. "Right now I'm in love with my work. Does that sound corny? Well, I really am. I wasn't at first but now, I couldn't live without it. It's got in my blood. Right now I've got everything I want. Why, look—a car, a pool, new clothes, some money in the bank. I never thought in my whole life I'd have all that. And so—that's enough for awhile.

"I won't get married when I'm 20, maybe when I'm 23. By that time this career will be going strong—or it won't be going at all. Either way, by then I can do what I want to do. But you can't have everything, not all at once. You've got to pay a little price for the good things you get," she philosophized, "and I guess keeping out of romance is mine. Of course, you never know what will happen to you."

That's when Bob came back in the room and naturally he had to ask, "What have you got figured out?"

"That you're coming to dinner at my house," said Debbie.

"Oh, let's go out—"

"It's expensive. I don't want to get dressed. I'll call mom, tell her to get something good. . ."

"Why don't we just eat here, then?"

"No—"

"Yes—"

"Look here, now, R. J.—"

"Okay, swell, then it's all settled, thank you very much," jabbered Wagner, "never mind, keep the change, that's a date, call me tomorrow, good-bye Sam. . . ."

"You see?" pleaded Debbie. "You see—oh, whatta you gonna do?"

I really have no idea, myself. That's Debbie's problem, and Bob Wagner's, too. But from where I sit it looks like it ought to be great fun working it out. In fact, a lot of guys and gals I know around Hollywood would stand in line for the job. Being Bob Wagner's best girl friend looks like very nice work and Debbie Reynolds has it—and vice versa with Bob. The only trouble is, if they keep it up much longer people may say they're in love. END

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. I understand that Danny Thomas once studied to become a rabbi. What made him change his mind?
—B. Y., Toledo, Ohio

A. Thomas was born and is a practicing Roman Catholic.

Q. How much older than Travis Kleefeld is Jane Wyman?
—S. E., San Francisco, Cal.

A. Ten years.

Q. If Robert Taylor dislikes publicity so much, how come he has a publicity agent? —T. Y., Ames, Iowa

A. He considers it a professional necessity.

Q. Is it true that Jane Russell runs an appliance store in Hollywood when she isn't working in pictures? What happened to that little English boy she brought over to America?
—R. R., Dallas, Texas

A. Her husband, Bob Waterfield, runs the appliance store. The Waterfields plan to adopt the little boy.

Q. I understand that Peter Lawford is the best-liked actor on the Metro lot. Is this true? —C. F., Elkton, Md.

A. He is well-liked, but so are many other MGM players.

Q. I read recently that Farley Granger has become very high-hat and is refusing to pose for movie magazines. Is this true and if so, why?
—N. U., Akron, Ohio

A. Just a passing phase with Farley.

Q. Is the Lamas-Turner romance a buildup to publicize their picture, Merry Widow, or is it the real thing?
—V. H., Hurley, Neb.

A. It started out as a publicity gimmick but developed into a full-fledged romance.

Q. How many times has Alan Ladd's wife been married?
—E. P., Pawtucket, R. I.

A. Three times.

Q. Is it true that Glenn Ford is a big gambler and that this gambling is the cause of many quarrels between him and Eleanor Powell, his wife?
—S. W., Chicago, Ill.

A. Ford likes a sociable game of poker about one night a week, a desire his wife never quarrels about.

Q. Is Kirk Douglas only romancing with Gene Tierney as he did with Irene Wrightsman, or will Kirk and Gene end up at the altar?
Y. T., Ellenville, N. Y.

A. For both parties this is merely a happy interlude.

Q. What happened to the blazing affair between Greg Bautzer and Jane Wyman? —B. S., Tulsa, Okla.

A. When Ginger Rogers returned to Hollywood after her New York play closed, Greg Bautzer returned to her.

Q. How come the Bill Holdens, who have been married only ten years, have a 13-year-old daughter?
—E. W., Frankfort, Ky.

A. The daughter is Mrs. Holden's by a previous marriage.

Q. Don't movie stars get a raise every year? Why has Shelley Winters been earning $1,000 a week for the past two years? —N. Y., Baltimore, Md.

A. She has been suspended several times, the suspension periods are added to the length of time her various salary brackets are in effect.

Q. I read that during his 30 years as an actor Spencer Tracy has gone without work only two weeks. Is this true or just bunk?—L. S., Alhambra, Cal.

A. True.

Q. Is it true that Loretta Young and Irene Dunne are worth millions in real estate? —V. A., Richmond, Va.

A. Not millions but a healthy sum.

Q. Hasn't Gene Kelly refused to star

JUDY GARLAND'S HOMECOMING IS THE HOLLYWOOD PARTY OF THE YEAR . . . SHELLEY AND VITTORIO FINALLY

Louella Parsons was among the first to congratulate Judy the night of her triumphant opening at the Civic Auditorium. Wyne Rocamoro looks on.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

COLORFUL, unpredictable Shelley Winters and Vittorio Gassman went and "dood" it—and Shell is now, ecstatically, Mrs. Vittorio Gassman.

Some wag said—if they abbreviate her last name as they do her first, she'll now be Shell Gas (please excuse!).

Although Shelley's romance with the fine Italian actor seems to have inspired a lot of kidding from the start, take it from me, they are very much in love.

No agent getting 10% of an actor's salary could have plugged as hard as Shelley did to make Hollywood realize what a really great actor her "love" is.

He proved her point to perfection when he gave a series of readings at a little theatre in Hollywood and even the local critics did a swoon.

When he was tested, and later signed at MGM, the boss, Dore Schary himself, told me that Gassman's talent is terrific.

They had expected to be married in the

MAKE IT . . . WILL WE BE CALLING HER LANA LAMAS SOON? . . . "I'LL NEVER MARRY AGAIN," SAYS KING GABLE

An ecstatic Judy holds hands with Sid Luft, her manager and fiance, and the man who was largely responsible for her successful comeback.

Joan Crawford is a by-stander as Judy receives congratulations from one of many excited admirers. It was a night for Judy to remember.

The turnout of stars for the event was second only to that for the Academy Awards. Here, Van Johnson gives her a congratulatory kiss.

Mervyn LeRoy, who directed one of Judy's biggest hits, The Wizard Of Oz, hugs the star at the Romanoff party after the show.

summer. But when Gassman was on the verge of departing for New York to make The Glass Wall, Shell made up her mind that they would marry before and not after that movie. And when Shell makes up her mind—wild horses can't change it.

They flew to Juarez where they were temporarily delayed awaiting the arrival of Gassman's final divorce papers from Rome.

The enchanted bride has even learned to cook spaghetti and all the other dishes in real Italian style just to keep her man happy.

I'VE NEVER seen an audience take a star into its arms and hearts and seem to just hug her as the blase Hollywooders did Judy Garland at her hometown opening!

If Judy had any fears about coming home—it didn't take a split second to change her mind. Yes, it was as big a night—or bigger—than her New York vaudeville debut.

It was a glowing Judy, dressed in red velvet, ermine wrap and with tiny red bows in her hair who walked into Romanoff's after her performance to be greeted by the greatest gathering of stars I've seen in many a day.

Again, as Judy slipped into the big private dining room on the arm of Sid Luft, everyone stood and cheered her. Joan Crawford gave her a big hug, so did Esther Williams, June Allyson and countless others who were so glad that Judy is back looking so well—and feeling so wonderful again.

Jane Wyman, at our table, in white lace, danced and danced with Travis Kleefeld. What goes with these two? I've never seen two people more in love—broken engagement notwithstanding.

The Humphrey Bogarts were among the first on their feet to applaud Judy when she arrived. Also applauding were Gracie Allen and George Burns, Claire Trevor, Eleanor Parker and Bert Friedlob, Jean Simmons, and little Mona Freeman (I thought she looked very unhappy).

Previously, at the theatre, I had seen the big brass—Jack Warner, Frances and Sam Goldwyn and the Harry Cohns. Ethel Barrymore, who sat in back of me, cried when Judy sang "Somewhere Over the Rainbow."

And when Judy said, so sincerely, "I've missed all of you—Oh, well—why go on?" It was just one great big dewy sentimental evening from start to finish.

I WAS THE first to tell Joan Bennett long distance that Walter Wanger had been sentenced to four months in the Los Angeles Country jail for shooting Jennings Lang.

Joan's first reaction (she was rehearsing on the stage in Chicago for Bell, Book And Candle) was a sharp gasp, of relief at the short sentence. Then she asked me if the term began immediately. When I replied that the sentence would not start until June 4th, she said:

"Thank heavens. Walter, then, will be free long enough to be with our little Stephanie who is in school there. By the time he has

Jean Simmons was among the thrilled spectators at Judy's opening. Here, she greets Leo Genn as Eleanor Parker looks on. Rumor has it that Jeannie's marriage to Stewart Granger is rocky—they say she wants to live in England, he wants to stay in Hollywood.

A bevy of beauties it would be hard to beat in any town, even glamorous Hollywood, link arms as they wait for their escorts to the party that followed at Romanoff's. From left to right, the glamorous three are Mona Freeman, Jane Wyman and Joan Crawford.

to go—away—she will be out of school and can come here with me."

It's typical of Joan, who is a mother before anything else, that her first thought would be for one of her children.

SO COMPLETELY friendly—not to say chummy—was the surprise separation of Mona Freeman and Pat Nearney that they drove to her press agent's office together in Mona's coupe and walked in hand-in-hand.

Pat stood with his arm around Mona as she said to Helen Ferguson, "Yes—tell Louella that it is true about us. Pat and I are divorcing."

Frankly, I couldn't have been more surprised that the story was true. I had checked with Helen Ferguson (Mona's press agent) on the rumor of trouble between the Nearneys merely as a reflex motion. We columnists get many "tips" about Hollywood couples and I fully expected this to be another false alarm.

Mona and Pat always seemed so happy together. They adore their little four-year-old daughter. They were considered one of the best looking and most attractive couples in Hollywood.

What happened?

Neither is talking other than Mona's statement, "I am miserably sorry that Pat and I have not been able to solve our problems in private. A divorce is the only solution."

Some of their friends say that they married too young—Mona was 19 and Pat 25.

Anyway, it must have been Mona who wanted her freedom because she is now looking for an apartment and Pat remains in their home.

THE first Hollywood actress to greet Queen Juliana was Lana Turner. Lana was exactly like a little girl when she slipped in, a bit late, to the luncheon MGM gave for the Queen on one of the big sound stages.

"Oh, I have just had the most wonderful experience," Lana bent down to whisper in my ear as she passed our table, "The Queen wanted to freshen up—powder her nose, you know—and she used my dressing room. I was so thrilled I gave her all my flowers." Lana had just started her new picture the day before and so her dressing room was filled with lovely flowers.

The Queen completely delighted us all with her charm and friendliness. Before she is a Queen, she is a fine and sincere human being.

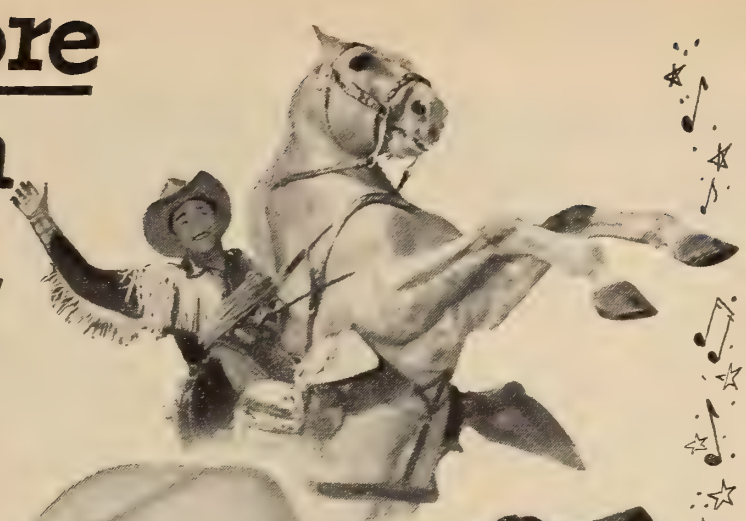
My favorite story of Her Majesty's visit took place at the only private party she and Prince Bernard attended during their three days in Los Angeles—a dinner at the home of the Louis B. Mayers.

Lorena Mayer presented Juliana with an evening bag which was wrapped up in beautiful papers and ribbons.

Very carefully, the Queen untied the gift without tearing the paper or cutting the ribbons. Just like many good housewives, she is a "paper saver."

"We don't have such lovely wrappings as these in Holland," she explained. "I want to show my friends."

FERNANDO LAMAS told me, "Lana Turner and I are very much in love. We will be married as soon as we are both free!"



And, so endeth the idea which many people had that this romance was just a publicity build-up for The Merry Widow. No matter how it started, it has developed into the real thing.

Lamas also said, "The only thing holding up my divorce is that I am insisting on having my child with me a reasonable amount of time. My wife wishes to live in South America so it must be agreed that I may have the baby with me in Hollywood at least part of the time."

As this is written, Lana still hasn't reached a financial settlement with Bob Topping so she has a divorce delay, too.

THE Post Office Department is back of Marilyn Maxwell's punchy slogan, "While They're Fighting—Are You Writing?"

How about YOU?

I have received a lot of mail from our boys in Korea expressing the keenest disappointment that some favorite star has not answered a request for a note or a photograph.

No person—star or not—is important enough to ignore mail from these homesick men who are giving so much for so little.

WHO'S WOOING: Peter Lawford with the lady he most admires, Mrs. Gary Cooper, a frequent date around the nightclubs.

French Jean Pierre Aumont is plenty intrigued with German Hildegarde Neff, the gal with those wicked, smoky eyes.

Monica Lewis sings softly to Liam O'Brien when they're at a cozy table for two—and she's just the girl who can do it.

Vera-Ellen closes her eyes when she dances with musician Don Reid. So does Liz Taylor when she dances with Mike, the Magnificent.

Ann Miller never puts on make-up in public when she's dating Bill O'Connor because he can't stand it. But he doesn't mind holding hands across the table.

When Carleton Carpenter's with a honey too young to be served a cocktail, he drinks milk, too, which is darned thoughtful of him, and good for him.

Gary Cooper always sends flowers after he's dated a belle thanking her for "the lovely evening."

Debbie Reynolds kicks her shoes off after she's seated in a cafe and always has to scuffle under the table for them when Bob Wagner, her steady escort, wants to dance.

CHAT-CHAT:

Talk about friendly break-ups, Jane Wyman gave Travis Kleefeld black star sapphire cuff links and he gave her a huge black star sapphire ring AFTER they broke their engagement!

Rory Calhoun and Lita Baron are on the Stork's calling list.

Maureen Reagan, daughter of Jane Wyman and Ronnie Reagan, is growing so fast. She's five-feet-six-inches already and she's only 12. When she gets some shape on those bones she's going to be a beauty.

Marilyn Monroe carries around a book, "The Thinking Body," which, presumably, she reads. When she was threatened with her second attack of appendicitis somebody pasted over the title, "The ACHING Body"!

Judy Garland had her "good luck" dress (the one she opened in at the Palace) copied in exactly the same color and material for her adored little Liza.

Hasn't Doris Day become a little temperamental since she married Marty Melcher?

I just can't believe that Bob Mitchum is serious talking about retiring. We all get tired and need a rest but that boy has acting in his bones.

MAYBE it's just kid stuff—but Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner have crossed their hearts and promised to wait for each other for two years. And then they'll marry.

When I heard they were eloping I called Debbie and asked her if she is secretly engaged. "Oh, no, Miss Parsons," she gasped. "We've got such a long way to go to get established in our careers. Bobby gets only $35 from his manager to live on!"

My money says that if the youngsters DO wait two years the marriage won't come off. When you are their ages there are many romantic interludes along the way.

Maritia, the little Peruvian girl Joan Fontaine adopted last year, has become thoroughly Americanized except for one thing: She still sleeps on the floor propped up in a corner.

Believe me, she is one of the cutest and most lovable children I have ever met. Debbie, Joan's own child, adores her.

SOME of Clark Gable's best friends think he has changed since he had so much trouble with his titled wife, the former Sylvia Ashley. There were days when Clark neither telephoned nor saw his friends, even those closest to him.

Before he finally telephoned me, I was beginning to think I was on the black list, too. Now that I've talked to him, I understand something of his feeling.

A lot of things had been printed that were annoying because they were not true. One was that he was planning to marry Natalie Thompson, socialite whom he had seen only four times. Another was that he was never going to make another picture, that he was leaving Hollywood for good.

Just before he took off for a six months stay abroad (he is making a picture in London and another in Africa) he told me frankly that he had been unhappy over his recent pictures.

"I want a good story with guts in it and a little romance on the side. And, say, Louella—I'm not going to marry anyone—ever. I've had enough."

As of right now—I believe The King means it.

GENE TIERNEY and Van Johnson were completely broken up when a hen on the set of Plymouth Adventure laid an egg right in the middle of their big scene!

Well, you can't please everybody.

THE LETTER BOX: Sylvia Venettone says a pox on the fan who wrote he is sick and tired of reading about Liz Taylor. "Let him speak for himself" she snaps, "We love Liz."

Carol Kasheinider writes, "You don't give us enough news of Loretta Young and Irene Dunne." I DON'T??? Heavens, they are my close friends.

Patricia Petree wants to write a column like "Good News" when she finishes high school and wants to know whether she should graduate before taking up classes in journalism. I graduated from high school, Patrice, but I never studied journalism. Getting a job on your local newspaper is the best experience, I think.

That's all for now. See you next month.

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Jane Russell will fight to the bitter end any attempts to deport Tommy Kavanaugh. The little Irish boy she adopted in England is almost two years old now and she has grown to love him as though she were his real mother. British immigration authorities have charged that it was illegal to permit the child, a British subject, to leave the country as the ward of a non-British subject . . . Don't be surprised if Debbie Reynolds develops as one of Hollywood's most colorful stars. I'm still reeling from the shock I got at this year's Academy Awards show when Debbie opened her handbag to reveal it was crammed with Girl Scout cookies! . . . Anything can happen on the heels of the Mona Freeman-Pat Nerney bustup. Pat told me: "I hope to retain her friendship. I think it is possible to keep that." And that's the kind of sweet-talking humility Mona listens to.

Reynolds

Never ever let it be said that Deanna Durbin will starve, although she hasn't made a picture in years. She has been living "high on the hog" in Europe, thanks to a $400,000 annuity she bought years ago and the monthly payments U-I has been sending her on her old contract . . . Headline in a California newspaper: "Tony Curtis Says He'll Marry Only Once." Trying to be original, huh? . . . Bob Taylor may never win an Oscar but neither will he ever lose his unfailing, feet-on-the-ground sense of humor. When I asked him how he felt about being named the worst actor of the year by the boys at Harvard for his work in Quo Vadis he said, "By golly, I finally won an award. And I never worked harder for one in my life!"

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

George Sanders and Zsa Zsa Gabor are "through, feeneeshed, KAPUT!" Zsa Zsa told me at Mary Pickford's party on the eve of Mary's first appearance before the cameras in years in The Library. Eva Gabor, Zsa Zsa's sister, was listening to our conversation. "Don't print it in your column!" Eva said. "She'll change her mind tomorrow!" . . . Corinne Calvet wanted to appear on Zsa Zsa's television show. Zsa Zsa said, "I admire Miss Calvet very much as a Bikini bathing suit girl, but we do not permit Bikini bathing suits on our show" . . . John Agar fired his agent and got another one when he lost the part in Republic's Citizen Soldier that John Derek won . . . MGM protested to three Los Angeles theatres when they advertised "Mr. Elizabeth Taylor" in a British picture, Holiday Cruise. So the theaters changed their ads to read Mike Wilding . . . It's been buzzed around that Liz keeps her Mike up late nights over his protests that he's too old for that sort of thing—that he has to get his rest in order to look his best for the next day's shooting . . . And did you know that Broadway's Dolores Gray, who steadied with Mike in London for two years pre-Liz, has a poodle named MIKE?

Calvet & Husband

Joan Fontaine had both her little girls vaccinated and ready to go to Europe when ex-spouse Bill Dozier slapped a court order on her preventing her from doing so. And they were fighting it out before the judge when a whisper started that Joan and Billy Rose were a new twosome. Joan denied it with, "I invited Mr. Rose to a party. That's all. If he thinks I threw it for him he's mistaken"' . . . New feud: Lana Turner and Sam Goldwyn. They fought over Del Armstrong, Lana's make-up man for the past ten years. Lana wanted him to work for her on (Continued on page 14)

Are you in the know?

When leaving an upper berth, should you —

☐ Dress completely ☐ Wear a robe ☐ Ring a bell

To save your neck, you can't get down—unless you ring the bell that fetches the porter (with a ladder). It's okay to dress in the ladies' room. So you can wear your robe down the aisle, without feeling self-conscious. In any situation—at certain times, Kotex keeps you self-assured. Those flat pressed ends banish telltale outlines. And for extra comfort, there's your new Kotex belt, made with soft-stretch elastic. Non-twisting. Non-curling. Washable; dries pronto!

Know how to "click" with a camera?

☐ Grin and face it ☐ Try a trick or two

Make your snapshot wallet-worthy. Don't stand facing the lens squarely: cameras play hob with a chassis that's even a wee bit on the wide side. A good trick's to pose your frame at an angle. And when "those" days pose the problem of choosing the just-right sanitary protection—choose Kotex. As for finding the right absorbency—the trick's to try all 3! Regular, Junior, Super Kotex.

Should this summer's barefoot belle consider—

☐ Snakes ☐ A pedicure ☐ Poison ivy

Whether beachcombing, or dabbling in a babbling brook—your tootsies better be well pedicured! Cut toe-nails short; straight across. Use lacquer to match your paw-paint; and pul-lease—repair chipped polish! Belles on their toes don't risk embarrassment. They meet "calendar" needs with Kotex, for that special safety center gives extra protection.

If your Romeo's green-eyed, what to do?

☐ Stick to your knitting ☐ Keep him guessing

Your dreamboat's the jealous type? Making with the roving eye won't cure him. If you'd avoid feuds, date the sad lad solo; and stick to your knitting . . . no flirty business. Be kind to yourself, too, on days when comfort means a lot. Get the softness Kotex gives: it holds its shape, because this napkin's made to stay soft while you wear it.

More women choose KOTEX than all other sanitary napkins

Have you tried Delsey?

Delsey is the new bathroom tissue that's safer because it's softer. A product as superior as Kotex . . . as luxuriously soft and absorbent as Kleenex. (We think that's the nicest compliment there is.) It's a pure white tissue, double-ply for extra strength . . . so wonderfully different, your entire family will appreciate Delsey. Why don't you try Delsey, next time?

ODDS BODKINS:

Mitchum

Alan Ladd started his role in The Iron Mistress as a tough guy with long, blond hair . . . Gloria Grahame, who's trying to quit smoking, reported on the Tribute To A Bad Man set with 100 penny suckers —which makes a sucker out of someone! . . . Gig Young's mustache is coming off again. He's still being mistaken on the MGM lot for Errol Flynn . . . I don't know whose imitation of Sam Goldwyn I like best: Virginia Mayo's or Steve Cochran's . . . Bob Mitchum as a singer? He told his agents to look for a nightclub crooning spot for him in Las Vegas while he's between pictures . . . Leslie Caron puts veal steaks in her ballet slippers. This keeps her toes from getting blistered . . . Bette Davis was afraid to offer Gary Merrill a martini after he finished Night Without Sleep. His role called for him to drink them throughout the picture.

Sight of the month: June Allyson on Wilshire Boulevard wearing a huge "I Like Ike" button on her lapel. And, when she leaned forward, it changed into a photo of Gen. Eisenhower . . . Marlon Brando's pet raccoon is lonesome. So Marlon's looking for a mate for it . . . During the shooting of Letters To The President, director Bill Wellman asked Shelley Winters to cry for the big courtroom scene. She couldn't force the tears. Bill yelled, "Vivien Leigh won the Oscar YOU should have won!" And Shelley wept bucketsfull . . . Dress designer Billy Travilla swears that his wife, Dona Drake, has grown an inch since becoming a mother! . . . Remember the late Atwater Kent, Hollywood's greatest party thrower? His son Prentiss has joined 20th Century-Fox as a contract player. And young Prentiss has changed his name to Peter Kent.

SEX APPEAL:

Gaynor

Arlene Dahl's mad. Some teevee bluenoses in New York turned thumbs down on the peekaboo, decollete gowns she had ordered for her appearance with Imogene Coca and Sid Caesar. Too LOW AND BEHOLED! . . . Anne Baxter's low-cut costumes for 20th's My Wife's Best Friend make her the studio's new pin-up queen. Honest to cheesecake—wait'll you see our Annie! . . . And—just kidding, of course —Betty Carey sent two bottles of champagne to Anne when this picture started shooting, together with a note asking Anne not to wax too ardent in her kissing scenes with her ever-lovin' Macdonald . . . In Bloodhounds Of Broadway, Mitzi Gaynor was originally supposed to have played a folksy "Daisy Mae Scragg" character who always wears gingham and any other kind of hillbilly apparel that might conceivably lure a "Li'l Abner." But now the part's been rewritten and Mitzi wears sheer silks . . . In Monkey Business, Marilyn Monroe slugs Cary Grant because she thinks Cary pinched her where lots of us would like to!

QUICK QUOTES:

Speaking of the Monroe muffin, I asked Marilyn about politics. She replied, "It's a good second subject" (!) . . . A star broke up with her boy friend, a guy named Joe, and blamed it on the old Hollywood triangle: "Joe and I were both in love with the same person—Joe!" . . . Marjorie Main wears lace panties under her tennis shorts for her new Ma And Pa Kettle picture. And Gorgeous Gussie Moran has promised not to sue . . . Dial Soap keeps complexions clearer by keeping skin cleaner!

Dial's AT-7 (Hexachlorophene) removes blemish-spreading bacteria that other soaps leave on skin.

The cleaner your skin, the better your complexion. And mild, fragrant Dial with AT-7 gets your skin cleaner and clearer than any other kind of soap. It's as simple as that. Of course Dial's bland beauty-cream lather gently removes dirt and make-up, giving you scrupulous cleanliness to overcome clogged pores and blackheads. But Dial does far more! Here's the important difference: when you use Dial every day, its AT-7 effectively clears skin of bacteria that often aggravate and spread surface pimples and blemishes. Skin doctors know this and recommend Dial for both adults and adolescents.

'Twas being mumbled around Hollywood that all the town needs now is for Barbara Payton and Ann Sterling to become roommates, after all the scandal . . . Many's the time I've thought that most of the little girls who come to Hollywood and go off the beam aren't bad little girls at all. It's the guys they get involved with in Flickerville who should be tarred and feathered!

Travis Kleefield put a down payment on a mink coat for Jane Wyman just before the engagement was called off. Incidentally, relations between Jane and Kleefeld's mother were what you might call strained when we were going to press on this issue . . . Sharman Douglas spent the past few months in Hollywood living in the apartment once leased by Pete Lawford, her old flame . . .

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Mario Lanza has made $200,000 on his "Be My Love" recordings so far. And still going strong . . . Rita Hayworth who's still holding out for a $3,000,000 settlement for daughter Yasmine from her estranged husband Ali will wear seven sheer veils in Salome, slated as her next picture. For the Dance of the Seven Veils, of course . . . Judy Garland's success at the Palace in New York and at the Los Angeles Philharmonic enabled her to take out a $1,000,000 annuity . . . At press time, it looked like Bob Topping's settlement on Lana would be in the neighborhood of $75,000.

This is the lowdown on the Sinatra divorce: Frankie guaranteed Nancy minimum alimony of $12,000 a year . . . So you'd like to be a movie star? You should have seen Ava G. Sinatra on the set of Snows Of Kilimanjaro, rushing the end of the picture so that she could hurry to New York and join Frankie. The scene required her to wallow in the mud, looking bedraggled and beaten, Ava moaned, "Is this really worth it all?" . . . Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis returned from a personal appearance with about $350,000 in "new money." But most of it went to Uncle Sam for taxes . . . Marty Melcher tells me that Doris Day's eventual earnings from her ten-year recording contract will more than exceed her picture earnings. Same old reason: high taxes . . . When you become a star, it seems, you get all the things for nothing that you once couldn't afford. Like Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis, who got a free trip to Europe to entertain the troops. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Curtis were also presented at the Court of St. James in London, and, for the occasion, Don Loper whipped up for Janet a bouffant gown of crimson velvet with an off-the-shoulder neckline outlined in white ermine that knocked me cold when she gave me a preview.

Did you know that Aldo Ray, who made such a hit in The Marrying Kind, was once married? His divorce from Shirley Green, a Crockett, Calif., cutie, is scheduled to finalize this summer. They were wed in 1948 . . . Ruth Roman got mad and asked to be let out of her Warner contract when Virginia Mayo won the co-starring spot with Alan Ladd in Alan's first picture for Warners', The Iron Mistress. Ruth wanted that role more than any other in her career!

Leaving home to live with her married sister in Chicago, Carrie Meeker (Jennifer Jones) meets Charles Drouet (Eddie Albert), a traveling salesman, on the train. He tells her to look him up later in Chicago.

When Carrie loses her job in a factory, she has no one to turn to but Drouet. One night, months later, they arrange to meet at an exclusive restaurant. Here, Carrie meets George Hurstwood (Laurence Olivier).

Hurstwood, who is a married man, falls in love with Carrie. His wife finds out about their alliance, and has his salary turned over to her. Hurstwood, after inadvertently stealing money, takes Carrie to New York.

In New York, Hurstwood can't find a job. Their situation becomes desperate, and Carrie leaves him to go on the stage. Hurstwood comes to her for a handout before fading out of Carrie's life forever.

CARRIE

William Wyler's picturization of Theodore Dreiser's "Sister Carrie" sticks so surprisingly close to the facts of the famous novel, compresses so well the story detail of a long piece of fiction, that it is an unpleasant duty to point out that in so doing it has squeezed most of the life out of the characters. Jennifer Jones, as Caroline Meeker, the Midwestern teen-ager of 1890, makes her way in the big cities of Chicago and New York through alliances first with traveling salesman Eddie Albert and then with Laurence Olivier, manager of a large restaurant and therefore a comparative big-timer, who is a married man.

Between them, these three manage to break a good many conventions, particularly for the turn of the century. But what leads Carrie, at least, to do so is never sufficiently explained. Her sudden transfer of her affections from Albert to the handsomer, richer, more socially elite Olivier, for example, appears pretty cynical for a naive country girl. So, too, does her eventual desertion of Olivier (after a period of harrowing tenement life borne without complaint—except by Olivier—she leaves him suddenly because "I'm young, and I'm going to live").

Later the script somehow indicates that she has a heart of gold. With no understanding of what Carrie is really made of or how she got that way, it becomes difficult to understand what drives her to act the way she does. The editing of the movie also creates some confusion. Particularly at the film's beginning the scene often shifts so rapidly that it is hard to keep track of what has been happening. Nor are the performances of Miss Jones and Olivier of much help. Olivier's middle-aged-philanderer-turned-romanticist, in particular, is a really wooden performance offering but one facial trick (half-closed eyelids) to indicate charm, thought, passion, fear, anger and just plain weariness. Only Eddie Albert, as good-time Charlie Drouet, who loves Carrie in his own makeshift way, manages to do something with his choice of thankless roles.

The trouble seems to be a quite complete lack in the screenplay of novelist Dreiser's own qualities of tenderness, pity and understanding of human motives. What is essentially a tragic story becomes on the screen merely a sordid one. Carrie is all plot and no people. (Paramount)

THE WINNING TEAM

It may come as a surprise to baseball fans to find out after all these years that Doris Day won the 1926 World Series pennant for the Cardinals, but that's how The Winning Team has it. Playing Mrs. Grover Cleveland Alexander, widow of the diamond great, she manages to taxi from New York's Astor Hotel to Yankee Stadium between innings and, inspiring her husband (Ronald Reagan) by the sight, saves the day for St. Louis. Her ride, which features the film's final reels, is no mean trick by itself but is hardly anything compared with what the picture pulls on the movie-going public. The script follows Nebraska-born Alexander from his early days on the farm through his farm-club successes and trouble in the minor leagues, where he is hit in the head by a fast ball and develops diplopia, or double vision. Then he regains his sight and arm and soon becomes a major leaguer. Almost before he knows who has hit him he finds himself on the front lines in World War I France, then back in the States—and the big-leagues—again. A mysterious mound seizure drives him rapidly to drink after a physician tells him that if he continues to play ball it will be time out for him permanently. Doris eventually comes to his aid, but not to the baseball fans' or movie-goers'. The many present baseball stars (pitcher Bob Lemon, for instance) who are in the cast are lucky, for they appear only momentarily. Which is more than can be said for Miss Day or Mr. Reagan, who may never recover. And baseball fans are likely to suffer from double-dipsomania for the rest of their natural lives. Cast: Ronald Reagan, Doris Day, Frank Lovejoy.—Warners.

MY SON JOHN

My Son John is about an American traitor and how he grew. As such, it is as timely as yesterday's headlines and probably much more controversial. The timeliness is due to its subject matter, the controversy to its setting. For My Son John takes place in a typical U. S. small town and happens to an average American family, the Jeffersons. The parents (Helen Hayes and Dean Jagger) have two sons about to go to Korea—and John (Robert Walker), a brilliant young Government official. The latter's delayed and somewhat truculent visit home provides the picture's main story line: his mother's discovery that her favorite son has ties with a Communist spy ring and the increasingly tragic necessity of deciding what to do, with love of country in constant conflict with mother love. This might be moving; it becomes shocking because of the story's insistence that a native Communist can so easily be the product of a typical home. Producer-director-co-writer Leo McCarey makes his main points again and again, and no one can argue with them: America must be alert against the often deceptively humanitarian doctrines spread by the Reds and their fellow travelers, and such men are not always foreigners. But, unfortunately, John Jefferson's story is told entirely from the outside (the tragedy, as Mr. McCarey sees it, is more the mother's than the son's); one learns to some extent how he got that way, but never why he felt that way. Since no really valid reasons are ever presented for John's fall to treason, his personal peculiarities may appear to be the cause of his downfall. He not only went to college but took post-graduate work; this is presented in an unfavorable light. By implication, also, he is a dangerous character because he disagrees with his father (a pillar of the church and of a veteran's post). McCarey, who obviously made the film as a labor of love, has been able to dress up his muddled script with slick direction and unusually convincing, if sometimes hysterical performances so that its dangerous weaknesses are not immediately apparent. Yet the film is based on so many questionable premises that it is likely to be argued about for a long time to come.

Cast: Helen Hayes, Van Heflin, Robert Walker, Dean Jagger.—Paramount.

HIGH NOON

If High Noon is not one of producer Stanley Kramer's finest pictures, it is nonetheless a good example of his prescription for making movies better; tackle a difficult theme in a different way. A Western but not the run-of-the-prairie variety it tries to picture what the call of duty means to a really conscientious man in public office, utilizing the formula of the chase with a reverse twist. The hunters in this case are a band of about-to-be outlaws; the hunted man is town marshal Gary Cooper, who is planning to retire as chief law enforcement official of quiet little Hadleyville in the 1870's. The moralizing script deals with the difficulties the law officer has with a compromising citizenry who seem unable to learn that appeasement never pays. In between times Cooper also has difficulties with his pacifistic bride (she's a Quaker), a former girl friend (she's a knowledgeable but noble Mexican) and Lloyd Bridges (in another of his effective meanie roles). If Cooper is as stone-graven in acting style as he is in appearance, that may be what director Fred Zinnemann was striving for: a kind of mannered, hauntingly simple folk-tale quality. But it doesn't come off quite that way. Again and again the cameras discover Cooper out in a street and focus on him lovingly as he stands there, all alone for an unconscionably long period of time, like a ballet dancer out on the boards with nothing to do. This kills suspense rather than creates it. Every few minutes during the later reels there is a close-up of a clock, a different one each time; this is unfortunate, since it often serves merely to point up how long one has been bored. And Dimitri Tiomkin's musical scoring is effective in proving how phony a studio-composed "folksong" can sound, particularly if heard often enough. High Noon tries for art, but it succeeds only in being overly arty.

Cast: Gary Cooper, Lloyd Bridges, Katy Jurado, Grace Kelly.—United Artists.

THREE FOR BEDROOM C

Like the part she played on the Broadway stage a couple of seasons back in Twentieth Century, Gloria Swanson's role in her current film is that of a temperamental screen star. And by a funny coincidence the scene of the motion picture is the same as the play's: a Pullman that makes part of the run between New York and Hollywood. Only, this train is headed in the opposite direction—the wrong way, as far as the comparative merits of the two scripts are concerned. The story starts with Gloria hurrying to California on a sudden impulse with her adopted daughter, little Janine Perreau; having neglected to get reservations on the "Super Chief" from Chicago, they appropriate Bedroom C, whose rightful occupant is biochemistry professor James Warren. You can probably imagine more or less what happens from here on into Pasadena (complications are provided by the sudden appearance of Gloria's manager and a rising young stage actor with whom he wants her to co-star). The familiarity of the story and the setting could be excused if Three For Bedroom C had anything to offer in the way of wit, surprise or sheer production quality. Unfortunately, it hasn't, and probably neither Miss Swanson nor newcomer James Warren should be blamed for the overly girlish and boyish attitudes they seem to affect; it may have been only embarrassment. Miss Perreau comes through, however, with pigtails flying. She deserves a special word of commendation for playing a precocious youngster who is neither too cute nor too condescending, but is definitely too good for Three For Bedroom C.

Cast: Gloria Swanson, James Warren, Janine Perreau.—Universal.

MARA MARU

It took only three writers to spin this tall tale about deep-sea diving and diamonds buried in the ocean deep, but it would have taken at least seven Shakespeares to salvage it. The story has something to do with a diver named Gregory, otherwise known as Errol Flynn, and—according to the script—"a doorstep named Stella," played by Ruth Roman. The scene is Manila. Ruth's husband, who is also Errol's business partner, is murdered under mysterious circumstances just when he appears to have stumbled onto a really good thing. After a series of maneuvers by big-timer Raymond Burr, whose background is never explained, Errol is inveigled into captaining the yacht "Mara Maru" on a treasure-hunting expedition. Ruth comes along for the ride and for her share of the take. Violence ensues, coupled with some romance and a few pious platitudes, but little of it is exciting and none is plausible. Each episode seems to have been created on the spot, but fast, in hopes of keeping the picture going, which it does for 98 minutes. At one point Burr, as the menace, promises to get rid of Flynn as soon as he gets "bored to death." Most audiences will probably feel that way long before Burr does.

Cast: Errol Flynn, Ruth Roman, Raymond Burr. —Warners.

SHE'S WORKING HER WAY THROUGH COLLEGE

Admirers of James Thurber's and Elliott Nugent's delightful stage and screen comedy The Male Animal, probably shuddered when they read it was due to be made into a movie musical. They can rest easier now. She's Working Her Way Through College hardly sounds or looks like The Male Animal (not with beautifully buxom Virginia Mayo in the leading part); it is, however, agreeable, amusing and even, at times, quite adult entertainment. And what is left of the original plot is so serviceable that the picture makes a lot more sense than most of its genre. In its present form it mostly concerns a burlesque queen with playwriting ambitions who decides to go to college to help achieve them. She picks Midwest State because Ronald Reagan, drama professor there, used to teach her in high school. Although both she and he hide the facts of her former life, she is soon reigning queen of the campus. How she becomes involved with the public life of Reagan and his wife and the private affairs of football star Gene Nelson makes up most of the musical. In the end, naturally, her past catches up with her, in a hilariously satisfying climax. Most satisfactorily of all, no loose ends are left to the story. The sub-plot, which concerns the professor, his wife and a classmate of his who was once a romantic rival and whose mind is still on the scrimmage line, carries most of the dramatic weight. But it is so well integrated into the screenplay and so humanly written and played that it never seems out of place in what is primarily a good-humored spoof. Virginia Mayo has never had a vehicle that better displays her considerable show-girl talents, nor Gene Nelson a better chance to prove his ability to rival both Gene Kelly (as a dancer) and Burt Lancaster (as an acrobat). Reagan and Phyllis Thaxter make a really charming married couple, while Roland Winters as Midwest's leading alumnus—and menace—portrays a hypocrite perfectly. The script and direction are thoroughly professional, and if the tunes are not memorable, they are always pleasant, like the picture. Almost anybody will give She's Working Her Way Through College Grade A as summer fare.

Cast: Virginia Mayo, Ronald Reagan, Gene Nelson, Phyllis Thaxter.—Warners.

THE FIGHTER

To say that a movie is "reminiscent" of one or more other pictures is usually to damn it indirectly as a pallid copy. The Fighter, a strange blending of some of the ingredients of Viva Zapata! with bits and pieces of Champion and Body and Soul, is an exception, for the end-result of the peculiar recipe is a satisfying adventure film on a comparatively lofty historical theme (the script is based on Jack London's story, "The Mexican"). Richard Conte flees across the Rio Grande to Texas in 1910, lone survivor of an earlier-day Lidice in which Mexican Government troops burned his village to the ground and massacred his fellow fishermen, family and fiancée. He joins up with an exile group in El Paso that is supporting the activities of Mexico's great guerrilla leaders like Durango (Lee J. Cobb). One of the backers of the little band, American intellectual Vanessa Brown, takes to the young refugee immediately, but he has something on his mind that is greater than romance: revenge. So he makes use of his natural talent for prize-fighting to raise money for the guerrillas, and the camera follows him as his star rises in the ring and he returns to his native land on a dangerous mission—rescuing Durango from a prison cell. Back in the U. S., he fights a final match to obtain money for revolutionary rifles, and goes home again. All the elements in this film are beautifully fused under Herbert Kline's direction: the screenplay by Kline and Aben Kandel; Alex Gottlieb's over-all production (including his own help on the adaptation and fine camera work, as usual by James Wong Howe), as well as topnotch performances, by Conte in particular. The fact that a comparatively low-budget movie can feature such work proves again that sparing the expense doesn't necessarily spoil the picture. The Fighter has a big punch.
Cast: Richard Conte, Vanessa Brown, Lee J. Cobb.—United Artists.

But in time the fad died and the crowd dropped back to where I was trotting along in my stubborn fashion. I'm still stubborn. They tell me waistlines are dropping. Not mine. I love the French. My idea of heaven would be to work in New York and weekend in Paris. But by no means does this infer their infallibility in styles—new look, dropped waist, and especially this business of wearing ankle straps with tailored suits—abominable! The edge of a tailored skirt and the line of an ankle strap divides your leg so that the longest length of it visible without interruption is about five inches. What is there attractive about segments of a leg?

I believe in subtle make-up. After I apply lipstick—and blue eye shadow if it is evening—I am finished.

If I am going out, my hair (three permanents a year) will have been washed and my nails will have been manicured. Very likely I will be wearing one of my jeweled evening sweaters, which I buy whenever and wherever I see one I like. I won't be conscious of the silvery sheen to my hair because I not only have long accepted it but I like it; personally, it is my heritage (my brother Byron's hair turned pure white when he was 25), and professionally, since it photographs blonde with good highlights in it, it is an asset to me.

I GENERALLY CARRY A SHOULDER BAG when I go out, and in it are always the same articles: A Sulka alligator wallet given to me by Mary and Jack Benny which has my signature inscribed on it in gold, a small mirror, a superstay portrait pink lipstick and handy lipstick brush (which is actually a No. 7 water color brush set in a gold handle), a gold cigarette case containing cigarettes, a gold Zippo lighter, and that's just about all. No odds and ends and no clutter. In a way I suppose my bag represents me. I have lived long enough to know what is essential to me—I repeat, to me. This might not do for another woman.

In my possessions I don't always lean to the practical; if they affect me favorably in any way I am for them. There is nothing practical about rubies and pearls (unless you count them as investments), and I used to have rubies before I sold them all in preference for cultured pearls. Pearls, the glow of them, do something to me. I have other jewelry but the pearls are what I warm to most. Again, there is nothing practical about paintings, but I did my walls over in white so that the few fine canvases I've accumulated wouldn't have to fight against heavy backgrounds.

My favorite flowers are gardenias, red roses, lilacs, tuberoses, and white carnations. I dislike orchids or any of the unfragrant exotics, and I hate lilies—calla, Easter, or of the valley. They are too closely related to death.

THE PERFECT WORLD FOR ME, when I get around to setting it up, would be almost evenly divided between working, reading, dancing, and swimming. I love the actual acting part of my work and the studying involved; I couldn't learn my part just by itself—I must know the whole play or picture, what everybody else has to say and what motivates them. I love reading books, any kind of book, but, I will admit, much more so if I can personalize it by seeing myself acting one of the characters. I am sure we all do this occasionally. I do it automatically. When I have taken the trouble to count the number of books I read a month, it has come to about thirty. I think it stays close to this average. But I have no library as such. When I am through with a book it finds its way into the hands of others who want to read. (Editor's note: Miss Stanwyck sends them to the veterans' hospitals.)

Incidentally, let's jump to the subject of men's wear for a moment. From my old New York days I think I still have a love for a neat blue suit—the old Sunday suit that every man owned if he had nothing else nice to wear. But I see nothing neat about California men. The sportswear, the Hawaiian shirt, the sloppy bags, the loafers . . . it's way overdone. You get to feel that something is missing and then you realize it's their whiskers. They are shaven. They shouldn't be . . . they should complete the picture if they are trying to look like beachcombers.

I DON'T THINK there are handier things in wearing apparel these days than the housecoats the shops are selling—especially the ones with the dolman sleeves and the flaring back you can belt in. They can call them housecoats, but they are street coats for me as well. Speaking of new things, I love plastic and I have replaced all the silver I've collected—candlesticks, ash trays, (Continued on next page)

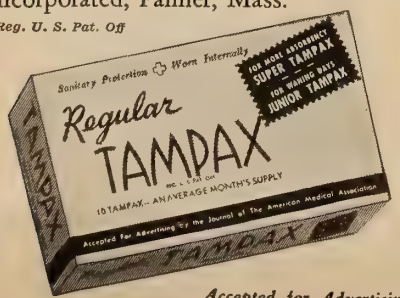
Forget the Time of month

*Tampax takes care of vacations and week-ends



Believe the Tampax user who says "I can go in swimming any day of the month I want to." She can also picnic in a brief play-suit—on those particular days in question—or go jaunting here and there in clinging slacks. That's because Tampax sanitary protection discards the bulky external pad with its belt-and-pin harness. It is worn internally. There is nothing outside to "show."

A doctor invented Tampax for this special use by women. Made of pure, highly absorbent cotton, each Tampax is compressed into its own dainty applicator.... With Tampax there's no bulk to bind or chafe or induce perspiration. No need for a deodorant. (Odor does not form.) And no need to remove the Tampax for tub or shower. Changing is quick. Disposal easy.

Millions of women are now using Tampax. Why don't you try it? Buy at drug or notion counter. Three absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. Average month's supply can be carried in your purse. Or get the economy package with four months' average supply. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

cigarette boxes—in plastic. What crystal has come into my possession I've replaced with Steubenware. I am sure I'm not a good example for anyone else; I am possessed by a dislike for old things and don't enjoy having them around. This, I know, is not typical, and perhaps I should read up on Herr Freud to see what this may mean psychologically and try to apply it to myself.

I WONDER what the connection is between certain likes and habits I have? I can't stand clutter, either actual or mental, if it's on my desk or in my mind. I don't like little thoughts, the inconsequential things that can fill up your mind and come out in idle chatter or gossip. I eat and dress and sleep simply. Meat and fire make a meal, and fuss about sauces is so much folderol. A tailored suit makes wearing apparel, and just a bed is necessary for sleep—undress and get in as is. How much more time there is to live if we can cut down to the essential things and cut out the non-essential!

Maybe this is why I like animals and am such a zoo addict. Maybe, too, this is why I seldom get headaches . . . although when I do they are beauts. Maybe this, too, is why I overcame my fear of airplanes and now fly instead of moving into a train room for three days. (Though I do wish the ladies' room in a plane wasn't so tiny!) And maybe, too, this is why I think TV is here to stay. To me it is the simplest form of presenting entertainment . . . a theatre in which millions of people can have front row seats.

I feel most comfortable wearing a cardigan sweater set. I don't know anything neater or more satisfying in wearing apparel, nor more complimentary to the average woman. I remember years ago seeing pictures of English women at home dressed in such soft, cashmere combinations and thinking I must get something like that. Now, suddenly, they are popular all over the country.

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE for me to answer every fan letter sent to me, but I write fan letters myself and don't get any answers either. I believe in telling people I like them or their work when I do. I am about to write my fifth fan letter to the same man . . . the man who directed my favorite picture containing my favorite closeup. The picture is The Third Man and I have seen it five times (that's why I'm due to write my fifth letter). My favorite closeup is the one where the camera follows the cat who runs to a man's feet, and then rises to show the man's face. It is Orson Welles. And while that closeup has the greatest impact of any single closeup I have ever seen, the man I send my fan letters to is the English director of the picture, Carol Reed.

SOMEONE RECENTLY ASKED ME if I have a guilty conscience when I wear my mink because of all the publicity it received in the Washington investigations. Believe me, I have no guilty conscience. I worked darn hard for my mink; from the day I decided I wanted one it took me three years to lay aside the money necessary free and clear of my other financial obligations. And perhaps I ought to add here that someone should tell Washington it is becoming awfully hard to believe in it.

THE HANDIEST TWO THINGS I OWN are a wrist watch of no particular make and a never failing Kimberly ball-point pen. Whenever I am invited to a cocktail party I look at the watch and it tells me I haven't got time to attend. I guess I don't like cocktail parties. People act as if simply determined they are going to have a good time—and don't. With the pen I write my regrets.

Things I haven't much use for are eggs and telegrams. Eggs I eat once a week, scrambled and in a hurry. Telegrams I am afraid of. I love packages that don't reveal their contents. I wish I could talk a Latin language. I love to hear them, and I think every woman sounds wonderful talking French or Italian. I am actually studying French.

SOMETIMES I GET A YEN to tell children bedtime stories but I don't know any who want to hear them—not these days. My favorite little girl now is probably Nancy Sinatra, who is 11, and no one can tell me she hasn't been here before! She couldn't be that smart in 11 years. She gets straight A's in school, plays a lovely piano, knows French and has a wisdom that is absolutely frightening. She also has a younger brother, Frankie, Jr., who spreads his arms and makes like an airplane when he goes to get me a glass of water. And I get lots of water this way, trying to see if he will forget being a plane. He never does.

I think Frankie would like the old romantic pictures that Hollywood is making so seldom now and which I miss so much: Beau Geste, Lives Of A Bengal Lancer, Casablanca, Algiers . . . I believe in realism, I've done my own best work in realistic stories, but there's something to losing yourself in screen glory that is unlike the everyday world. And, of course, with censorship to contend with, American realism has a tough time rising to the brilliance of foreign realism which seems circumscribed by nothing more handicapping than imagination.

Well . . . I have to wash my white cotton gloves now. I bought a pair of plastic handmolds my size, I slip the gloves on, wash them good, and let them dry and bleach in the sun. I love to do it.

RITA'S RARIN' TO GO!

■ When she came back to Hollywood there was much speculation about what man would take over Rita's life, and when he'd start. Nightclub owners got their best table linen ready, gossip columnists sharpened their pencils and everybody waited for the fun to begin. But Rita fooled them all. She hardly went anywhere, and the only people she played with were her two daughters.

She still doesn't go anywhere, still plays with the girls, but it looks as if Rita's about ready to come out of her shell, because by the time you read this her divorce from Aly Khan may be final and Rita, who is one of the most glamorous women in Hollywood, won't let that glamor go to waste. Meanwhile, she's biding her time and settling into a home truly fit for a princess with room enough for her entire court.

Her house, high on Alpine Drive in Beverly Hills, isn't the same one she left three years ago, but it bears her label. She's taken her personal belongings out of storage, unpacked her favorite books and treasured collection of French, Spanish, English and Italian recordings; she's uncrated her silver, her valuable oil paintings and installed them all in her newly-acquired, pale green Spanish mansion.

Rita's new home (shown here) is tucked in a romantic glen. Here she has surrounded herself with colorful murals, soft lights, and music a heavily wooded ravine, the mansion has a remote and elegant beauty. There are no close neighbors, no sound of auto traffic. The rest of the world seems very far away until you step onto the terrace and look down on the heart of Beverly Hills.

A short distance from the house is a swimming pool surrounded by a lovely garden that glows softly at night with a myriad of hidden lights.

And yet for all its seclusion, Rita's house is only a few minutes' drive to Columbia Studios. "I'm a working girl again," she says, "and I like to be near my work."

Rita's discovery of this hideaway is typical of her impulsive nature. One minute she was living quite comfortably in a swank bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel and the next she was burning to get out. She was sun-bathing in her private little patio at (Continued on page 78)

After a hard day at the studio, Rita often dines on a card table in the sun room. Here's where she keeps her most treasured books, mementos and prints.

A "quiet evening" at home starts off when Rita brings out her dance drum, and begins beating out a tempo for her daughters to dance to. Next, she reaches for her castanets, and soon all three are whirling to the infectious click-click rhythm. The circus mural of glass tiles on the far left wall fits in perfectly with mother and daughters' gay, uninhibited dancing sessions. Rebecca is taking dancing lessons now.

The pale yellow walls of Rita's bedroom create a warm, sunny feeling even when the draperies are pulled. Next to the bed (but not shown in this picture) stands her portable victrola, and favorite records.

Like its owner, Rebecca's room is in a transitional stage. Lately, she's been forsaking her doll collection in favor of cowboy records and abstract paintings, samples of which she hangs on the

the Inside Report

HOLLYWOOD'S MOST PASSIONATE LOVES

Their real stories have never been told! On these and the following pages are the true accounts of Hollywood's most controversial love affairs—Shelley and Vittorio, Ava and Frankie, Liz and Mike, Judy and Sid Luft.

SHELLEY: IT TOOK A REAL MAN TO TEACH HER WHO THE BOSS WAS—AND TO MAKE HER LIKE IT.

by Alice Mosby

■ At the Academy Awards last March, a young lady of apparent culture and refinement sat demurely in the audience, a picture of subdued charm in a pale blue gown.

She was a candidate for the highest honor Hollywood can bestow—the coveted Oscar.

When Vivien Leigh's name was called as the winner, the audience eyed the girl in blue and held its collective breath. But there were no tantrums, no temperament, no tears.

Instead, the new Shelley Winters serenely left the Pantages theater and graciously shrugged, "It's wonderful she won. I'm glad the suspense is over. I have nothing more to say."

Shelley had nothing more to say?

This is the new Shelley Winters who currently is the talk over 5 o'clock olives among the Cadillac set in glitter-glitter land. And behind the movie queen that night of the Academy Awards strode the reason for the metamorphosis of the blonde bombshell—29-year-old Vittorio Gassman who is tall, dark and handsome, just like in the movies.

Harried directors tried it . . . important studio executives tried it . . . scolding gossip columnists tried it. But where all else failed, Vittorio Gassman has tamed Shelley Winters.

Shelley, as lovers of the cinema know, used to bustle about in baseball caps, shorts and no make-up. The tales of how she pulled fireworks both off and on her movie sets are legendary in the magic city. In those hectic days, Shel went with Farl, as they say in Hollywood. That means Farley Granger.

Then the girl from Brooklyn decided to Tour Europe. Besides Culture and Broadening Travel, Miss Winters found love. At a theater in Rome last September, she met Gassman, one of the five top movie and stage (Continued on page 82)

AVA: IT TOOK PSYCHOANALYSIS TO BRING HER THE PEACE OF MIND THAT MAY SAVE HER MARRIAGE.

by Steve Cronin

Ava risked her career to marry Frank, after much bad publicity.

■ The passion of Frank Sinatra and Ava Gardner, born in a confusion of bad publicity and intrigue, may seem headed for certain disaster.

Look at the odds against them. For nearly two years Sinatra courted Ava in the goldfish bowl of glaring publicity.

His excitable nature turned on newspaper reporters assigned to cover the romance in Hollywood, Mexico City and Madrid. His resultant bad press underlines the theory that when the press is against you, you can't survive unscathed.

by Sheilah Graham

■ The time has come to bury the lies about Elizabeth Taylor and her love for Michael Wilding.

Ever since she flew to London to marry him, Elizabeth has been subjected to a near blizzard of untruthful stories.

She has been pictured as the bride of an octogenarian—a somewhat decrepit albeit charming gentleman of the old British school who never wanders too far from his bottle and wheel chair. Or, in other flights of fancy, Mr. Wilding has been pictured as a somewhat rakish gent bent on pursuing Grandma Marlene Dietrich across several continents.

There was even the hint, while reports were still coming through about the wedding, that Liz was expecting a baby. How this could be reconciled with the suggestion that this marriage was a passionless union, the result of Elizabeth's boredom with Hollywood wolves, I'll never know.

I'll get to some of the other lies later, but now we'll tell the actual facts.

There is no doubt that Elizabeth Taylor and her mother had bitter words at the time of her breakup with Nicky Hilton and the new romance with Stanley Donen. Elizabeth was momentarily thrown for a complete loss over the tragic blow to her heart. She left her family's Beverly Hills home without warning in the middle of the night and went to stay with her good friend, Helen Rose, the studio dress designer who, incidentally, created both her wedding ensembles. A few days later she went to the hospital, and when she came out, she refused to see her mother.

But now, for the past several months, Elizabeth has been closer to her mother than ever, and it has not interfered in the slightest with the depth of her love for Mike Wilding, her honeymoon, or her career.

"While she was in England with Michael," Mrs. Taylor told me, "Elizabeth called me at least once a week, and they both sent me telegrams almost every other day to tell me how happy they were."

These transatlantic communiques were partially business, of course. To indicate how long Elizabeth has been in love with Mike, last summer when she was in England for Ivanhoe, she and Mike planned their wedding for when she would be free from Nicky. At that time, Elizabeth was prepared even to give up her Hollywood career and take a little hat shop in London to give her something to do without taking her away from Mike for months at a time. To prove the point, Elizabeth later would not sign a new contract unless Mike signed one too at Metro. And she didn't have much trouble putting over her point, because Mike Wilding happens to be one of the best actors in England.

This brings up another erroneous belief to the effect that young (and, at 41, isn't he according to American standards?) Mr. Wilding is broke. He isn't. Unless you call earning from $40,000 to $60,000 a year in England being broke. True, he had to make a handsome settlement on his ex-wife but he was able to keep his beautiful apartment on Bruton Street in London, along with his Rolls Royce convertible which few American millionaires feel they can afford.

In addition, Mike, who was once a professional painter, had a collection of paintings (Continued on page 104)

JUDY: THE MAN NO ONE APPROVED OF BROUGHT HER A MATURE LOVE AND HELPED HER CLIMB BACK TO SUCCESS.

by Arthur L. Charles

■ When Judy Garland came back to Hollywood three months ago, reporters who met her train in Pasadena were surprised to learn that she had made the triumphant homeward trek without the man she loves.

"Where is Sid Luft?" everyone asked.

Judy ignored the question. Anxiously she looked about the station platform for her daughter, Liza. Catching sight of her, Judy stretched out her arms and Liza raced into them.

The reporters waited a respectable two minutes while Judy smothered the child. Then they moved in with a barrage of questions.

Was it true that Judy had earned $750,000 in her 20-week stint at New York's Palace? She didn't know the exact figure, but that was about right. (Continued on page 98)

Judy and Sid vacationed in Florida in March.

NO TIME

Gordon's love songs hold a real meaning for Sheila. Every high and low in their life has hinged on his singing career since they married when he was a page boy in Radio City.

Singing is Gordon's life—whether he's doing it for love or money. Here the MacRaes, including the pooch, lend an ear to "probably the best darned young baritone in captivity," as Gordon dubs himself.

Gordon still wolf-whistles when Sheila appears in a bathing suit. "Why, it's only my wife!" he'll say, acting surprised. But he's as sentimental about her as he was 11 years ago.

■ A stocky, square jawed young guy with friendly, hazel eyes and a spacious grin breezed into a Hollywood NBC rehearsal studio a few weeks ago and up to an attractive, smiling girl standing by the mike.

"Hello, Margaret," he greeted her. "It's swell to see you."

"Hello, Gordon," she answered. "It's wonderful to be here."

He took her by both hands then leaned over and planted an enthusiastic kiss on her cheek.

Secret Service men stiffened. Chaperones gasped. Even the radio technicians, used to all kinds of sights in Hollywood, almost dropped their earphones. But all this consternation was lost on Gordon MacRae, who was the kisser, and on the kissed, too, who was Margaret Truman, daughter of the President of the United States. Nobody guessed that they were old friends who had met before in Washington and that Gordon was warmly glad to see (Continued on page 91)

"DARLING, YOU'RE NUTS!"

Wyman's crazy romance has Hollywood guessing

BY RUTH WATERBURY

■ This is a very special kind of love story, a Hollywood love story. It concerns a very beautiful, very intelligent and very real girl named Jane Wyman and a very handsome, equally intelligent and fine guy named Travis Kleefeld.

This story has Hollywood completely bewildered. And this is the first time that the facts of it have been told.

Janie and Trav met during Christmas week—but Hollywood never knew how serious it was with them until mid-March, when Louella Parsons gave to the world the exclusive announcement that they were engaged to be married.

Hollywood was overjoyed. This wacky town is basically romantic, even though it begrudges certain people happiness. For instance, nobody knocked anybody out to see that Marlon Brando won this year's Oscar. But from the moment that Sarah Jane Fulks, self-titled Jane Durrell, came bouncing into the film colony in the late thirties, everybody has wanted her to get everything her generous heart desired. She's been such a fine loyal friend to so many people. She's become a superb actress and is such a wonderful mother to her kids. And ever since she and Ronnie Reagan parted, five years ago, Hollywood has worried about her.

Thus it was great news that she was thinking of marrying again. But a little more than three weeks after her announcement came a shocker. Jane Wyman, again via Louella, told the world she had canceled her engagement to Travis. But they were, she said, still the best of friends.

For once, that most polite of Hollywood's fictions, is completely true. Janie and Trav are such understanding friends that they see one another constantly, are each other's favorite companion—or as Jane says, "We became engaged to take the special Hollywood pressures off us, and then we broke our engagement for the very same reason." Actually they are waiting to act wisely rather than impulsively, waiting to know one another, as well as be fascinated by one another, waiting for several very special factors in both their lives to be worked out.

Many a girl has done what Janie almost did this March: seen a guy, fallen pretty hard, told herself she was completely in love. And any fellow, like Trav, would naturally tumble for a human dynamo like Jane, who also possesses beauty, fame and terrific charm. But to have the sheer social courage to call "whoa" on yourself, as Jane did, in order to be sure that this was the love that leads to marriage takes character. It also takes trust and love to do as Trav did and to say, "Darling, you're nuts, but if that's the way you want it, that's the way it is."

Actually—and amusingly—they didn't fall in love with one another at first sight. (They didn't even like each other very much.) They met at a dinner party in the home of mutual friends, where they sat next to each other at a table.

"I seem to have been in a dignified mood," Janie says, now, grinning. "Don't ask me why; I don't know. Maybe I was having a hangover from the Blue Veil or something. Anyhow, after dinner when Trav asked me if I'd dance I gave him the 'no thank you,' bit.

"However, as the evening wore on, and I noticed how everybody in the room was responding to his good nature, I warmed up a little, and just before the party broke up, when we were all out in the kitchen eating chili and beans, I began to think this was someone I might be interested in knowing. He must have got my message, because just at that moment, Trav looked over (Continued on page 103)

Three weeks after Jane and Travis Kleefeld announced their engagement, they called it off. Yet the Hollywood cliche "best of friends" applies.

There's the case of the calendar nude —and the riddle of my plunging necklines. These are the things that set the critics on my trail and raise the question . . .

Am I too DARING?

by Marilyn Monroe

Gold sculptured swim suit by Rose Marie Reid

■ Am I too daring?

I ask this question in all sincerity because, in recent months, a number of influential women have told me that perhaps I am. I have been accused of having horrible taste in clothes, told that I am flaunting the gentler traditions of womanhood, and that I have made a common display of my figure on every social occasion.

In my own heart, I cannot believe that these accusations are true, and when they first began to appear in several of the Hollywood columns, they hurt me deeply. I felt that perhaps I had unintentionally offended someone. Then I ran through every possible reason why I should be attacked on these grounds, and I worried.

Quite understandably, when a girl is just starting her career in Hollywood, she can't help but worry when she wakes up one morning and reads that perhaps she is seriously jeopardizing her motion picture career by the way she dresses. That's potent criticism, and it pays to consider it carefully.

In my case, I had a special reason to worry—one which, at the time, made it impossible for me to answer back. Frankly, I was concerned about how Hollywood was going to accept the news that only a few weeks before, on January first, 1952, to be exact, a nude calendar for which I posed in 1949 had turned up on garage and barber shop walls all over America. Only a few people knew it was me, but I realized it would be just a matter of time until someone on the newspapers tracked down the story.

HE'S REALLY LIVING!

Wine, women and Tchaikowsky —mix 'em all together and they spell Cochran, a guy who knows how to live alone and love it!

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

An avid home movie fan, Steve is producing a dramatic chase film entitled Embarkadero. Here, he and cameraman Jack Hagney shoot a scene between Eddie Norris and Bill Kalviano.

Getting ready for a close-up sequence, Jack trains the up-to-date 16-millimeter sound camera on Eddie, while Bill holds the identifying slate. Steve and soundman Al Riggs look on.

Steve's such a busy guy he never gets time for his other hobbies, writing and painting. He's also a "Sunday afternoon sailor"—one day a week is all he can spare for his 24-foot ketch.

Story conference on set (Steve's living room): Monte Pittman, Jack, Barbara Logan, Eddie, Steve, and Bill, all deep in discussion.

■ Steve Cochran is a character. "But I'm not a Bohemian," he announces. "A Bohemian uses bacon for bookmarks." Despite his denial, it's probable that Steve Cochran would use bacon for a bookmark, if he couldn't find a bookmark. He would also do a lot of other things that ordinary, nose-to-the-grindstone actors would not ever do. Who else in Hollywood would keep a parrot named Clarence, and a dog named Tchaikowsky who plays the piano? Who else would admit with a devilish grin that women are his favorite hobby but that marriage makes him miserable?

Here is a man who even gets Hollywood excited, because he is like no man Hollywood ever saw before. He is lazy, but always interested; he is casual but suggests controlled power; he plays at love, but his heart is with the sea; he lives in a house that looks as if it were built by a madman.

The house climbs a hill in Benedict Canyon, and the living room clutches the top of it. Walk through the door and you come face to face with a bar, and if you keep your head up you're liable to be conked on it by a four-by-four beam that is slung low (Continued on page 100)

Author Monte Pittman serves up the salaries in Steve's kitchen—two hamburgers and a cup of coffee per person! Nobody complains.

Dear Esther...

What do people write to movie stars? Here's your chance to read Esther Williams' mail before she does and see what reporter Jim Henaghan wrote to this aqua-queen

Dear Esther:

I address this letter to you with some hesitation. I think mainly because I intend having it published and read by a couple of million people before you see it. That, I suppose, could be called opening somebody else's mail—a nasty habit, according to the mailman on my street.

There must have been another way to do this but it has not occurred to me. The point is, you see, that I have a few matters to take up with you—and some things to write about you that require a broader medium than stationery—so the "open letter" serves my purpose admirably.

Now before you get nervous and begin howling for the postal inspectors, let me assure you that this is not the usual type of open letter, the kind generally used in magazines to caution a star that she is wayward, backward or headed for trouble. I have not heard that you and Ben have decided to call your marriage a silly infatuation, so I have no instructions to give you about your family life. I have not heard that you refused to go back-stroking with some rabid fan in the Wichita, Kansas high school pool, so I do not intend to warn you that such conduct can cost you the support of thousands of waterlogged admirers.

The simple truth is that I have been trying to get to talk to you in person for the past three weeks and have found it impossible. Oh, I have been given splendid cooperation at your studio. As a matter of fact, I have had the place in an uproar. And if anyone had been listening in on the conversations (Continued on page 68)

Ever since the day a big boxer named Jezebel arrived, Alan Ladd's let his house go straight to the dogs!

BY JIM BURTON

Boxer Jezebel moved into the Ladds' present home as a member of the family. Alan said then, "Dogs will always be a part of our life and our home."

Jezebel, dachshund Fritzie II, and another boxer, Brindie, jealously guard their positions as the three housedogs. Other pups are on the ranch.

■ The business about dogs was decided right off by the Alan Ladds; and it didn't take more than ten seconds. It was the day the Ladds moved into their present home. More than a year of planning and building had gone into the house and grounds, for this was the place Alan and Sue knew they were going to live in for the rest of their lives. And as they turned in from the street and onto the black top driveway, they liked what they saw. The whole family was along—Carol Lee, Laddie, Alana and little David and Jezebel, a large boxer dog.

The Ladds got out of the car, inhaled the fine clean air of their hilltop and admired the flowers in the beds that flanked the house. Then, in a body, they marched to the front door and Alan inserted his key beneath the fancy brass door knob. The kids pushed open the door and scampered inside. Alan and Sue took a little longer, because this was their dream, and they stood just inside the entrance letting the magnificence of the house seep in. The living room was to the right, like something out of a picture book. The dining room, with its long table was to the left and beyond that the playroom. Before them, facing on the garden and pool was a sitting room, carpeted in a soft grey and furnished with fat, puffy sofas and a pair of splendid black coffee tables.

Everybody took it big but Jezebel. She walked slowly around the room for a moment, sniffing at the strange things there, and then, on a doggish whim or in an instant of uncertainty, she tried a small section of the living room rug for absorbent qualities.

The howl from Sue Ladd's lips could have been heard a block away. Jezebel leaped ten feet and took off with Sue after her. The occasion, in a fraction of a second, changed from a glad entry into a new life into a dog hunt, with everyone but Alan joining in, and Jezebel scurrying about like a cornered pony in a tea shop. As she passed him for the third time, Alan grabbed Sue.

"Now, hold on a minute, honey," he said. "Do you like that dog?"

"Of course I do," wailed Sue, "but did you see what she just did to my new rug?"

"Sure I did," said Alan, "but there's one thing we have to make up our minds about right now. Dogs will always be a part of our life and our home. Now this (Continued on page 80)

Joan Crawford

stepped out of nowhere, right into a dream—

it's hard to remember where that dream world ends and reality begins . . .

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

Joan Crawford invented herself. She made herself up right out of whole cloth and now she is torn between being pleased with the result and feeling inadequate.

She didn't make up her background, nor does she try to conceal it. The early days in Kansas City when she lived in the back room of a laundry, the schooldays which were all work for tuition and no time for study, the rough New York chorus girl days, the time at Stevens' College when she was rejected by a sorority because the other girls found out she was working her way through as a waitress. . .

She felt the need of a personality change. Although she cried when her real name, Lucille Le Sueur, was changed to Joan Crawford she immediately began to become Joan Crawford the film star. As such she has a tremendous feeling of responsibility toward the public who've made her what she is. But what, indeed, is she?

She's a woman who needs constant and daily praise to build up her faltering ego. When Franchot Tone was married to her, he once remarked, "Joan is hurt if I don't tell her how gorgeous she looks every time she walks down the stairs for dinner. Well, she does look gorgeous. But so does a sunset and you can't keep saying every night, 'How gorgeous is the sunset.'"

An ex-executive of the Capitol Theater in New York tells this story. It happened when Joan was at the height of her career.

She was in New York at the same time that a new movie of hers was playing at the Capitol. Her fans waited in line for hours fighting and scratching to be the first to get in when the doors opened at 10:30 A.M. "It's a different kind of audience from any you have ever seen," the executive told Joan.

Naturally Joan had to see and hear this but, he warned her, "It's as much as my job is worth and as much as your life is worth if those mad, crazy kids get a whiff of you."

JOAN WORKS AT KEEPING THE CRAWFORD MYTH ALIVE TWENTY-FOUR HOURS A DAY, EVERY DAY.

Joan's aware that publicity keeps a myth alive. When she tore her hem in a New York night club, she knew how to turn it into a news item.

In front of the camera, Joan displays a high powered brand of sex appeal that has fans believing she's like that in person.

Joan's a Crawford perfectionist in all things, but it's nowhere more apparent than in the way she's bringing up her children.

FOR THE LOVE OF MIKE

by Virginia Mayo

■ Sooner or later in every interview, Mike and I are asked why we don't go out oftener than we do. That's a natural enough question, I suppose. We almost never go to parties, nightclubs, or any of the places that make up the "nightlife" of Hollywood.

Why not? The question never fails to fluster me. I hate to run the risk of sounding prudish or disapproving when actually I am neither of these things.

My husband, however, is rarely bothered by questions like that. He has a direct Irish way of putting things that makes our attitude sound as unpretentious as it really is.

"Virginia and I," he says, "don't go for big affairs. In fact, we have more fun doing nothing together than many married couples at a ball."

That's true. Especially the part about the togetherness of our life. During the five years of our marriage, Mike and I have seldom been apart. We have lived simply, and I doubt if anyone would consider our daily existence glamorous and exciting.

It's amazing how much a woman can come to depend upon the mere presence of the man she loves. I know that I am never really serene or happy unless Mike is there. Even on the nights when the baseball games come on television and his whole attention is absorbed in the play, I feel completely at peace. All I need to do is look up from the book I'm reading and see Mike enjoying the game, then I am happy, too.

We used to go out more than we do. We still go to nightclubs when any of our favorite entertainers come to town. But both Mike and I spent too (Continued on page 95) the story behind today's headlines:

THE FIGHT FOR INGRID BERGMAN'S DAUGHTER

■ The anticipated battle for Ingrid Bergman's daughter has begun. Ingrid, who is expecting twins this month, desperately wants her 13-year-old daughter to spend the summer with her in Italy. She has petitioned the Superior Court of California to appoint a travelling companion (not Dr. Lindstrom) for her child. She objects to Dr. Lindstrom because she feels that his presence would lend an air of "exceptionality, tension and quarrel" to the visit. Dr. Lindstrom is opposed to the meeting's taking place in Italy, stating that he doesn't want his daughter to be outside the jurisdiction of the United States courts. Last summer, Dr. Lindstrom took his daughter to Ingrid in London. There are two versions of what happened during that visit (see Ingrid's affidavit and Dr. Lindstrom's refutation). Suspicion and distrust on both sides accompany Ingrid's present request to see her daughter. The final word, however, rests with the California Superior Court, Case D397287 MODERN SCREEN takes no sides in this custody dispute. It simply presents the legal documents in the case and suggests that the readers judge the issue themselves.

Ingrid Bergman Rossellini, formerly known as Ingrid Bergman Lindstrom, deposes and says:

The following is a chronology of the facts surrounding my inability to visit with my daughter Pia.

In 1949, I went to Italy as an actress in the photoplay Stromboli.

While in Italy I advised my former husband, Doctor Peter Lindstrom, that the dissolution of our marriage was necessary. The photoplay was not concluded until late September 1949 and it was, therefore, impossible for me to have my daughter with me during the summer vacation of 1949.

After the photoplay was completed, a great deal of unfortunate publicity was given the situation surrounding my separation and subsequent divorce from Dr. Lindstrom and my marriage to my present husband, Mr. Roberto Rossellini. Litigation was then instituted between Dr. Lindstrom and myself in the California Courts and after many months of negotiations between our respective attorneys in California a property settlement agreement was finally executed on April 19, 1950.

I made numerous requests to have my daughter Pia visit me in Europe during the summer vacation period of 1950. My many re-

1. I am the plaintiff in this action. I make this affidavit in opposition to the application of defendant for an order granting permission to defendant to have our minor child PIA LINDSTROM visit with defendant in Rome, Italy, as set forth in the Notice of Motion therefor, dated April 9, 1952, and in the affidavit of defendant which was filed in support thereof.

2. In particular I make this affidavit for the purpose of answering and refuting the false, misleading and distorted statements which are contained in the affidavit of my former wife, defendant herein. It is with great reluctance that I find myself compelled to state the facts hereinafter set forth, first and primarily because I would have preferred to spare my child Pia any further publicity and embarrassment which must result from the airing of these issues, and secondly because the rectification of some of the half-truths contained in the defendant's affidavit requires me to set forth facts which up to now I had felt it unnecessary to disclose.

3. For over three years while defendant and her spokesmen have utilized every avenue of publicity in an attempt to vindicate her actions before the world, I have remained silent and have answered "No comment!" to every attempt to elicit my reactions and that of Pia quests were denied by Dr. Lindstrom because he would not permit our daughter to come to Europe unless and until I had signed certain papers and the California Court made a decree concerning her custody. This attitude of Dr. Lindstrom's was apparently prompted by his belief that if there were no such decree I would steal the child and never return her to the United States.

It was not until September 30, 1950 that an interlocutory decree of divorce was granted which I permitted Dr. Lindstrom to obtain without contest on my part. During the negotiations that led to that solution, I was informed that a visit with Pia could take place in the latter part of that summer. Subsequently, however, in a direct telephone conversation with me Dr. Lindstrom indicated that this was not his intention but that he would do his best to bring the child over for Christmas 1950. This visit, too, never materialized.

The pertinent provisions of above mentioned interlocutory decree respecting the custody of Pia are as follows:

"3. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the present best interest of the minor child of the parties hereto, Pia Lindstrom, requires that she reside and receive her education in the State of California.

"4. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that plaintiff and defendant shall have the joint legal custody of said minor child but it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff Peter A. Lindstrom shall have her physical custody, care, protection; control and education.

"5. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, that, subject to the provisions of Paragraph 6 as in this Judgment provided, defendant shall have the right to have the said minor child with her during one-half of the said minor child's school vacation periods, and plaintiff shall have the right to have said minor child with him during the remaining one-half of such school vacation periods.

"6. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, that if either plaintiff or defendant desires to take the minor child of the parties hereto, Pia Lindstrom, from the United States, the party desiring to do so shall first make an application therefor to the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles upon (5) days' written notice to the other party, and first securing an order of the above-entitled court permitting such removal."

In connection with the proposed visitation during the summer of 1951, Dr. Lindstrom stated that he would not bring Pia to Italy, assigning as the reason therefor the fact that he did not intend our daughter to come under the "influence" of my husband Roberto Rossellini, to whom I am still happily married and who is the father of my son Robertino Rossellini. In my desperate anxiety to see my daughter Pia after almost three years of separation from her, I agreed that this visit with my daughter Pia could take place in one of three European countries suggested by Dr. Lindstrom, England, Denmark or Sweden.

Subsequently, I agreed with Dr. Lindstrom by long distance telephone that the visitation would be in London, England. Some time later I received a cablegram from Dr. Lindstrom, which was sent from New York, at the moment of boarding the ship that was taking him and Pia (Continued on page 86) to the conduct of defendant which gave rise to this action for divorce against her. Despite the circumstances of the case, I have never felt that she should be deprived on that account of the privilege of seeing the child. As respects the rights of visitation by defendant with the child, I realize that the sole consideration should be what is for the best interests of the child. Based on that sole consideration, I am convinced that it would not be for the best interests of Pia for the motion of defendant to be granted.

DOCTOR LINDSTROM'S SIDE OF THE STORY

4. For the convenience of the Court, I shall answer the statements of defendant as contained in her affidavit of March 4, 1952 in the order in which they are therein set forth. The references to page and lines will refer to the pages and lines of defendant's said affidavit.

5. Defendant states (page 1, lines 6 to 11) that it was impossible for her to have Pia with her during the summer vacation of 1949, because she was making the photoplay Stromboli.

ANSWER: Actually, before defendant went to Italy in the spring of 1949 to make this picture, I had arranged with her that I would come to Italy with Pia that summer, as soon as the child's summer vacation started, and the three of us (defendant, Pia and I) would spend at least a month together vacationing in Europe. Whatever opportunity there would have been for such vacation was shattered when I received a letter which defendant wrote to me within two weeks after her arrival in Italy that spring, which letter reads as follows:

"Amalfi
3 April 1949

"Petter lilla (Petter dear)—

It will be very difficult for you to read this letter and it is difficult for me to write it. But I believe it is the only way. I would like to explain everything from the beginning, but you know enough, and I would like to ask forgiveness, but that seems ridiculous. It is not all together my fault and how can you forgive that I want to stay with Roberto. I know he has also written you and told you all that there is to tell. It was not my intention to fall in love and go to Italy forever. After all our plans and dreams, you know that is true. But how can I help it or change it? You saw in Hollywood how my enthusiasm for Roberto grew and grew and you know how much alike we are, with the same desire for the same kind of work and the same understanding of life. I thought maybe I could conquer the feeling I had for him when I saw him in his own milieu, so different from mine. But it turned out just the opposite. The people, the life, the country is not strange, it is what I always wanted. I had not the courage to talk more about him at home than I did with you as it all seemed so incredible, like an adventure, and at the time I didn't realize the depth of his feelings. Min Petter (my Petter), I know how this letter falls like a bomb on our house, our Pelle (Pelle being the name which defendant and I had planned to give to our next child), our future, our past so filled with sacrifice and help on your part. And now you stand alone in the ruins and I am unable to help you.

"Stackars lilla pappa men also stackars lilla Mama (Poor little papa but also poor little mama)."

Defendant did not even mention Pia in this letter!

Far from not having an opportunity to have Pia with her during the summer of 1949, the fact is that I went to Italy in May of 1949 and entreated with defendant to talk to Pia, whom I offered to bring over to any place in Europe except Italy so as to make defendant understand that she had to explain to the child herself the reasons why defendant was not coming home. Defendant at that time agreed to meet the child and myself later in the summer, but a few weeks later defendant repudiated her promise (Continued on page 88)

MISS SHOW BUSINESS

by Jane Wilkie

Betty wasn't much older than her two daughters, Candy and Lindsay, when she started singing in her mother's speakeasy.

On stage, Betty's a dynamo, always has the audience yelling for more. Here she makes a costume change while the Skylarks back her up with a vocal at the Palace theater.

Husband Charles O'Curran and Blossom Seely, a top old-time stage star, and one of Betty's ardent fans, congratulate her after her smash success at the Palace opening night.

■ It was 1933. The house lights in the Detroit theater were dim, and the spotlight circled the group on stage. The master of ceremonies was holding his hand over the head of a small dark-haired girl who had just finished a tap dance in the nightly amateur contest. The applause was thundering. Then he moved his hand over the head of the skinny blonde kid who had sung "Somebody Loves Me," and the response was equally deafening. The master of ceremonies shrugged and smiled. "Ladies and gentlemen, it looks like a tie." He returned a dollar bill to his pocket, pulled out two 50-cent pieces and presented one to each child. The freckled blonde stood immobile, biting her lip in fury. Then she walked deliberately over to the other girl and gave her the half dollar.

"I wasn't being sweet, I wasn't being generous," says Betty Hutton now. "I just didn't want any part of second money."

This is perhaps the whole secret of Betty's drive and determination to be the world's greatest entertainer. She isn't happy unless she comes off with top honors, and in the past few years she has seldom finished anywhere but first.

Last April she was once again a winner when she was presented with a plaque by Major General William Kean in recognition of her work in entertaining troops on the Korean front. It was the first such award to be given and orders for its presentation came from Secretary of the Army Frank Pace, Jr. The other who went (Continued on page 61)

I THINK I WAS BORN BELIEVING IN PEOPLE. AND THROUGH THEM, I LEARNED TO BELIEVE IN GOD, TOO.

by Donald O'Connor

■ A child has to make up his own ideas to begin with. Probably, because of my unconventional upbringing in the theater, my first spiritual conception of life was completely out of the normal groove—I worshipped people. All people and especially those who made up the audiences I first met as an infant when my mother and father would carry me on stage at the end of their performance.

There would be a round of laughter and applause, and apart from the "ham" in me liking it, something deeper was stirred. I know this because up to about the age of seven or eight, and even afterwards, I had a sort of supernatural awe of our audiences. . .

As my family toured the country sickness would strike us, and even death, but nothing like that ever seemed to happen to the people. There they would be every night, no matter what theater, no matter what town, looking up at us, laughing and responding exactly the same as always. It never struck me that they were made up of different individuals. And since I also sensed that our own fate depended directly on their feelings toward us, and we deferred to them in all things, adjusting our lives, you might say, in a constant effort to please them, they actually took on the stature of deities to me.

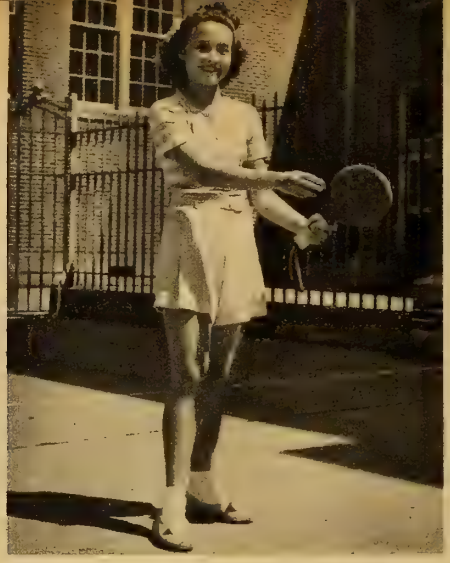
This was my belief before I even knew that I was a Catholic, and I haven't outgrown it yet altogether, even though in time I turned formally to my own religion. There is a power in people . . . a power for good. This ties in with my present professional thinking, of course. My time is spent thinking of what to do for them, but behind it is the knowledge that they have done everything for me. (Continued on page 97)

Jane Powell's a big-city glamor girl now—but her heart's still back in Portland, Oregon, her home town. Here, for the first time in any magazine, is an authentic account, with pictures, of a little known phase in her fabulous career.

MY HOME TOWN

by Jane Powell

■ Just about this time of year, Portland, Oregon, my home town, will be abloom with color and excitement and flowers. Visitors will come from all over America to see the famous annual Rose Festival. How I wish I could be there! I would like to stand on the sidelines with my husband Geary and watch the parade. Then I might recapture the wonderful thrill I had nine years ago when I was riding down the street myself on one of the biggest and prettiest of the floats.



Every now and then, I am overcome with nostalgia for my home town. I don't think I'll ever lose the special feeling I have for the place where I was born and where I lived the first 14 years of my life.

This spring, when I received an invitation to the pageant from the Portland Rose Festival committee, I showed the letter to Geary, who stared moodily into space after he read it.

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"I just realized that I don't (Continued on following page)

Later in 1943 Jane signed a movie contract, went to Hollywood for Song Of The Open Road. Marshall Thompson was an early beau.

Jane quickly became one of the most popular girls in Hollywood's younger set. Here she's with Roddy McDowall, Scotty Beckett.

And then . . . she met a young man named Geary Steffen, whose quiet courtship won her heart—and hand. They married in Nov. 1949.

know much about your life as a girl in Portland," he laughed. "Maybe you had another fellow."

"Of course, I did," I replied. "Lots of them."

That night, for the first time since we were married Geary and I had a long talk about my childhood. I don't know why we haven't discussed it before. I guess we've been too busy living our life together to do much reminiscing about the past.

It's not easy for me to explain how I feel about Portland. It's a big city, one of the biggest in the Pacific Northwest. Proud Oregonians will rush to tell you about its booming industry, its majestic scenic beauties, and its rapid population growth. But I don't think of Portland that way. To me, it will always be the warm and neighborly place that ten years ago took a little girl named Suzanne Burce to its heart and helped her become what she is today.

I believe I owe more to my home town than any other performer in Hollywood. Some actresses got their first encouragement in their home towns. Others were given their first professional experience there. But no one I have met in Hollywood ever received the whole-hearted support I did from the people of Portland.

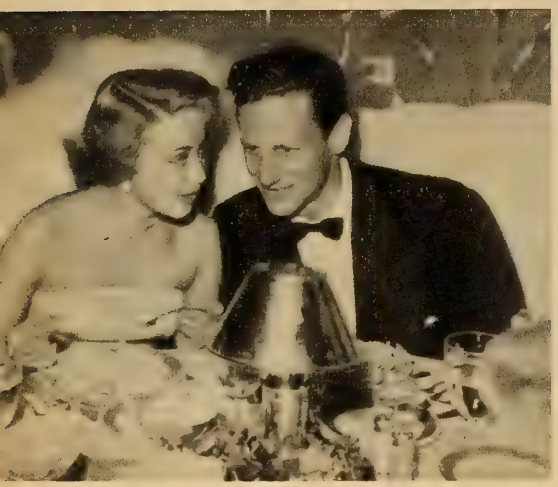
I might not be in Hollywood today if it weren't for C. W. Myers, the late president of Portland's local station, KOIN. Mr. Myers arranged for me to appear on "Hollywood Showcase" during the summer of 1943, when I was on a vacation in Southern California with my parents. At that time, I didn't have the vaguest dream about a Hollywood career. In fact, my big ambition was to get back to Portland for the fall term at Grant High School. I never made it, I signed to make my first movie, instead. With Song Of The Open Road, the whole pattern of my life was changed.

Unfortunately, that is the point where

Jane was overjoyed when her parents bought a house on Going street. Even drying dishes was fun, when it was done in their own home.

All through grade school, Jane's best friend was Nancy Dickson Huntzinger, who's now a switchboard operator in Portland. They still correspond.

When Jane became Oregon's Victory Girl, one of her biggest thrills was meeting Lana Turner during the 1943 bond drive.



Today, Jane, Geary and their year-old son, Geary III, live in this charming tree-shaded home on a secluded street in suburban L. A.

Jane Powell, the sophisticated movie star to whom night clubs, parties and costume balls are every day activities, has come a long way from the schoolgirl she once was.

most stories about me have begun. To be sure, appearing on "Hollywood Showcase" was one of the greatest moments of my life. But there were many things, important to me, that went before. Mother has told me that my first public appearance in Portland was at the annual recital of the Agnes Peters Dancing School, presented in the auditorium of Grant High School. I was only four-and-a-half at the time, and according to Mother, I wore a kitten costume she made and sang a number called, "Sitting On The Backyard Fence." I remember the lyrics better than the occasion, I'm afraid, but (Continued on following page)

Low cut evening gowns, and high tone supper clubs are things that little Suzanne Burce could dream about—but to Jane Powell, they're real.

No more clowning on the sand. A dignified Jane and Geary are served lunch in style at their beach club on one of their rare vacation days.

"In Hollywood, I've found a career, a loving husband, and a son," says Jane. "But I will always remember my wonderful old home town!"

it was at this recital that Carl Werner saw me. Later, as my agent and adviser, he played an important role in my career in Portland.

I don't think I was precocious about dancing and singing. I remember little about my lessons. I took them with several other little girls, and was always glad to get away from studying to play.

My first year in school didn't leave any deep impression on me, either. I know that I went to Irvington School, and that it was a long walk to get there. Mother used to worry about me because I always stopped to play hide 'n' seek in some houses that were being built in the neighborhood. I quit this game after a board fell on my foot.

The next year, I transfered to Fernwood, a school 12 blocks from the Broadway apartment house my folks managed. I remember my second grade class very well because there I met my first boyfriend, Larry Larsen. It wasn't exactly a romance, but we had a mutual bond. I bit my nails and Larry sucked his thumb. Our teacher, Miss Shaw, used to pay us a dime for each week that we controlled our nervous habits in class. All the time that I went to Fernwood, which was through the sixth grade, I came home every day for lunch, and I had to run both ways in order to get back before the bell.

My best friend at Fernwood was Larry's sister Norma with whom I played every afternoon after school. I didn't have a room of my own, but slept on a couch in the living room under a window, and I used to hand my doll things out to Norma through the window. Mother didn't approve of this, but it saved a lot of time.

My grade school days were perfectly normal. I was an average student, thought more about playing than anything else. Mother let me quit my dancing lessons when I lost interest in the third grade. I didn't begin singing lessons until I was almost 11 years old, and I nearly stopped them because I dreaded practicing so much.

I took my first singing lessons from Mrs. Olson, who had an office in an old brick building across from the Lipman and Wolfe Department Store. Mother let me ride the bus back and forth by myself, and these twice weekly trips, my first solo expeditions into downtown Portland, made me feel important. More clearly than the lessons themselves, I remember the creaky old elevator in the building which stopped erratically whenever it took a notion. I was so afraid that I'd get stuck between floors that I usually walked up the four flights to Mrs. Olson's office.

While I was in the sixth grade, we moved to another neighborhood but I still went to Fernwood, even though it meant walking even farther to school. Norma Larsen was still my best friend, too, and she often went downtown with me on the bus.

I remember the first shopping expedition we made together, one Saturday when our mothers allowed each of us to buy a dress by ourselves at Sears Roebuck. The dresses we selected were pretty enough, but my mother was furious because our dresses were exactly alike. (Continued on page 82)

That Betty made such a hit is no accident. When she is on stage, whether it be the dais of one of the world's plushier theaters, or a platform of crude boards erected on a windswept and frozen plain, she works on her audience with the precision and determination of a skilled surgeon. She knows her audience, feels it like the throb of her own heart, and if there is one person present who has not yet been won over to her she will go on working and sweating until that one laggard has succumbed to the Hutton hoop and holler and is blistering his hands in appreciation of her talent.

To Betty, an audience is like a conquest in love. She is never truly happy, in her own sense of the word, unless she is on stage and sensing the great warmth that pours over the footlights. She has never let an audience go until she has known that she has won, known that they love her.

The audience is seldom aware of her intensity. They know only that they are being entertained as they have never been entertained before. They are unaware of her exhaustion. Few know that in the wings of the stage, waiting for Betty, are always a straight chair, two glasses of water and a large towel. Betty will come off dripping wet, fighting for breath, and sink into the chair. Those who watch her post-performance for the first time, want to call a doctor. Her face shows the strain, her breathing comes in quick little gasps, and it is always a couple of minutes before she has the proper control to drink the water, then take the towel and mop herself from head to foot.

Why does she put herself through such a tortuous ordeal? Because she loves it, because it is her whole life.

PEOPLE are slow to fathom the myriad talents that make a great performer. They take it for granted that Betty Hutton earns her living merely by singing songs, sometimes by a few accompanying acrobatics. They are pleased by her energy, by her vitality. In May, Betty finished up a four week stint at the Palace Theater in New York. She did two shows a day and in each she was 'on' for two solid hours, singing her heart out, seemingly never touching her feet to the stage. Audiences felt drained just watching her, and when they were sure she must be too tired to move another step, she brought her act to a close by swinging out over the audience on a trapeze. The Palace engagement was her first real starring show on Broadway, and it was then that people began to know there is more to Hutton's act than singing a song and "a few acrobatics."

There is a great deal more. Betty knows show business from top to bottom and inside out. She knows lighting, costuming, orchestration, stage decoration, every facet of it, and she knows when to come on stage and how, what to do while she's on, and how and when to leave. She knows contracts and their legal points as well as a corporation lawyer, and Abe Lastfogel, who has been her agent since she was a $75-a-week singer, brags that Betty is the smartest client he's ever had.

When she was only three she sang in the blind pig operated by her mother in Lansing. She sang primarily for the money, but she also sang with the determination that one day she would be a headliner. When she was barely old enough to remember lyrics, she began picking up hints from the customers.

"Hey, kid, can you do a soft shoe routine?"

"Here's my hat—wear it on the side of your head. Like that—that's got it."

From speakeasies she went to street singing. She'd sing anywhere there was a crowd and take the nickels and dimes home to Mom. Her sister Marion called a halt when it came to warbling on the streets—she felt it was too improper. But Betty didn't care. They needed the money, and she needed the experience. She used to plague her mother to take her into beer gardens, dance halls, any place she "could get training." She knew, even then, that this was to be her life and she had to prepare herself for it.

Mabel Hutton moved with her daughters to Detroit at the time amateur contests were sweeping the theaters of the country, and Betty promptly entered every one held in the area. It was there she learned about booby traps. Many of the theater managers considered it hilarious if the contestants were showered with water or pelted with tomatoes, and proceeded to install Rube Goldberg gadgets destined to upset the performers. The first time Betty met up with one of these assaults she held back the stinging tears and went on with her act as though nothing had happened. But they never caught her again. After that she 'cased the joint' a week before the contest and learned how to outmaneuver the contraptions. Her agility at ducking got even bigger laughs than the direct hits scored on other contestants.

With Vincent Lopez and his band she learned more. She had sung sweet songs in a sweet manner until the night she heard Lopez decided to fire her, and then for the first time she went into the gymnastic gyrations that have since become famous as the Hutton trademark. She assaulted her audience and they loved it, and Betty learned the value of surprise. She began wearing what is still her basic costume—a large bouffant skirt, a high-necked bodice with a prim Peter Pan collar and large flowing sleeves. She'd sit quietly in front of the band, with folded hands and a quiet smile. The people who noticed her would think how like a blonde angel she looked. When her cue would come she'd float to the microphone and sing the verse of her song in soft and wistful tones. Then, suddenly, Betty would let loose on the chorus with a screaming attack that rocked the audience back on their heels.

But it wasn't enough for Betty. Although she had gone every day for a year to watch vaudevillians at local theaters, studying their techniques in getting on and off stage, she felt she must know more. When later she worked at the Casa Manana, the headliners were such people as Lou Holtz and Helen Morgan. Holtz, a dynamic showman himself, taught her how to swing on stage via the curtain, and Helen Morgan helped her with her hands. Betty had never known what to do with her hands, felt they were awkward, and admired the daintiness of Helen Morgan. Even later, when she went to Hollywood, Betty kept learning. Blossom Seeley taught her how to 'work small,' during the filming of Somebody Loves Me, how to take smaller steps, work her whole body more tightly, and in recent years Betty has adopted much of this technique which is more suitable to her current style.

NOTHING Betty Hutton does on stage is an accident. Her smallest gesture is studied. For her recent show at the Palace she supervised the draping of the stage, the orchestral arrangements, and in short, produced the whole show. Her costumes were basically the same as those in Korea, although much more elegant for New York. She made her costume changes on stage, with two members of the Skylarks holding a cleverly designed wraparound skirt in front of her, curtain style. In Korea she had done the same thing, only with a much simpler skirt. She had worn her own ski clothes there, knowing the boys wanted her to be attractive and not hung with a dreary fatigue outfit. She stripped down to a leotard for them, despite the sub-zero weather, and sang so loud they forgot their surroundings.

She knows the importance of clothes, and changes them deftly to suit her style. She has abandoned the adolescent curls and now wears her hair in a braided chignon through which she weaves yarn or flowers. She decries the habit of girl singers wearing sexy clothes. "It isn't right for show business," she says. "You come out looking sexy and right away you've lost every woman in the audience. Win the women first, then you've got the men."

If Hutton has a good audience she gives them a great show, but if she has a tough audience she pulls out her bag of tricks, determined to get them in her lap if it is the last thing she does. She swings on the curtains, topples the microphone, runs through the audience, takes pratfalls, makes somersaults, tears up the music, runs through the entire orchestra kissing the musicians (nimbly avoiding the instruments, which could easily trip her into a bad fall), and if all else fails she will grab the band leader and throw him across the stage. Once she shot off the boards and landed on top of the drummer in the pit. She is just as violent with others as she is with herself. Bob Hope's teeth caps once went flying across the stage as a result of a Hutton backslap. Eddie Bracken was tossed over a bar in a movie scene, and actor Frank Faylen was knocked out cold with a right to the jaw when a director demanded realism. Danny Kaye and Betty once did a show together in which she was required to give him a series of hearty shoves. "I could have killed that girl then," he says. "She had so much energy that I finished up like a limp rag."

Despite her RPM record, Betty has never sustained the slightest injury during her brisk workouts, a fact which adds up to a small miracle because she is continually risking her life and limb. She must necessarily keep herself in excellent physical condition and it has become almost a fetish with her. She conscientiously eats a strictly balanced diet and when working, is in bed every night at eight o'clock. The times she allows herself the luxury of being a night owl at clubs or restaurants are so rare that she talks about them for weeks afterward.

One of Betty's favorite evenings, a few years ago, was being hostess at dinner to Fannie Brice and Sophie Tucker. There is nothing she would rather talk about than show business, and she let her dinner go almost untouched while listening raptly as Brice and Tucker spun their yarns of bygone days. It is safe to say that while Betty was listening, she was also sponging ideas from the two veterans, for she is too anxious to learn, even today, to let any bit of information drop out of sight and mind.

Despite her unfinished formal schooling and her preoccupation since with the entertainment world, Betty meets people well, and has remarked that the greater human beings are always the simplest people, the easiest to talk to. When in Korea she was charmed by General Ridgway, and Mrs. Ridgway gave a tea for her. Eight years ago, on a vacation at Camelback Inn, she was introduced to the president of Encylopedia Britannica, who was there with his family. When he asked her to join them for dinner Betty had understandable qualms about talking with such a brilliant man, but it turned out that he cornered her in conversation for hours on end that evening. She couldn't comprehend why he should want to talk to her, even though he spent the rest of his stay at the inn telling other guests about Betty's fabulous life and razor-sharp intellect.

Toward the end of the war she met General Eisenhower in Washington at a Birthday Ball.

"I'm so happy to meet you, at last," he said.

Betty was astounded. "Why?" she said.

He told her then that he had been so fond of Miracle Of Morgan's Creek that whenever things were going badly and he was depressed he saw the picture, and that after at least a half dozen times he still felt it was the only thing that could give him a lift, make him feel that things weren't so bad after all. That sank into Betty's heart with a gratifying warmth. What other business in the world gives so much to so many, and has a chance to lift the spirits of even such wise and esteemed men as Dwight Eisenhower?

Show time hasn't always been a happy time for Betty. There was the summer she was 14 and went to Louisville, Kentucky, with a newly formed band. The orchestra leader took the week's pay for the band and left town, stranding Betty and the boys with insufficient funds for their next meal, let alone train fare home. If it hadn't been for the wealthy tobacco family who had been frequent customers of Louisville's Chez Paris and had fallen in love with Betty, there is no telling what may have happened. The Hill family took her home with them to their big house and cared for her until Mabel Hutton was sent the train fare to come and claim her deserted daughter.

There was the benefit show at the Los Angeles Shrine Auditorium, a mammoth place whose farthest seats almost prevent sight of the stage. Betty's act is a visual one, and she knew it was going to be tough. "Nobody's going to be enchanted by my gorgeous voice," she said. "They've got to see me." That was the night she had to empty her bag of tricks, ended by throwing the band leader around like a rag doll and then almost collapsed from exhaustion in the wings.

There was the show at the Hollywood Bowl at the beginning of the war. The Bowl is a junior Shrine Auditorium when it comes to size, and Betty knew she'd have to depend entirely on its magnificent acoustics. Even these failed, for just as she went on a score or two of army planes flew low overhead, drowning out the slightest hint of even Hutton's voice. By the time the last plane had droned out of sight the first one was back, roaring through the sky. Betty made a few well chosen cracks into the microphone but they were lost in the uproar, and there isn't enough money in the world to get Hutton back into the Hollywood Bowl.

It was one of the few times she had to release her audience without giving them the full treatment.

Three years ago she was booked for seven shows a day at San Francisco's Golden Gate. Her voice was not in condition for such a strenuous workout and after two days and 14 shows her vocal cords weakened to the point that she could scarcely sing. At the beginning of her next show she sang one song and knew then it was impossible to go on. She stepped to the front of the stage. "Ladies and gentlemen, I'm sorry, but my voice is gone and I can't sing another note. If you'll be patient I'll have them play my recordings backstage and I'll mouth the lyrics. I'll give you the works with it," she grinned, "but I won't really be singing. Any of you who want your money back can get it at the box office." Not one person left, and all sat spellbound through the rest of the show.

KOREA was tough, too, but in a different way. She and the Skylarks did two shows a day, flying from place to place, never singing for less than 10,000 men and never more than two miles away from the shooting. Twice she sang in the front lines and was amazed that, somehow, she wasn't scared. Knowing that Betty would appear in scant clothing despite the bitter cold, the boys rigged up electric heaters and some even found a way to blow warm air over the stage during the act. The troupers washed their hair in soldier's helmets and fined each other a dollar for griping. Betty took more pictures of the boys than they took of her.

There have been many happy times. Playing for an enthusiastic British audience, at the Palladium in London. They loved her and came back night after night to shout the same requests up to the blonde tornado on stage. When she returned to Hollywood she was full of gratitude for the English and couldn't stop talking about it. One day when she was spilling over at lunch, Eddie Cantor came by and sat down to listen. She explained to him that she had thought they would be a tough audience, but that she had found them the best. Cantor picked up a fork and ran its handle along the tablecloth. "They would love you," he said, "because you are showmanship. It's something they understand. To them you're like Gracie Fields."

Cantor has said that Betty Hutton is the only girl of her time who is equipped for what she is doing. "She has all the tricks of the old timers," he says. "When we came up it was an art, but she came up the rough way, clinging to the edges of a dying vaudeville and learning what she could."

WHEN Betty is not working she putters around the house and garden and plays with her children, but if there is a prolonged dry spell without actual work she becomes restless and moody. Even though she goes to bed early she is plagued by insomnia—from restlessness if she isn't working, from excitement if she is. Her mind goes too fast for idleness and there isn't a lazy bone in her body. She can't stand to be in bed after seven-thirty A.M. and when on tour gets up and wanders around, hoping some of the others will soon be awake. She and Charles O'Curran had been planning a wedding for some weeks, waiting for a convenient time, but there never seemed to be such a time. Betty was always busy. So after returning from Korea on a Friday, she married O'Curran on the following Monday, despite the fact she had to immediately go to work planning her appearance at the Palace. Even though she rehearsed every day with a bad abscess in the back of her throat, a result of the exposure to the Korean winter, she made further plans to make Topsy And Eva for Paramount when she returned from New York, then to do a return engagement at London's Palladium after the movie was finished.

If Betty isn't actually working, she is plotting work. She had always wanted to work for Cecil B. DeMille, and was delighted when she was given the role of the elephant girl in The Greatest Show On Earth. She remained delighted until she learned that the role of Holly was a better one, and then she spent a round 1,000 dollars for a floral piece to be sent to Mr. DeMille. It was a circus scene made of flowers and the figure of Holly, the aerialist, was made entirely of orchids. When DeMille took the expensive hint Betty was delighted and everybody else thought he was out of his mind. This included veteran circus people, who know that 'fliers' begin training at the age of three in order to condition their muscles for the profession. At the time, Betty was 30.

Undaunted, she went to work with Antoinette Concello, one of the world's most famous fliers. For long weeks they worked on a trapeze rigged 24 feet above a studio sound stage. It was rough, tough, bruising work. Betty learned how to hold on with hands, feet, fingers and toes, how to swing through the air and connect, with a searing wrench, with another flier. She learned how to fall into a net, a feat which requires great skill or otherwise delivers a broken neck. And she learned ankle drops, day after day falling backward off the trapeze, catching her whole weight by the back of her ankles.

Betty's first real test came when she went to Philadelphia to make her first try under the big tent of Barnum and Bailey. Her maid Mary went along, and Antoinette Concello and Mr. DeMille, and there were also 10,000 people there—and the circus folk. As Betty entered the big tent the circus people were standing quiet as statues, with folded arms and dubious expressions. Betty looked up, to find her trapeze, but couldn't see it.

"You're not looking high enough," said Antoinette. "This is the circus—not a sound stage."

Betty looked up and up and up and finally saw it, hanging 60 feet above the ground. "Dear God," she prayed.

Antoinette went up with her, and as the two of them stood on the tiny square board beneath their feet, the only reality in the world of air about them, Betty Hutton felt real fright. She looked at Antoinette. "I can't," she said for the first time in her life. "I can't do it."

"If you don't," said the circus-wise Antoinette, "I'll push you. So help me, I'll push you off."

Betty looked down. There was a maze of faces and bright lights. There was dear old Mary. And DeMille, looking up with a smile. "Dear God," Betty prayed again, took a firm grip on the bar and was off through space, the air singing in her ears. She went through her act, made a perfect drop into the net, and for a stunned moment there was a silence, so profound you could sense its pulse. Then a thunder of applause echoed through the big tent, and the circus people, who knew they had just seen the miracle of their world, were clapping as though they could never stop.

That is Betty Hutton. She went on to steal the show from The Greatest Show On Earth, and although after each trapeze act she quaked at the thought of what she had dared, she later decided to fly once more at the Palace. And once the decision was made, she began chafing because the theater's stage was not high enough to allow for something more spectacular.

Spectacle is her meat. When she went on a wartime bond tour to Chicago, she and the others were piled into slow moving cars that eventually were to reach the reviewing stand which seated the city's mayor. Betty sat and chafed at the ridiculous pace of ten miles an hour until she could stand it no longer. She leaped out of the car onto the back of a motorcycle officer and gave him directions to forget the parade, full speed ahead. When they skidded to a stop before the reviewing stand Betty vaulted into it and planted a kiss on the forehead of the astonished mayor. She was first again, and the papers were full of it the following day.

That was show business, and Betty knew it. She will never give it up. "When I get too old for the cameras I'll hit the night-club circuit. I'll spice up the lyrics and I'll be another Sophie Tucker.

"I'm no movie actress," she says with blazing and prideful eyes. "Me—I'm a performer!"

She is beyond all doubt Miss Show Business of this century, and it is improbable that any future century will bring forth another such entertainer—a girl who acts like a pile driver broken loose from its moorings, yet who can bring laughter or breathless tenderness to a song. END

hollywood's most passionate loves (ava gardner)

Later, Sinatra went back to New York to accept another television show and vaudeville appearances. And, behind him, to encourage his climb back to public favor, was Ava.

This is the girl who surprised everyone by weathering his irritable temper and his fights with the press, by withstanding sharp criticism against herself, and by encouraging him when his career took a temporary nosedive.

Ava, her close friends believe, is the strong partner in this marriage. If it survives, it will be largely because she had the courage to be psychoanalyzed.

On a psychiatrist's couch, Ava sorted out her emotions and learned to understand people, and, most of all, herself. Without that understanding, the marriage might not have been possible.

While Frank still may be torn apart inside by tensions, his beautiful wife appears serene with a deep inner content.

It's strange to think that any movie star could be so troubled as to seek psychiatric advice. Movie stars are supposed to be poised, confident, desired, loved, rich, famous and therefore happy.

Not many are. Most, in fact, have more trouble finding emotional security and a stable, secure marriage than any other group of people in the world.

Ava was driven by unhappiness to an analyst because she was too afraid to face her daily life. She had been unable to find happiness in her marriages—to Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw—or her fabulous movie career.

It might be presumptuous to speculate on the basic reasons for her unhappiness, because they are probably known only to Ava and her analyst. It is true, however, that at an early age she developed deep feelings of insecurity and inferiority that made her unable to find her place in the world.

Ava was one of six children. Her father was a tobacco grower near Smithfield, North Carolina. She helped pick tobacco and cotton in the fields. Usually Ava ran around in her bare feet. She still does.

For whatever the reasons, Ava became sensitive about her humble beginnings. Later she became unhappy when she found she wasn't ready to step up into a higher level of society.

She had lived her early years in an isolated community. Meeting strangers frightened her. When she was sent to a school in Newport News, Virginia, Ava was awe-stricken. She had never seen such a big city.

On the first day of school, Ava got up like the other pupils to give her name. When she said, "My name is Avah Gahdner," the whole class laughed. Ava says she now understands they were laughing at her North Carolina accent, not at her, but at the time she was crushed.

Ava was terrified on her first date. She couldn't think of anything to talk about. So on the way home, she read all the road signs aloud. That boy didn't ask her out again.

Once Ava was playing on a woman's basketball team at school and was sent into the out-of-town game as a substitute. She found herself with the ball and with the eyes of the crowd upon her. She made a score—but in the opposition team's basket. Her humiliation was so severe that years later, when she returned to that town to enter college, she was embarrassed. She was sure everyone in town would remember her mistake.

"When you are driven by fear," she said recently, "every molehill becomes a mountain."

She never finished college. At 18, as movie fans well know, she won a bid to enter the magic city of Hollywood after her brother sent her photograph to an executive at MGM.

But the little girl from North Carolina didn't fall happily into the glittering life of ease, parties and swimming pools.

When she went out on dates and to parties she was shy and often uncomfortable.

"I was so afraid they'd laugh at my Southern accent that I began to talk in a whisper," she once said. "I felt I didn't have the right clothes, either. Everything I wore seemed to look wrong. My dresses weren't like what the other girls had on.

"I didn't know how to read a menu, or how to order a meal. I didn't know which fork to use. At my first big dinner party I watched my hostess like a hawk to see which piece of silverware she'd pick up next. When the butler brought the finger bowl I didn't know what it was for. I was in a panic.

"I often left parties early, not because I was bored, but because I felt lost. I was afraid to talk or ask questions for fear of exposing my ignorance.

Ava married twice in her early twenties, perhaps to find some security. But she was not happy. She still felt inferior.

Meet the Winners!

...OF THE WALD-KRASNA-MODERN SCREEN "GIRLS WANTED" TALENT HUNT

■ More than a year ago, MODERN SCREEN and Wald-Krasna Productions initiated a vast search for new talent. The contest was open to MODERN SCREEN readers between the ages of 16 and 40. No dramatic experience was necessary; the only requirement was a full length portrait accompanied by personal data. The response from readers was so tremendous that the judges required a year to select the ten winners presented here. These lucky girls will receive $175-a-week for the work they will do in a Wald-Krasna film for RKO, and expenses to and from Hollywood. Remember their faces; you may be seeing them soon again on movie screens all over the country!

MARILYN BONNEY

At present, Marilyn is head of the drama department at Catholic Girls High School in Los Angeles, but she'd rather act than teach, and recently appeared in Emmet Lavery's production of Song At The Scaffold A native Californian, born in 1931, she traveled on the road with her theatrical parents, but always came back to L. A. for schooling. She went to Mar-Ken High and won a Dore Schary scholarship to the Immaculate Heart College. A year's study followed her graduation, Marilyn also found time to sing in Ken Murray's Blackouts and the Crosby camp show.

ALYCE CRONIN

Auburn-haired Alyce Cronin was on a piano concert tour in Pennsylvania when she was notified she was a winner in a contest she'd forgotten all about entering. She says at the time she had almost abandoned the idea of a dramatic career. After studying music and drama at Jeanne d'Arc Academy and Boston College, Alyce, in 1948, did a series of hotel appearances playing the piano. Then following a brief fling at the New York stage, Alyce went back to her music. Born in Milton, Massachusetts, Alyce is five feet, three inches tall and weighs 108. Her birthday is June 26, 1929.

JANET CAMERFORD

Janet began her acting career when she was two weeks old! Born on June 23, 1931, in Los Angeles, she was in front of a camera making a movie called Wicked 14 days later! When she was three, she won first place in a Better Babys contest, and all through her school years she did fashion modeling, appeared in movies and on radio, and acted in little theater plays. Somehow she managed to squeeze some schoolwork in between her professional appointments, and when she graduated from Alexander Hamilton in L.A. she won the senior drama award.

MARY ANN EDWARDS

Twenty-year-old Mary Ann is a junior at the University of Texas where she's majoring in drama, and picking up beauty titles like: Queen of Williamson County Sheriff Posse Rodeo, Blue Bonnet Belle and Moonlight Girl of Phi Sigma Kappa. Five-feet-five and 110 pounds, she's a Texas cover girl, and fashion model. Along with beauty go brains enough to have made her valedictorian of the 1949 class at Georgetown High. An expert horseback rider, baton twirler (she won a Texas majorette contest), she also played the lead in a production of My Sister Eileen.

FLORENCE HARPER

Florence Harper visited almost every state in the U. S. as a child. The wanderlust hadn't left her in 1949 when she became a flight stewardess for California Central Airlines. While with the airline, Florence eloped to Las Vegas with Howard Harper, who works in the distribution end of MGM's film business. Pacific Air Lift, operated by Overseas National Airways, solicited Florence's services and she is today their Chief Stewardess on flights that take her as far as Tokyo. Born in Council Bluffs, Iowa, September 14, 1926, she has brown hair and blue eyes.

JOAN PASTIN

With a career in modeling, fashion and TV behind her, Joan Pastin had often heard the familiar words, "You ought to be in pictures." Before the contest, brown-haired, Pennsylvania-born Joan had studied at Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh. At 14, she was a teenage fashion model and also a photographic model for leading Pittsburgh newspapers.

Channel WDTV began to feature Joan on a program where she gave fashion hints, and later she became fashion coordinator for WDTV, handling problems of makeup and clothes for telecasts.

LINDA PEPPEL

From the time she started high school in her hometown of Benton Harbor, Michigan, Linda has been winning beauty titles. In 1950, when she graduated, she went to Chicago and enrolled at a model agency planning to make modelling her career. Artistically inclined, she studied ballet and voice for several years but never tried to foist these talents on the public. Linda writes poetry and short stories in her spare time and has fun designing her own clothes, which hang trimly on her slender (110 pounds), tall (five-feet-five) frame. She's blue-eyed, with blonde hair.

DAWN ONEY

Considered one of the most beautiful size-12 models in America, Dawn just had to be a winner! Dawn read of the contest in Minneapolis, submitted a photo, and moved with her husband and six-month-old child to California. When the judges finally caught up with her Dawn had forgotten the contest completely. An accomplished dancer and figure skater—with a figure for it (she's five-feet-six, weighs 118) Dawn was in demand with photographers from the time she graduated high school. Her blue eyes and honey-blonde hair are familiar to readers everywhere.

JUDY RABEN

This 19-year-old beauty mans an information booth at Roosevelt Raceway, right near her hometown of Baldwin, New York. Judy graduated from Baldwin High School in 1950, and attended Adelphi College in Garden City, New York, for a year. When she's not dispensing information at the Raceway, Judy's busy studying typing and short hand for a secretarial career. Swimming, dancing and horseback riding take up whatever time she has left after writing to her fiance, a service man stationed in Japan. Judy, who's five feet, six and a half inches tall, weighs 120 pounds.

MARVLEEN PRENTICE

Stenographers everywhere with movie-ambitions can take heart from the case of Marvleen Prentice. Marvleen has never had any acting experience at all, and since her grade and high school education in her home city of Birmingham, Alabama, she has worked as a stenographer for various business firms in the same town since 1948. Although she was born in Huntsville, she calls Birmingham "home". She has lived there since she was two years old. Golf is the favorite hobby of this brown-haired, hazel-eyed Southern belle. Marvleen entered the contest as a whim.

(Continued from page 64) big starring role, she was paralyzed at the thought of acting with Clark Gable. For her first scene she was supposed to walk through a revolving door toward him. Her legs felt frozen with fear. When she finally got through that door, she fluffed her lines over and over. The director at last called a recess and she crept into a corner in panic.

Ava decided she did not know true happiness, and sought help through psychoanalysis. Facing the fact that she was dissatisfied with her life, she started on the road to emotional security. She frankly admitted that she was unable to cope with the situations which produced certain fears. She wanted to find out why she was afraid.

Analysis was her search into herself. It took nearly two years, and it wasn't easy. It was painful for Ava to relate her problems and fears. But all the money and time in the world could not pay for what it brought her—peace of mind.

Analysis taught her that she couldn't run away from her fears—that laughing and trying to be gay doesn't help.

"I learned that people accept you for what you are, no more, no less," she says. "To put on an air of phony sophistication doesn't do you any good."

To advance her education, Ava went to UCLA to study such subjects as economics and literature. "It's wonderful to meet people," she says, "when you have something to talk about—and when you have freedom from anxiety and can express yourself."

Five years ago, Ava would have been sick with fear at the thought of flying to Spain to star in Pandora And The Flying Dutchman. But now, she happily discovered that she made friends all over Europe with persons who liked her, and liked being with her.

Ava also had discovered through analysis that her two marriages failed because she was emotionally immature. She decided she never would marry again until she felt adult and satisfied with herself.

When Ava met Frank, she at last felt all that. Before Frank, Ava had met many men she could have married . . . men who were "right for her." But she wasn't ready. She wasn't "right" yet for herself.

Ava felt grown-up, relaxed and free from anxiety during the first months of her passionate romance with the slender crooner. They settled into a relaxed, warm relationship. And Ava knew—realistically and without frantic "in love" emotion—that she now had the capacity for a marriage that would last.

Ava, her friends say, had many a talk with Frank about controlling his temper. She vigorously denied that Frank behaved disgracefully towards the press, and claimed she was "fed up with all the lies that have been written about us."

A friend explains, "She's trying to help his confidence by sticking up for him."

Ava recently met me in her dressing room at MGM. She wore only a sweater and skirt, but she looked glamorous, anyway. She appeared radiantly happy as she talked of her marriage.

"It's great," she said. "It's the only way to live. I never did like being single.

"Frank and I have problems to work out together, of course. Every married couple does. But we intend to work at them. Marriage takes a lot of adjustments and compromises. Life is one big adjustment, and marriage is the biggest of all.

"We want children," she smiled. "I used to want six, but I'm too old now. I'm 29 so I'd better settle for two or three.

"I'm very happy now, because I feel I am mature enough for marriage. I never was before." END

dear esther . . .

My first approach was to call the MGM publicity department and suggest coolly that I might be willing to come and have a chat with Esther Williams if somebody would buy my lunch. This was received with a hearty cackle. I then telephoned and agreed to lunch elsewhere if it could be arranged for me to spend an hour or so with you discussing life and chlorine and life among the mermaids and life. We settled for the life and I promised to prepare a list of suitable questions and stand by my phone for an appointment.

After a day or two of getting my questions together I had just one. "What's new?" And everytime I practiced it I slipped into a knowing leer. However, I lied and said I had a substantial basis for an interview ready and would appreciate a little action from the studio end.

I GOT my call on a rainy day. Frankly I am not too fond of water and if I could bathe in moth balls I would prefer to do so. But I shut all the windows of my car and drove carefully to MGM to see you. I was shuttled to a place called the Saucer Tank where you were doing the underwater ballet for One Piece Bathing Suit, and a young man trotted me up a flight of steps to a brightly lighted scaffolding atop a pool of more water than I have ever seen before.

"And where," I asked, "is Miss Williams?" The leer was already pulling at the corners of my mouth.

The young man pointed into the water and I saw you down there waiting for the cameras to start rolling. They do it with mirrors, I thought, because you were apparently tying your shoe laces.

"I'll tell you what," I said to my guide. "I'll flip you to see if she comes up here or I go down there."

"We can't permit you to get into the pool," the young man said.

"That," I told him, "is George with me."

After what seemed a half-hour or so, during which I observed you through a watery film, you appeared to have taken your daily bending exercises, put on new lipstick and changed your hair-do. Well, frankly, Esther, just standing beside so much water made me feel like a regular frogman and I felt the need to get out and run a few laps on some dry turf, so I suggested to the guide that I go home and sit by my telephone and await the astonishing news that you had come up for air or food. He agreed almost too readily.

For the next few days we were in constant contact. And this is where our clipped conversations came in. My phone would ring, I'd answer it and somebody would whisper: "She's out!" I would hum a husky "Roger," hang up and sprint for my car which I kept parked at the curb with the motor running.

Usually, I would just get into gear when my wife would appear in the driveway and sing: "She's in again!" And I would return indoors for the next flash. After a couple of days of my wife dashing outside and crying: "She's in again!" and me coming back into the house our neighbors began to look at me oddly.

Oh, I saw you quite a few times. I would dash to the studio, climb the stairs to the top of the saucer tank and have the young man point gleefully into the depths of the water. He appeared to enjoy it. And pretty soon the workers on the set looked at me as though they thought I was a lunatic with a passion for taking peeks at girls under water.

I gave up in a huff. "Unless this girl gets a snorkel," I told the studio publicity people, "I have a feeling we may never meet again."

Someone suggested that I get in touch with your husband, Ben Gage. "Esther has to finish these scenes by the end of the month," they said, "and it is beginning to look as though she won't surface for more than a few minutes at a time until she does. Why don't you talk to Ben—he knows all about her."

"Unless," I snorted, "he has gills I doubt that very much. It is impossible for a land creature to have much more than a water wings acquaintance with this lady."

"But they have two children," a publicity man pointed out.

I had no answer to that, so I went to your home to see Ben. He wasn't even taking a bath when I got there.

To be perfectly honest with you, Esther, I love your home. I like the canyon in which you live and the clean brown earth on which the house is built, and the trees that cover the land. And I like Ben. He looks manly and competent and dry. He greeted me at the door and escorted me into your lovely living room and showed me your fine early American antiques. He apologized for your not being there.

One day Spencer Tracy was doing a big scene in the picture, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Tracy thought he was cutting a pretty smooth figure as the well-groomed Dr. Jekyll, successful young medico. "Even Lana Turner," said Tracy, "gave me a second look, and I was feeling cocky enough to challenge Clark Gable with one hand tied behind me."

But watching Tracy do the scene was a prominent English author. The visitor kept staring at Spence until Tracy began feeling uneasy. Then the author turned to someone standing nearby and asked, in a very loud voice,

"What is he now—Dr. Jekyll or Mr. Hyde?"

F. Louis Friedman

"How long since you've seen her?" I sneered.

"Why just this morning," he said. "We had a swim together before she left for work."

"Now cut that kind of talk out!" I said heatedly, looking up at his face which was three feet above mine. And then I don't know why, but I added, "Sir."

We sat down on a large sofa and got set for a chat. But just as I got out the "What's new?" the phone rang. Ben picked it up and began an earnest conversation.

"What do you mean the sink's clogged up?" he said.

I looked into the kitchen and there was nobody telephoning from the sink.

"Get a plumber out right away," he continued. "And have the coffee man leave an extra 50 pounds this morning. We'll need it for the week-end."

I thought "This man is a java addict," but I held my tongue.

"How many dishes did we break last night?" Ben asked the telephone receiver. "Sixty! Holy cow, we've got to be more careful."

"You not only have to be more careful, bud," I said to myself, "but I bet you never ever get invited back there again!"

The perfectly ridiculous conversation continued for a few more minutes and then Ben hung up.

"Must have been quite a party," I chortled. "Sixty dishes broken. I once broke a Wedgwood cup at the Bill Holdens' and Mrs. Holden darn near called the police."

"What party you talking about?" Ben asked coolly.

"Well!" I said, "if you'd rather not talk about it let's drop it and have a cup of coffee."

"Never touch the stuff," said Ben.

This man, I thought, is going to be difficult.

"Oh, I know what you mean," said Ben laughing. "The phone call. That was our restaurant. Esther and I own a restaurant called The Trails. I was just talking to the manager. Place keeps me hopping night and day."

I GRINNED stupidly, but I said to myself—because he was bigger than me even sitting down; "Then why don't you tell people you're talking to a restaurant when you're talking to a restaurant, ya big—! You go around giving wrong impressions!"

"What's new?" I said out loud.

"Well," said Ben.

The phone rang again.

"Oh, hi!" said Ben into the phone. "Yup . . . yup . . . yup . . . no kidding . . . how come? . . . what'd he say? . . ."

"Now this," I said to myself, "is the kind of a telephone conversation a man can understand."

"Then I tell you what you better do," said Ben. "Call Washington and tell them we've got 50 axles and drums ready now, but we've got to have confirmation on the rest before we can tool out any more. And you better look into that drill It's spitting oil! And spell that guy on the fogismutt tonight so he can jerrican the kranhope in the morning. If we're not careful, we'll wind up with more catteramicks than shustenbobbles and the whole thing will crustate on the winches."

He waved his cold cigar at me indicating he would like to have some fire on the end of it. "For two cents," I said to myself, "I'll light this joker's nose. Somebody has paid him to confuse me."

Ben hung up in a moment and stared into my smiling, glassy eyes. My features were twisted into the shape of a question mark.

"Oh, that," he said. "Esther and I operate a defense plant. Keeps me hopping from morning to night."

I had an urge to ask him what department of the government was buying shustenbobbles these days but I restrained myself. He was almost lying down on the sofa now but he was still bigger than me.

"What's new?" I asked listlessly.

"Oh, yeah," said Ben. "Well . . ."

That's right. The phone rang again.

"Hi," said Ben into the instrument. "Is that a fact? . . . how many? . . . where does he want them? . . . You sure? . . . You got the measurements? . . ."

"He must take me for an awful fool," I said to myself. "I just won't listen. He's probably got a chicken farm that keeps him hopping night and day."

"Tell you what," Ben mumbled into the phone. "Concentrate on the sashes. Get a sash on right and you got half the problem solved. Then make sure the net is fine enough and the whole thing is taken care of. And make sure they're nice and clean when you put them on. What are the measurements? Seven feet by three-and-a-half, eh. Sounds okay to me. Go ahead."

He hung up and turned back to me.

"Now don't tell me," I said. "You're making costumes for Dagmar."

"What's the matter with you today?" Ben said. "Esther and I have a new business. We make aluminum screen doors and windows. We're just getting ready for a field test."

"You think I didn't know?" I sneered. "I was just kidding. I always kid like that."

WELL, Esther, Ben and I never did get around to talking much about What's new?—we just sort of relaxed and talked about you. We talked about how you cook most of the meals and how people came from miles around to borrow a bowl of your salad. And we looked at your kids, Benjy and Kimmy. Not a sign of a gill on either one of them yet. And Ben told me how you get up every morning and take a swim and a bath before going off to spend the day in that saucer tank. And he told me that you never appear in public in a pool, because there would always be some character who would drown himself trying to race you or stay under the drink longer than you could. But he told me that you do make personal appearances in pools for service men, particularly at hospitals. And about the time you raced some of the paraplegic fellows and wouldn't use your legs—and how some of them beat you, which was as nice a gesture as I've ever heard of.

Then he told me about how you bought your home in two days because Kimmy was coming and you needed room fast. And about how you both loved it so much you never wanted to leave it, which was why you were generally late for all the parties you are invited to. He showed me the orchids you grow in your back yard and he tried to give me one. He said that you had picked some that morning and taken them to the studio to present to Queen Julianna of the Netherlands.

BIG him and little me walked around the grounds and smelled the wonderful fragrance of your canyon. He showed me your piano and explained to me that neither one of you could play it, but you kept it there because your babies' pediatrician loved to play and liked to sit down and knock off a polka or two when he called to see the kids. That's kind of thoughtful.

And after awhile he gave me a couple of spoonfuls of that 50 pounds of coffee and we sat for quite a while in your living room talking about you and the lads and your work. Ben told me he was through with radio as a career, for, as he put it, he had a restaurant, a defense plant and an aluminum screen factory which kept him hopping—I think he said, night and day. He told me that sometimes it was kind of hard to keep a home on a stable basis living in Hollywood, but that you both worked hard at it and it seemed to be working out all right. And he mentioned some of the wild times you had, like having waffles and sausages in the yard on Sunday mornings with the whole family gathered around a big table in the shade of your favorite pepper tree. Some fun, eh.

The whole thing turned out very well, I thought. I mean my talk with Ben. He apologized for your not being there and said you hadn't had a day off in as long as he could remember—and that he missed you.

Well, Esther, that is about all. I didn't get to ask you What's new?—but I found out a few things about you anyway. I hope sometime soon we can get together and have a good laugh about me and you and the saucer tank. In the meanwhile, I wish you lots of luck and happiness, because I think you are living right. As a matter of fact, when I finish this letter in a minute, I'm going into the kitchen and drink a toast to you and Ben and Benjy and Kimmy. I'm going to drink a great big glass of water to you all.

Your constant admirer,
afoot or afloat,
Jim Henaghan

rita's rarin' to go!

(Continued from page 31) the hotel when she suddenly decided that hotel living was not for her. She jumped up from her chaise longue and began to call for her secretary Maggie Parker.

Maggie came running.

"We've just got to get out of here," Rita began. "It's very lovely and all of that but . . ."

"But what?" Maggie asked.

"But I don't feel at home. I can't raid the ice box. I can't walk around in jeans. People keep staring at me. And it's not right for the children, especially Becky. She's lived in too many hotels already."

IN a week's time, Maggie had scouted all the available large homes in or near Hollywood. She narrowed her choice down to one and then called Rita.

"I went up on a Sunday," Rita recalls, "and I saw this house at the top of Alpine Drive. It looked exactly right from the outside, but I wondered if the inside would have enough space for my staff." Rita always needs quarters for a cook, for Suzanne, the personal maid who came back with her from France, and for Domingo, the Philippine butler who's run all of her homes and a good share of her life for the past eight years. Rita also needs space and privacy for herself and her two daughters and nurse.

The guest bedroom and bath on the first floor, Rita decided, would be perfect for two-year-old Yasmine and her nurse, Anne. These rooms are removed from the rest of the household, and near the kitchen which is important because Yasmine is still on an infant's sleeping and feeding schedule.

Upstairs the master bedroom looks out onto hills and trees and sky. "Right off," Rita says, "it seemed the kind of room that would make me feel happy in the morning and relaxed at night. In fact, as soon as I saw it, I was ready to write out a check." But common sense held Rita back, and she continued her inspection.

Next to the master bedroom is a mirrored dressing room. No matter what you've heard, Rita Hayworth is not overly pre-occupied with clothes and high fashion. However, her position calls for a large wardrobe, and when she saw the roomy closet space, she knew that the new batch of custom-made clothes she'd ordered from Joseph Halpert in New York would hang very well there.

When Rita was shown a gay, young room with rose bedecked wallpaper, four poster bed, and organdy-skirted vanity table, she immediately pictured her seven-year-old Rebecca in it.

Before she decided to take the house, though, Rita turned to Maggie and said, "Be sure to have Domingo put his okay on all this." And she waved her hand in the general direction of the dining room, butler's pantry, and kitchen.

Domingo knows more about Rita Hayworth than anyone living. He knows her moods, her tastes, her preferences in food and men. He is also a natural diplomat.

A few weeks ago, for example, a local Romeo phoned, trying to date his employer. Rita has no use for this particular wolf, and Domingo knows it, but this is what he said over the phone. "Oh, yes, Mr. H., Miss Hayworth very anxious to see you but she gone out of town for few days. Know you will understand, of course."

Rita was in the living room, sitting on the floor in front of the fireplace, listening to records.

Domingo always makes it a point to have a favorite Hayworth record on the machine when she steps in the front door. He also lavishes great care on the flower arrangements throughout the house.

Rita loves to drive, but she doesn't own a car, so Domingo lets her borrow his Buick whenever she's in the mood.

A nice guy this Domingo, a jack-of-all-trades whom Rita treats as another brother. She does have two brothers—Vernon and Ed—who usually visit her on Sundays. This, by the way, gives the lie to the rumor that ever since her marriage to Aly Khan, Rita has neglected her family. Rita has always been loyal to her clan.

On a typical Sunday, the Cansinos gather early at Rita's place. Her father Eduardo and her stepmother, are usually the first to arrive. They come for coffee and a perusal of the morning papers. Then Vernon, Ed, their wives, and Ed's two children drive up.

Next comes Aunt Rosser, a dowager great aunt who prefers to stay for the weekend. On especially fine Sundays, Padre Cansino, Rita's 80-year-old grandfather, comes, too—so it's quite a gathering.

THE Cansinos are all individualists, each doing what he likes best—reading, painting, music, and dancing. Last Christmas, brother Ed gave Rita an easel and a set of paints. At the same time, Charley Feldman, one of Hollywood's top talent agents and a very romantic figure, gifted her with an oil painting by Marc Chagall.

Combining these two gifts, Rita borrowed one of Domingo's white coats and began painting copies of Chagall grapes like mad.

Her pre-occupation with art, in fact, has spread to Becky and other members of the household so that the mansion is becoming a refuge for growing artists.

"It's a good thing," Rita says, "having the family enjoy hobbies together. It makes for family solidarity, and that's really important to children. I know."

Once Domingo had okayed the kitchen facilities, Rita moved her children and staff into the Alpine House and promptly announced that the same routine would be practiced as in her previous residences. One of these is that on Sundays, no meals at the Hayworth house are eaten at tables. Sunday is the cook's day off which means that Domingo fixes a large salad and leaves it in the refrigerator with a platter of cold cuts and assorted cheeses.

Anytime a family member gets hungry, he digs into the refrigerator.

Occasionally, for dinner on Sunday nights, Rita will drift into the kitchen and concoct a favorite traditional Spanish dish like arroz con pollo (chicken and rice). She herself has a stevedore's appetite, also a cast iron stomach. She can and does eat anything. She will fill up on a heavy meal at eight. By midnight, she is hungry again and tiptoes down to the kitchen where she prepares herself two sandwiches and a glass of milk.

On workingdays, Rita is up at six A. M. long before the children. She eats a hearty breakfast in bed of fruit, bacon, eggs, coffee, and toast.

She is dressed by seven at which time Maggie or Domingo drive her to the studio. She works hard all day and returns home some time after six. No matter what sort of day she's had at the studio, the minute she hits the front door she radiates nothing but joy. She throws off the old leather jacket she usually wears to the studio, picks up little Yas and tosses her into the air. Then she kisses Becky and rumples her short curly hair.

While Rita eats dinner on a card table in the sun room, her two little daughters chatter madly. Rebecca often likes to read aloud to her mother.

Both of Rita's daughters are naturally musical, and before Rita finishes dinner, Yas usually turns on the radio, and Becky starts the record player going. There are record players all over the house. Becky, in fact, sleeps with one at her bedside.

Once the music starts, Rita finishes her meal quickly. Sometimes she'll get her dance drums and beat out a tempo while the little girls dance. Becky is studying ballet with her grandfather and reveals traces of a disciplined technique but little Yas is completely uninhibited.

Presently, Rita herself will reach for her castanets, and mother and daughters will have a musical ball. Eventually, Rita will return to her Conga drum and beating out a rhythm, will lead her dark-eyed offspring to bed.

Then she curls up on a sofa and studies her lines for the next day or she goes upstairs, showers, and dresses for her date.

Rita's dates have been far and few between. Not that she hasn't been besieged by dozens of admirers. Poor Domingo is running out of diplomatic alibis. It's just that she doesn't want to risk the chance of cultivating a new love until she's finished with the old.

All sorts of stories have sprung up, of course, about what goes on behind the walls of Rita's Alpine Drive mansion. One columnist says that Aly Khan has been going in and out of the residence for months, secretly. Another says that Gilbert Roland and Rita dine there quietly each evening away from curious eyes. A third intimates that Charley Feldman is the only suitor who is welcome at all hours.

None of this is true.

Right now, Rita Hayworth's house is for women. But it needs a man's touch and Rita knows it. And someday soon that man will come along. END

Back home after three years, Rita Hayworth recently moved into this pale green hideaway surrounded by dense foliage. Actually, it's only a few minutes' drive from Columbia Studios.

alan ladd's a big baby!

Sue stopped breathing hard—she knew Alan was right. Now was the time to make the decision.

"A home," she said.

And that's the way it has been ever since.

It would be impossible to visit and talk with Alan Ladd for any length of time without getting on the subject of dogs, because while you are sitting in his house or garden they are all over and around you. And yet Alan is not in the accepted sense a "dog-lover." As defined once by James Thurber, a dog-lover is a man who loves someone else's dog, and while Alan is fond of all canines, he showers his affection only on his own. The last count at the Ladds' showed there were three animals residing in his Hollywood home, Jezebel, a younger boxer named Brindie and a small dachshund named Fritzie, II. There are generally anywhere from five to 20 more dogs at the Ladd ranch, depending on the date of the last whelping, but they are there only on a temporary basis, awaiting new and permanent homes. The pets are the three house dogs.

The Alan Ladds first became prominent in the Hollywood doggie set when they acquired Jezebel, who was a present from Paramount executive Y. Frank Freeman. Jezzie was a simple puppy, lovable, cooperative and not too frisky. Except at night. The first night she spent with the Ladds she was put tenderly to bed in a bathroom on a 30 dollar blanket because it was too cold for her to sleep outside.

Alan had just dropped off to sleep when he was startled into full wakefulness.

"What was that?" he whispered to Sue.

"What was what?" asked Sue.

"I just heard somebody cry for help," said Alan.

They both listened and the cry came again.

It was presently obvious that the noise was coming from the bathroom, so Sue and Alan got up and opened the door. Jezebel sat there wagging her tail apparently in the best of health and spirits.

"She must have had a bad dream," said Alan. So they got back into bed.

Jezebel had bad dreams all night—and Alan went to work the next day with his eyes half closed. He decided to ask wiser heads for advice and went home that night filled with dog lore.

"It's a simple matter," he told his wife. "All you have to do to keep the pup from crying is put an alarm clock beside him."

"What for?" Sue asked.

"What difference does it make?" Alan said. "I got this from a guy who's had maybe 20 dogs. He ought to know."

Jezebel and the alarm clock went to bed nicely and Sue and Alan settled down for a sound night's sleep. But Jezebel had another night of howling and the next day Alan was as tired as a man can be. He met a man that day who told him that all the pup needed to calm him down was the blanket he was born on. Alan was willing to do anything, so after an hour of telephoning, he located the blanket and drove 30 miles out into the country to get it. And when they got into bed that night, Sue and Alan dropped right off to sleep.

The howling started five minutes after the sandman had been by. Alan leaped out of bed, raced to the bathroom, picked up the pup, tore back to the bedroom—and threw the dog into the bed.

"She wins," he said to Sue. Jezebel has slept in that bed every night since without a whimper. The climax came one night a year or so later, when Jezzie weighed better than 100 pounds. Alan was awakened by a howl and a loud thump. He turned on the light and saw Jezebel, comfortable and calm, her head on Sue's pillow—and Sue on the floor where she had been pushed by her pet. The next day they got a bigger bed.

If you have the space for it, it is no more possible to own one dog than it is to have one flea. They get in your blood or you begin to feel sorry for the first dog because she's lonely or you'd like to have pups. The Ladds bought another boxer to play with Jezebel—and she promptly showed her true nature by delivering a litter of pups, something like ten. Then, hearing that Sue and Alan loved boxers, people began giving them their unwanted animals.

Jerry Lewis, for instance, had a dog called Irma, given to him by Victor Mature. One day Irma found out she could jump fences, so whenever she felt cramped for space she would take to the air and rip off into the neighborhood where she would accomplish all sorts of damages until caught. When Jerry finally got an eight foot high fence all around his place and Irma took it like a kangaroo stepping over a cigar box, the comic decided to dispose of her.

"Let's give Irma to the Ladds," said Jerry to his wife one night. "They love dogs."

Irma joined the pack at the Ladd farm and along with her girl friends and cousins proceeded to produce more Boxers. It was like a rabbit farm.

One Christmas, the Ladds decided to give their friends boxers as gifts. This was quite a thing as the strain was now considered the finest in the district. Sue took the pups and tied ribbons about their necks, with cute cards attached, and sent them around to select friends by special messenger. And everyone was very grateful.

A couple of months later, however, Sue came home pale and trembling.

"I just saw one of the pups we gave away," she told Alan. "And it has a nose like a collie. Do you think . . . ?"

In a few days they were sure. They visited most of the other recipients of the pets and discovered that the animals were growing into anything but pure-bred boxers. The Ladds were mortified, particularly because of the to-do that had been made upon the delivery of the pups—and the fancy pedigree papers that had been sent to each new owner. But they faced the problem squarely. They called each of the people and explained that there had been an error in the naming of the father—and offered to take back the off-breed children and replace them. It is a tribute to Hollywood that not a single star or big shot who got the pups would even consider a switch. They were all in love with their collie-boxers.

It is the habit of Sue and Alan Ladd to keep track of the pups they give away. This writer has one of them, a mad, conscienceless beast appropriately named Moose, who, although he is addicted to destroying furniture, eating prize roses and licking the faces of total strangers, is priceless. When the phone rings and it is the Ladds calling, the conversation always begins with: "How's Moose?"

The ranch is a great place for these animals to run loose and many Ladd boxer owners bring their pets there for a visit to ma and pa and the cousins. Estelle Taylor dropped in one day with her dog for a visit. He was turned loose in the yard and after taking one look at the pack heading for him for a tussle, took off into the tall brush surrounding the ranch. Estelle called him in vain, then, quite distraught started after him. Alan, being the host, had to go along. This began about three o'clock in the afternoon. Alan and Estelle would get within about five feet of the beast when he would suddenly remember what had nearly happened to him in the ranch yard—and he'd run again. At four the next morning, with Estelle in bad shape because she was sure she'd lost her pet forever, Alan finally caught the thing—and stumbled five miles back to the ranch house where he promptly collapsed.

A week later they were passing Estelle's house on their way to dinner. They decided to drop in and see if the dog had gotten over its experience. Estelle keeps the dog in her garage when she is not home, so getting no answer to the doorbell, Alan and Sue picked up the garage door to take a look at the pet. Smelling freedom, the animal skipped out into the yard. Alan caught it and shoved it back in the garage, but before he could bring the door down fully the dog slipped out again. Again there was a several-hour ordeal. Every time Alan put the dog back in the garage, it would squeeze out before he could get the door shut. Finally, he was shoving the beast under the door while lying on his stomach in a new suit—and Sue was trying to shut the door fast. This resulted in several near broken bones for Alan, but they never did get the dog back in the garage. At close to midnight, Alan gave up, left the garage door open and went home. Estelle told him the next day that when she got home the boxer was sound asleep in his bed—in the garage with the door wide open.

But of all the dogs the Alan Ladds have owned, a tiny dachshund, Fritzie, was by far the favorite. Fritzie was an animal with personality. She was no bigger than a minute, but she held her own with Jezebel and Brindie with nothing more than an arrogant swagger and a thin growl when it was needed. From the day she first entered the Ladd home, as a six-week-old pup, she slept in the big bed with Alan, Sue and Jezebel down at the foot. She was so tiny she used to get lost in the covers, but when it came time to get up she'd appear from some hidden fold of blankets or from under a pillow and greet the day with a satisfied yawn.

Fritzie was the life of any party. She was difficult to get to know, but once she'd accepted you she'd show her tricks and conversational accomplishments at the drop of a hat. She was the first to greet visitors and would rouse herself from any nap to see a pal to the door. She had real manners, Fritzie did.

Jezebel had several citations for bravery, for instance the time they were digging for the foundations of the Ladd home and little Alana got in front of a machine that was digging out the side of a hill. She was in a position where the operator couldn't see her—and he was directing the huge claw of the implement directly at the child. Alan and Jezebel saw Alana at the same instant. Alan started for the kid on a dead run, but Jezzie passed him like a shot. He hit Alana so hard she was knocked ten feet, but she was safe. Jezebel was a heroine, but Fritzie was still the queen around the house.

In the scheme of things, Fritzie was just a dachshund who went through life making a study of the human animal. She entered the Ladd home on a trial basis, fully intending, as all dogs do, to run away at the first opportunity if things didn't stack up to expectations. She couldn't speak Ladd language, so, thus handicapped, she stuck around a little longer than she might have in order to give this family a fair chance to make an impression. At first, she found the other dogs, Jezebel and Brindie, rather a bore and certainly ungainly and monstrous in their manners.

As she grew older it became no problem for her to rule the roost with her superior intellect—and even in the matter of dog quarrels she managed to impose her will on the boxers by a few well-spoken threats (she did speak boxer language) or the exhibition of a small fang or a disgusted flip of the tail as she waltzed from the fray, refusing to discuss the matter any longer. She contributed nothing to the home—except love, a thing she couldn't help. And she asked nothing—except love.

And when she died, she left elegantly, expecting nothing more than tears and a last scent of her master.

It was pretty dramatic, the way Fritzie died. Every day, as long as she could remember, a bus had driven by the Ladd home, or rather the home Fritzie shared with the Ladds. A man stood up in front of this bus and as it halted before the Ladd house, announced to his passengers, all sightseers, that this was the residence of the famous movie star. Fritzie found this bit of nonsense an amusing part of her day, so she never failed to be on hand to inspect the passengers and she would trot around and display her best points until the bus drove away. She knew who they came to see.

One day the bus was a few minutes late. Fritzie had trotted off down the driveway to the road and, not seeing the bus, had ventured out into the road to see if it was coming. A car came careening around the corner and before Fritzie could avoid it, she was struck and thrown into the middle of the street mortally wounded. The car drove on.

A few minutes later the sightseeing bus came along, with the man standing up in the front explaining to his fares which star's home they were approaching. But he didn't finish his spiel. He saw the small brown object in the road.

He had never been in a movie star's home before, but the man picked Fritzie up in his arms and walked up the path through the garden to the front door. Alan Ladd answered the bell and took the tiny burden from the man's hands. It was obvious that Fritzie was beyond help, so Alan took her into the living room and held her close in his arms while Jezebel and Brindie sat in a far corner and watched in dread.

And then, with a last scent of her master and a final surge of love in her little heart, Fritzie acknowledged that things seemed to have turned out all right after all, and she quietly went to sleep. And long after she was gone Alan's tears fell on her small face.

There was sadness in Fritzie's house for quite a while after that. But one day Sue came home with a bundle, shortly after Alan had gone to bed. She walked into the room and tossed the bundle onto the bed, where it began to scamper about like a mouse.

"What's that?" asked Alan, fully awakened.

"It's for you," said Sue. "It's name is Fritzie."

The dachshund stopped squirming and looked into Alan's face—and they grinned at each other. And when the light was put out, Fritzie, the second, got under a pillow and went to sleep, no doubt thinking there'd need to be a few changes made around here. END

(Continued from page 60) After my first six months of vocal study, my singing teacher told mother that she thought my voice had promise and that I should be forced to practice. Mother didn't believe in that method. But one Saturday morning a few weeks later, she and I went to an audition at the Hollywood Theater, which was running an amateur contest sponsored by 7-Up. When I sang for Del Milne, the theater manager, he encouraged me to enter, and no one was more surprised than I when, the following week, I won the contest, and later, the grand elimination prize.

During the weeks that followed, Mr. Milne arranged for me to sing at a number of benefit shows in Portland, including a Lions' Club benefit for the blind to which Mr. Milne invited a number of the local radio station executives. Among that group was Mr. Joseph Sampietro, musical director of KOIN, with whose orchestra I sang many times during the next two years. A few days later, I was asked to audition by one of the other stations, but, when I sang, they told me I should go home and practice some more.

Then, one day in March, 1941, Mother took a girl friend and me downtown to see a matinee. We were preoccupied with window-shopping when I noticed Mother talking to a man on the street. It turned out to be Carl Werner, who had handled the publicity for the Agnes Peters recital. Apparently, Mr. Werner had asked Mother what I had been doing with my dancing, for she called me over to meet him. When he learned that I was singing, he suggested that I audition at KOIN for the Oregon War Bond Committee which was about to select an Oregon Victory Girl. I was thrilled when they chose me after I sang for them. But Mother insisted that I finish grammar school first.

"Mother, please let me try it," I pleaded.

"You can't just try it," Mother told me. "You'll have to give it your very best, and you can't do that until you finish your semester in grammar school."

"Oh, all right," I agreed, reluctantly.

I could hardly wait until school finished that summer. But some of my impatience was abated by the thrill of getting my uniforms fitted, by the new songs I was learning, and by the tremendous opportunities which I knew lay ahead of me.

That summer I was almost literally adopted by the men who made up the Oregon War Bond Committee, whom I came to call my "uncles" as the bond drive progressed. They included Carl Werner, C. W. Myers, Mayor Earl Riley, Harvey Wells (Dean of the Oregon State Legislature), Larry Hilaire, Al Fink, William Mears, and other prominent Portland business men. They did everything possible to launch my career. Before school started in September, I was singing every week on KOIN's "Victory Harvest" program.

In the midst of all this activity, I started back for my last year at Beaumont School. By November, I began to realize what Mother meant when she said that I could not merely "try" if I accepted the job as Oregon's Victory Girl. It was too big for that. Very soon, I found myself taking on a second weekly radio show on KOIN, "The Million Dollar Club," which honored the people who had sold more than $1,000,000 worth of war bonds. That November, I christened a Liberty ship at the Kaiser shipyards, sang at the USO regularly, made appearances at the shipyards and war plants around Portland. During that fall term at Beaumont, I missed 30 out of 90 days in class.

I don't believe any 13 year old has ever been as busy, or loved every minute of it more than I did.

During the following spring, the war bond program gained momentum, and I gained momentum with it, traveling with the "Victory Harvest" program to a different Oregon city each week. In all, we covered 34 out of Oregon's 36 counties. My traveling companion on the trips away from Portland was Carol Worth, Miss Oregon of 1943, whom I understand is now married and living in Long Beach, California. Sometimes, we entertained at war plants, playing a show for each of the shifts. The effort certainly paid off. Oregon was among the top five states in war bond sales.

It isn't easy for me to single out the greatest thrills of my life as Oregon's Victory Girl. There were so many. But I'll never forget singing before the Joint Session of the Oregon State Legislature on Washington's Birthday. Or the day, shortly before I was 14, that I was made a member of the "Million Dollar Club." Or the time Carl Greve, a Portland jeweler who sponsored my first commercial radio program, presented me with a diamond ring—my first real diamond ring.

These are but a few of the experiences which tie my heart to Portland. I can still remember the special kidding I used to take from Chet Duncan of KOIN as he dropped the microphone down to my singing level. And my mother's regular warning to stay dry and warm if I was to sing out of doors. And the many afternoons that Nancy Dickson and I spent roller skating on the tennis courts of the Beaumont School grounds, or the nights that we mystified each other telling our fortunes on her ouija board. I hope Nancy has found as much happiness as I have.

When I was signed for movies after my appearance on "Hollywood Showcase," I started the ninth grade on the Universal lot, and finished the rest of my high school work in studio schools.

Of course, the biggest thrill of my whole life was the world premiere of my first picture, Song Of The Open Road, which was held in Portland during the Rose Festival of 1944. What a home-coming! On the day I arrived, rain was pouring down, yet thousands of people lined the streets to wave hello at me. Later, there was a big reception at the public auditorium and, that night, the premiere. I was 15, and absolutely speechless with happiness, especially when, the next day, Mayor Riley named the summer concert center, where I had sung the year before, as the Jane Powell Concert Center.

Unfortunately, I haven't been able to make another prolonged visit to Portland. I went back for a benefit concert for the Symphony Orchestra a few years ago. But because of my schedule in Hollywood, I didn't get a chance to stay long. It's like so many things which are a fond but not an immediate part of our lives . . . we keep putting them off, while our anticipation grows and grows.

Now that our baby is getting old enough to travel, Geary and I hope that it won't be long before we can take a relaxed trip back to my home town. He was ready to go as soon as I told him about the wonderful skiing on Mt. Hood, whose majestic peak looms like a fairy castle against the eastern skyline of Portland. Because of my motion picture schedule, it won't be this summer. But it will be soon. I miss my old home town. END hollywood's most passionate loves (shelley winters)

Shelley now wears skirts and lipstick. She smiles sweetly at her directors and is the model of decorum. She even has decided to live in Italy six months out of the year, and she doesn't tablehop any more.

Gassman says he can offer no recipe for the change in Shelley because, as he says, "She is the same as when I first met her, and I did not know her before, so how could I know how I changed her," which makes sense.

Therefore to discover the secret of this passion of the plaster city we have to flashback to this exclusive behind-the-scenes story of their romance.

The Italian Lothario was born in Genoa, Italy, Sept. 1, 1922. His father is a well-to-do construction engineer. Vittorio played basketball and studied to be a lawyer at the University of Rome.

Then he switched to acting. He studied at the Academy of Dramatic Arts for two years and turned professional. Since then he has starred in 92 plays in nine years, and is regarded as one of the top stage actors in Italy. His name has been up in lights in Italy for a long time for such stage successes as A Streetcar Named Desire, All My Sons, Romeo and Juliet and As You Like It.

He also has been a leading idol of Italy's silver screen since 1946. He has appeared in 19 movies, including one that was popular in this country, Bitter Rice. He was the villain who attacked the leggy and luscious Silvano Mangano.

Another picture, in which he co-starred with Hollywood's Geraldine Brooks, Streets of Sorrow, will be released in the United States soon.

Thus Shelley was impressed with the handsome profile when her escort, Frank Latimore, an American actor living in Rome, introduced her to Vittorio in the lobby of the Spanish Ballet theater.

"The first time we met didn't count," Gassman said recently in his first interview after arriving in Hollywood.

"It was a very conventional meeting. And I told a lie. I said that I liked her in A Place In The Sun, when I hadn't even seen it."

The next day, Latimore tossed a party for Shelley and invited Gassman. The day after that, Vittorio decided to telephone her for a date.

Shelley, being Shelley, hadn't waited for such convention.

"I called her but she wasn't in," he recalled.

"Then when I got home I found she had already called me."

He looked a little puzzled.

"I liked her because she ate a lot," he beamed. "She had no preoccupation with diet.

"I didn't know very much about her. Most of her pictures hadn't played in Italy yet. I just knew that she was a movie star, because I'd read about her in movie magazines."

On this momentous occasion, Shelley and Vittorio had a heated discussion about acting. Shelley believes in the "naturalistic" school of histrionics. Gassman, whose first love is the theater, goes in more for "stylized, formal acting," as he calls it.

How they carried on this intellectual debate is somewhat of a mystery, since Shelley couldn't speak Italian and Vittorio knew very little English. They insist that they "got along and understood each other."

Shelley stayed over in Rome four more days while Vittorio helped her see the city. When she left for Paris, he followed her there and they toured the red-checkered-tablecloth restaurants . . . the tiny shops, and all those other love locales.

"She called her agent to postpone her next picture, but he wouldn't let her stay any longer, so she went back to Hollywood," Vittorio sighed.

"There was a lot of money spent calling between Paris and Hollywood.

"I returned to Rome and we wrote each other many letters in which we got to know each other better. Then she cabled me that she was lonely. I was, too."

Vittorio had five days before shooting started on his next movie in Rome. So he flew to Hollywood to be with Shelley for five days, a bitter financial blow to the overseas telephone company.

At the end of the five days, Vittorio called his director in Italy who, to put it mildly, was somewhat astonished to hear his star was sauntering around California instead of preparing to report to work the next morning. Vittorio won a few days' more vacation and went to Arizona with Shelley to gaze in rapture from the sidelines while she did location work on a movie.

Gassman finally went home to Rome and began patronizing the overseas telephone company again to talk to the vivacious blonde in Hollywood. When her movie was finished, Shelley zipped off to Italy. As an example of her devotion and of the new Shelley Winters, she knitted a scarf with her own hands and presented it to Vittorio as she stepped off the plane. The news photographers happened to be on hand to record this bit of domesticity.

After Gassman ended his picture, the pair announced their engagement in the accepted mode of the cinema city. They called a press conference. Then they sped to New York and Hollywood where romance flourished under the light of photographers' flashbulbs. When Shelley stepped off the plane in Hollywood, she smiled wanly, said she had nothing to talk about and drifted home.

In typical stop-dash Shelley Winters style, Shell & Vittorio hopped down to Juarez, Mexico, and were married two hours after he obtained his divorce.

Before dawn broke over Schwab's drugstore, Hollywood buzzed with talk about the new Shelley.

"She certainly is more subdued," one of her close friends said. "Why, she doesn't even table-hop in restaurants any more!"

Another pal observed, "She's more interested in looking at you when she talks. She used to gaze to the four corners of the room to see what everybody else was doing. She dresses in more feminine clothes, too, and she wears lipstick in public.

Shelley herself admits she's changed. Her explanation of the new Shelley Winters is simple, honest and mature.

"I'm very much in love with someone extraordinary who loves me back," she said. "That is security."

Shelley sighed happily. "We talk for days at a time. We never run out of things to talk about. And we haven't had a fight since we met.

"I wasn't so frantic about winning that Oscar for my role in A Place In The Sun as I would have been a year ago.

"Naturally I wanted to win, but a year ago I would have been desperate.

"I used to be involved with the craziness of this town," she confessed. "Last year I did six movies, more than any other star. They should have given me an Oscar for doing the most, anyway.

"I worked so hard I had to spend three week-ends in a hospital so I could rest where people couldn't get at me. I used to throw up all the time, I was so nervous.

"I can eat more now. I learned one important thing in Europe—we don't take time to do anything in this country. In Italy they take three hours for lunch.

"Nobody takes much time to live over here," Shelley said. "Through Vittorio I met European artists and writers and I realized that the world is a big place. Hollywood has taken on its proper perspective for me."

Shelley further floored Hollywood by announcing to her studio that she and Vittorio would live in movietown and work in pictures for only six months of the year. The other six they'll spend in Italy where they plan to appear in the theater together and where Vittorio will continue his picture career. Shelley's U-I contract doesn't allow her to appear in Italian movies.

"If the studio doesn't like the arrangement," shrugged Shelley, "all they can do is take me off salary for six months. That's all suspension is, you know. And I get 12 weeks of lay-off every year, anyway, when I'm not paid.

"I'm not so frightened about money any more. I used to be scared silly if they'd just mention suspension. I'd think about that money I'd miss. But I have somebody to take care of me now."

Shelley's trip to Europe probably had a large part in her switch from the temperamental, insecure girl to a more mature woman in love. To the girl who had known only New York and Hollywood, her trip brought her a new sense of values, and a realization that "there are so many wonderful places in the world to see and so many things to do."

Vittorio, being European, fits into this new mood. He is cultured, well-traveled and far more mature emotionally and intellectually than his 29 years. Shelley had known one previous failure at marriage (and so had Gassman).

"I like Shelley because she is a very alive and nice human being," he says. "She has not been spoiled by her success, and not stopped by it, either. She has many more ambitions.

"She is attractive to me physically, of course, which is important but not sufficient.

"She is enthusiastic about life and curious about it. I have much less curiosity, as you say, so I appreciate it in other people. I am not curious," he shrugged. "I am interested in just two or three things in life . . . the theater, literature. I have good friends.

"Here life is quicker. In Europe you take longer to eat, more time to talk. This makes friendships. In Europe we have more friends, and more enemies, too.

"I didn't know much about Shelley when I met her. I didn't believe the stories that were written about her. I am not interested in her past, but in her future.

"We have interesting times together, and many fascinating things to talk about. We are interested in the same things.

"Shelley desires spiritual and emotional security. This is her first problem, she has told me. She wants a happy marriage and I hope ours will be one. I hope our marriage will give her that security.

"I was told that before she met me she was much more easily nervous and unquiet. I didn't know her before, of course, so I don't realize any difference. I have no two portraits of her to compare, so to speak."

One factor that Shelley and Vittorio believe will cement their union into a lasting one is that both believe in the European formula for marriage: the husband is the boss.

perts say, they became the most unhappy women in the world.

European women are more the devoted slaves who do their master's bidding. Most don't enjoy the privileges or independence of the American girl. But, most experts agree, they're happier in their subordinate role of dutiful and feminine wives and mothers.

Both Shelley and Vittorio think the European system is better. At least Shelley does now, anyway.

When Vittorio was subjected to a press conference in New York, one newshound shot the question, "Who's going to be the boss in the family?"

"What a question to ask an Italian man!" Gassman snorted.

Shelley later chattered to me. "Do you think I could get Vittorio into an American barbershop? In Italy they cut hair in those funny waves.

"I'm already decorating our apartment in Italy and we're going to live in a modest apartment in Hollywood. I'm busy learning how to cook and washing dishes. I love Italian food."

"I don't," said Vittorio. "I like French food."

At last report, Shelley was learning how to cook French food, and Vittorio still wore his hair Italian-style.

"The man must be the boss in the family," says Gassman. "Not in the sense of being a dictator, nor in taking advantage of a woman, but more as a duty than a right. A really feminine woman likes that and wants it from a man.

"Of course," he weakened, "it should be the woman who makes the decisions in the details of life, around the house. That seems to be the right division of authority to me.

"Man actually is more intelligent than woman. He has more reason. Women are more shrewd and practical, however. Shelley is a better business manager than I am. She can get along in any situation.

"Women are very often more courageous than men, too. They can stand more physical pain. If the man had to bear children, I am sure humanity would be ended.

"But, getting back to Shelley, I seldom went out with actresses in Italy. They all tend to be very sophisticated and snobbish. They're impossible to talk to. But Shelley takes to everybody. That is a very sweet quality. I'm not used to that. In Europe, actresses are more critical, more severe.

"Shelley is very natural. She laughs when something amuses her. She is very emotional, too. She took me to see all the plays in New York, she was so anxious that I get to know the American theater. We went to see Judy Garland at the Palace in New York. Shelley was so excited she yelled.

"I am pretty sure," said Vittorio, "that I chose well when I chose Shelley."

Some cynics on the Hollywood scene, however, take a dim view of Shelley's discovery of Love, Life and Culture.

Miss Winters has announced that from now on she's interested only in interviews with the press about her roles and her art on the silver screen.

This does not sit too well with the press that helped to elevate her to stardom. The stars who stay on top, like Alan Ladd, give out interviews any time on any subject, and they're glad they're asked to do it.

Shelley also has served notice she is interested from now on in the drah-ma, not in those wise-cracking roles she has ground out down the years.

Skeptics also yawn at her latest mood and predict a short end to the Shell-Gas combo, as they call it. One says, "Only Shelley would think of going to Europe with one guy and coming home engaged to another, and an Italian star, at that. She is just interested in making the headlines."

Another points out that Miss Winters recently was given a raise by her studio and a promise of good parts, so "it's hard to see how an ambitious girl will give all that up for love."

One columnist insisted Vittorio asked how much money Shelley made. This isn't true, however. Research discloses he's well-heeled.

Meanwhile, Shelley ignored the pessimists and charged full-steam ahead to establish Vittorio's career in Hollywood. She arranged the contacts and interviews that brought Vittorio his first American picture. She introduced him to executives who showered him with offers of long-term contracts at major studios. He turned these down; he says his theater work in Rome is more important to him. Like any feminine woman, she tried to keep from him the fact that she was partially responsible for the roles he won.

Shelley took him to Hollywood parties. She introduced him to his idol, Charles Chaplin, and to her former instructor in a Shakespeare class, Charles Laughton. One of her happiest moments came when Laughton told Vittorio, an expert in Shakespearean drama, that Shelley would make a fine Shakespearean actress.

"See?" chortled a proud Shelley to Vittorio.

His approval and admiration, you can see, is important in her life.

"Shelley has been very anxious that Vittorio be as fond of America as she is of Italy," a friend says. "He always had been impressed with the technique of movie-making. But he was skeptical of the cultural side of Hollywood. So she took him around to the local art galleries."

She also escorted him to the Circle Theater, where she has worked, and that meeting led to Vittorio's giving a reading of Italian poetry to an audience of selected big-wigs of the plaster city.

Shelley and Vittorio hope that they can establish a theater in Rome where they can give English-language plays for the large American colony there. Vittorio is a director of note, too, in Italy and the government is scheduled to subsidize a theater that he will open in the Fall.

Some critics of la Winters point out that the new Shelley won't be as exciting as the old. They think her bombastics of yore meant showmanship.

But Shelley insists that the new Shelley will be an even better actress.

"I feel my living in Rome half of the year will expand my career as an actress," she says. "Any artist reflects to his audience his own experience, and the more experiences, the more you can give to the public."

Shelley recently was loaned to MGM for a picture directed by William Wellman. This movie-maker is known for his penchant for rugged he-men actors and his scorn of any thespian in skirts. Shelley, the old Shelley, anyway, was famous as an actress who demanded the best, found it hard to compromise and rode hard over anybody's feelings to get what she wanted.

Hollywood expected an explosion. But Shelley and "Wild Bill" Wellman got along just dandy.

Whatever the outcome of the controversial Shelley-Vittorio combination, one thing is sure.

Hollywood can rest more easily, now that the old Shelley Winters is on the shelf.

"If Shelley has found happiness at last, that means 500 people in this town have found happiness, too," cracked one of her pals. "The producers and others who work with her can sleep nights now." END

ingrid's side of the story

(Continued from page 53) to Europe, advising me that the meeting would be in his father's home in Stode, Sweden. Dr. Lindstrom's cable came as a great surprise to me. I sent a cablegram to the ship on which Dr. Lindstrom and Pia were traveling to England, informing Dr. Lindstrom that I would be in London as per our previous agreement.

Because Dr. Linustrom has told me on numerous occasions that he did not want the visitation to be accompanied by any publicity and if there were publicity he would consider that as a justification to cancel the visitation, I took the following precautions: the sleeper reservation from Rome to London was made in the name of my sister-in-law, who boarded the train in Rome. I in turn drove by car from Rome to Pisa where I then boarded the train and stayed in a closed compartment which I never left till I arrived at Calais. At Calais, I boarded the ferry-boat and stayed behind the closed doors of my cabin until I arrived in Dover, where I was met by Sidney Bernstein (a mutual friend of Dr. Lindstrom and myself) who drove me to the home of Ann Todd and David Lean, the well known British director.

At noon, Thursday the 21st of July, Mr. Bernstein telephoned me at the home of Miss Todd and Mr. Lean, advising me that Dr. Lindstrom and Pia had arrived at the Washington Hotel in London. I heard nothing further until 5 o'clock of that day, when Dr. Lindstrom telephoned me from Mr. Bernstein's office, stating exactly as follows: "I understand you have expressed a desire to see the child." I was taken aback by the studied cruelty of this remark, but controlled myself to answer: "Yes." Dr. Lindstrom informed me that he was too tired to come over that evening. I told Dr. Lindstrom that he could go to rest if he desired and to send Pia with Mr. Bernstein. Dr. Lindstrom informed me that Pia was tired too and I then suggested that Pia could go to bed right away with me. Dr. Lindstrom then advised me that this was impossible since Pia was never to be left alone with me, thereby delivering a second blow to me during the same conversation. I succeeded in controlling myself, avoided arguing with Dr. Lindstrom any further, and asked to speak to Mr. Bernstein. I told Mr. Bernstein that if Pia did not come to the house where I was living, I would come to Mr. Bernstein's office immediately with the Police. At 6 o'clock Dr. Lindstrom and Pia arrived. When they arrived, Dr. Lindstrom told me how tired they were and that they could stay only for an hour. To this Pia added that papa was so tired because he had stayed up dancing every night, coming to bed as late as 7 o'clock in the morning.

AFTER the three of us had a short talk, I wished to arrange with Dr. Lindstrom for my staying with Pia while they were in London. He and I went to talk in another room, but could not discuss the purpose of the visitation and the arrangements therefor because Dr. Lindstrom was only interested in bringing up our previous personal relationship, and would not discuss intelligently the custody of Pia. Dr. Lindstrom informed me that I could see Pia only when it suited him. He told me, by way of example, that the following day he could not bring her at all because he did not have the time, but perhaps I could see her on the next following day. He further stated that he did not know how many days he and Pia could stay in London, as he had expected to see me in Sweden. I became angry at the absurdity of these statements, and left the room to visit with Pia. Ann and David Lean, who had taken care of Pia during our discussion, then interceded privately with Dr. Lindstrom. As a result, Dr. Lindstrom agreed not to take Pia away immediately but agreed to stay for dinner. Pia expressed her desire to stay for the night but in view of what transpired stated she would come back the following day and stay with me. As to the plans for the following day, it was only after repeated insistences by Mr. and Mrs. Lean and myself, that Dr. Lindstrom stated that he would try to bring Pia back the next morning. I heard nothing the next morning and was beside myself with anxiety and it was not until the day was practically consumed that Dr. Lindstrom and Pia arrived, at 6 o'clock in the evening.

Pia brought her night clothes and was very excited about staying with me. Dr. Lindstrom spoke to Mr. Lean telling him that they had to also find a room for him, since he was not going to let Pia sleep alone with me. Mr. Lean told Dr. Lindstrom that he did not have a bed for him and asked Dr. Lindstrom what could be done to have Dr. Lindstrom trust Mr. and Mrs. Lean and leave the house. Dr. Lindstrom then asked for the key to the front door, which was given to him, and he left the house. After we had gone to bed, Dr. Lindstrom entered the house and sat all night in the hall, where the maid found him in the morning. Dr. Lindstrom explained that he had good reason to believe that I was planning to steal Pia. I swore on the memory of my deceased parents that I had never planned to commit such a crime. Dr. Lindstrom, nevertheless, told me that he couldn't trust me.

The following morning we went to Mr. Bernstein's farm in the country for the weekend. Dr. Lindstrom allowed me to be with Pia, he staying most of the time in his room. He suggested that he eat on a tray in his room and I told him that this was unnecessary, as since he insisted on staying in the same house with us, Pia would think it very strange if we did not all eat together.

Whenever he had the opportunity, Dr. Lindstrom brought up the past and delighted in berating me. Pia was of course aware of our heated arguments. I kept trying to avoid these discussions, but since Dr. Lindstrom chose to re-open and continue such arguments, stating among other things, that he never could trust a woman like me, and made numerous other remarks of a scurrilous nature about me in the presence of Pia, I felt that she should hear the defense, as well as the accusations. In desperation, I placed before him the decree of the California Court and asked him where it appeared in the papers that he had the right to behave the way he did during the period of my custody. After one of the arguments I returned to Pia, who was watching television, and Dr. Lindstrom entered the room and sat down in back of me and stated: "You'd better say good-bye to the child tonight, as we are leaving early in the morning and you might not like to get up so early. So, this is your last evening. I'll stay a couple of more days in London but I won't have time to let you see the child." When I heard this I started to cry and Dr. Lindstrom accused me of making scenes to upset the child.

This is the Rossellini's summer house at Santa Marinella in Italy where Pia would stay with her mother, from July to September, if the California Superior Court grants permission.

Ingrid's apartment in Rome, she feels, is the proper setting for her daughter's annual visits. However, Dr. Lindstrom is opposed to Pia's leaving the United States and its jurisdiction.

A large assortment of toys fills Robertino Rossellini's room. Ingrid is anxious for Pia to get to know and love her half-brother—and also the twins expected by the Rossellinis in June.

The next morning at approximately 7:30 we rose to drive back to London. Pia and I had seen in the newspapers that Alice In Wonderland had opened, and as Pia and I had read the book together we wanted to see the picture. I expressed to Dr. Lindstrom my desire to take Pia to see that film during the day. He emphatically refused stating that it would call for publicity. Pia herself stated that she did not mind if another picture was taken, since she had had already so many taken. When I mentioned to Dr. Lindstrom about the interviews and photographs that he had recently given while I was taking the precautions referred to at the beginning of this affidavit, he replied: "Oh, my dear, I understand now you are jealous." When we reached the Washington Hotel Pia and I said good-bye.

Mr. and Mrs. Lean then interceded once more and pleaded with Dr. Lindstrom to let me see Pia again, either permitting us to go to the movie or permitting Pia to visit me. Finally Dr. Lindstrom agreed that if Mrs. Lean, and her daughter and secretary, together with an American friend of Pia, who had just arrived in London, would accompany Pia and myself, we could go to the movie. The following day we all had lunch and saw the picture and there was no publicity nor were any photographs taken. After the picture we all went to Mrs. Lean's house and within a few minutes Dr. Lindstrom arrived to take Pia away. Dr. Lindstrom immediately announced that he had a taxi waiting outside, thus obliging Pia and me to do in extreme haste what at that time, I was told, was to be our farewell.

THE next morning as I had to bring Pia a small gold chain that had been repaired in the meantime, I delivered it personally to the Hotel thus obtaining the opportunity to again see Pia and help her pack. On leaving, Dr. Lindstrom insisted on following me into the lobby of the hotel. I again asked him to consider what should be done for the future, telling him that I could not take another summer like this. He gave me to understand that in 1952 he had no intention to come to Europe and that he would never let Pia travel with someone else. I told him that this matter would have to be clarified immediately. He agreed to write me about the next visitation, but to this date I had not heard from him.

After months of consideration, I have come to the conclusion that Dr. Lindstrom's behaviour, in giving to my meetings with Pia an atmosphere of exceptionality, tension and quarrel, may only attain this result: that in my daughter's mind, the concept of "meeting mother" or even simply of "mother" coincides with that of "trouble." Now, experience shows that, in such conditions, the natural tendency and self-defense of any child is to avoid the visitations in order to avoid trouble and discussion. On the other hand, to deprive the girl from contacts with her mother cannot but be to her detriment.

It is already a fact that I have only received very few (I believe four) letters from my daughter since the London visit whereas I have sent her many times that number. I bring this fact out not by way of criticism of my daughter but only as an illustration of the actuality of the above mentioned risk.

I believe that the succeeding visitations should take place in the proper environment rather than in the strained environment of a hotel or some other persons' home: in my home where I live with my son Robertino, and my husband under normal home life circumstances, and so that my daughter Pia can play with, and enjoy the company of her brother Robertino. To offset Dr. Lindstrom's statement that Pia, living with me would live "in sordid conditions" I am attaching hereto photographs of the home which we own in Santa Marinella, on the Thyrrenian Sea approximately 40 miles from Rome, and of the apartment which we rent in Rome, located at Bruno Buozzi 49.

I further state that it will be inadvisable for me to travel in the summer of 1952 since I am expecting the birth of the second child of my present marriage.

In view of the above conduct of Dr. Lindstrom during the 1951 visitation, it is impossible to have such visitations with Dr. Lindstrom present. I, therefore, respectfully request that I be permitted to have some competent adult person accompany Pia to my home in Rome, Italy. In the summer of 1952. It is my further suggestion that the visitation commence not later than July 15, 1952, in Rome. I will return Pia to her home in the United States accompanied by a competent adult person so that she will return in time for the school semester commencing in September 1952. I believe that the visitation under the circumstances outlined above will be proper for my daughter and will serve to consolidate the relationship between my daughter and me, and I still hope that, although my marriage to Dr. Lindstrom has been dissolved, we can in the future discuss in fairness the problems affecting the welfare of our daughter Pia. I am sure that Pia will then look forward to each annual visit with me and my family in Italy. To deprive me of any reasonable contract with my daughter would be unjust in itself and against the existing interlocutory decree. On the other hand, to deprive Pia of the right to be with her mother under normal home environment would be gravely unjust and harmful to her in her formative years.

dr. lindstrom's side of the story

(Continued from page 53) and said that she would not meet with me or the child. I sent messages to her through a few trusted friends and relatives informing her that I would be willing to bring Pia to meet her, as aforesaid, but defendant was unheeding of these pleas that she should see the child personally. It is theretore not true that it was impossible for defendant to see Pia during the summer of 1949. Defendant could have seen Pia, but defendant chose not to do so.

6. Defendant states in her affidavit that my reason for refusing to permit Pia to come to Europe in 1950 was apparently prompted by my belief that if there were no decree by the California Court, she would never return the child to the United States.

ANSWER: I was indeed at that time apprehensive that without an express Court order by a Court of competent jurisdiction, I would be without the jurisdiction which I deemed essential to safeguard the child's custody. Defendant had already invoked such illegal procedures as obtaining a purported Mexican divorce from me by proxy, when she well knew that neither she nor I were residents of Mexico, and she had already illegally entered into a purported marriage ceremony by proxy with Roberto Rossellini, when she well knew that the Courts of California, which was the State of our domicile, would never have recognized her Mexican divorce, and that in no event could a legal divorce have been obtained in less than one year in this State. Under these circumstances, it is indeed true that I was fearful and apprehensive that if defendant could have had Pia in her possession outside the United States, she would have sought, in disregard of the child's best interests, to keep the child outside the United States, to obtain a color of right so to do under an order of some court not having jurisdiction over me, and do so even if such action on defendant's part would have deprived Pia of her rights of American citizenship. That defendant had entertained plans to seek sole custody of Pia is further shown by the fact that on or about March 15, 1950, she had filed an action against me in this Court, bearing No. 572,195, wherein she prayed, among other things, "that the care, custody and control of the minor child of the parties hereto, to wit, Pia Lindstrom, be awarded to the plaintiff (Ingrid Bergman Lindstrom). On or about April 19, 1950, the plaintiff in that action (defendant herein), through her attorneys, dismissed that action with prejudice.

7. Defendant states in her affidavit that during the negotiations which preceded the interlocutory decree she was informed that a visit with Pia could take place in the latter part of that summer.

ANSWER: The fact is that on September 18, 1950, my attorneys and defendant's attorneys entered into a written stipulation which I approved in writing, and which stipulation provided that I would, within twelve months from the date thereof, go abroad with Pia so that Pia could visit with defendant, but which stipulation further expressly provided that the exact place of the visit was to be arranged according to the mutual convenience of plaintiff and defendant. The fact further is that I made it clear at all times to my counsel, to the defendant's counsel, and to defendant, that I had no intention of agreeing that Pia should go to Italy.

This is shown by the testimony which I gave at the trial of this action before Honorable Thurmond Clarke, Judge Presiding in Department 7, on November 1, 1950, and the transcript of said testimony shows that I testified as follows:

"Q. (BY MR. PACHT) Would you like to take your daughter to see her mother?"

"A. (DR. LINDSTROM) Yes. As a matter of fact, I planned to go to Europe next year, and I would be glad to take the child along to see her mother, if it is possible. I have no intention to bring her to Italy, nor have I ever promised I would do so."

8. Defendant implies in her affidavit that I promised to bring Pia over to Europe for Christmas 1950. I never made her any such promise. Moreover, the short Christmas school vacation of approximately ten days would ordinarily have made such a visit impractical.

9. Defendant states in her affidavit that with regard to the proposed 1951 visitation, I refused to bring Pia to Italy for the reason that I did not intend our daughter "to come under the influence" of Roberto Rossellini.

ANSWER: It is probably true that I made such a statement. This, however, was only one of the reasons why I objected to taking the child to Italy. Among other reasons therefor was the fact that it had been reported to me that some Italian court had approved defendant's Mexican proxy divorce from me and defendant's proxy marriage to Roberto Rossellini, and I had no confidence that such court might not claim or assert jurisdiction to award custody of Pia to defendant, even without my being subject to its jurisdiction.

10. Defendant implies in her affidavit that at the moment of boarding the ship that was taking Pia and me to Europe, I advised her for the first time that the meeting would be in Sweden. She states that this cable came as a great surprise to her.

ANSWER: In point of fact, on March 20, 1951, I notified defendant that I would probably go to Europe in the latter part of July and that my plans were to be in England the last week of July. Thereafter, however, I had two telephone conversations with defendant, in which I suggested that Sweden would be the best place for defendant to meet Pia.

This is confirmed by a letter which I sent to defendant under date of July 6, 1951, and which was mailed to her on that date or early next morning, by air mail, and which letter also shows that defendant not only knew before I left California with Pia what meeting place I was proposing, but the reasons therefor. The letter reads as follows, insofar as it relates to Pia:

"July 6, 1951

Dear Ingrid:

In your telephone call June the 28th, you mentioned to me that any arrangements I made for Pia's trip to Europe this summer would be all right with you, and that you would adjust your plans accordingly, or as you expressed it, 'I shall do exactly as you want it this time.' It is important that this trip shall not be an additional severe or unnecessary strain for the child and I would appreciate your cooperation in this matter. Your attitude had drastically changed from what you told me in your next to last telephone conversation with me a few weeks ago. At that time, you insisted you had a right to take the child with you any place in Europe you wanted, and that you could force me to let you do that and also that in case I did not go myself, you could force me to send the child alone.

March the 20th of this year I notified you that I would probably go to Europe in the latter part of July and that my plans were to be in England the last week of July. In our last two telephone conversations, I suggested that Sweden would be the best place for you to meet Pia and in our last telephone conversation I emphasized this again. Because of that last conversation and other developments and upon the advice of Judge Pacht and others, I have decided that the best place for Pia to meet you and where she would be the least exposed to complications and planned publicity, would be in Stode, Sweden. Judge Pacht has already informed your lawyers here, accordingly.

As you recall, it was last October that I promised to take Pia along to Europe sometime this summer, where you could see her in England or Scandinavia, the exact place to be later decided upon. I think that if I had had a chance to talk these matters over with you directly, we could have worked out a program that would have tended to minimize the many difficulties which exist. As things now stand I can only make the arrangements which from here appear the best for the child, and which are in accordance with the decisions of the California Courts.

Pia is well and seemingly happy and healthy and I think she told you already that she passed her seventh grade in school.

With kind regards."

IN addition, the fact that defendant knew before Pia and I left California that we planned to meet her in Sweden is shown by the following cablegram which I caused to be transmitted to her from Beverly Hills, California, on July 8, 1951:

"CALIF JULY 8 1158P LT INGRID BERGMAN
HOTEL EXCELSIOR ROME (ITALY)
AS DISCUSSED JUNE 28TH SWEDEN BEST MEETING PLACE FOR CHILD WE PLAN BEING THERE FROM AUGUST FIRST LETTER FOLLOWS

P"

The cablegram which I sent to defendant shortly before boarding ship in the middle of July was merely a still further confirmation as to the intended meeting place and as to our expected time of arrival. I have no recollection of mentioning that the meeting would be in my father's home, although I did say that the meeting place would be Stode, Sweden. Defendant would have been free to visit with Pia anywhere in Sweden and it was neither my intention nor did I specify that she would have to either meet in or stay at my father's home.

I received no answer from defendant to my letter to her of July 6, 1951, nor my cablegram of July 8, 1951, nor the one sent just before boarding ship, until the day before our ship arrived in England, at which time I received the following radiogram:

"AS AGREED OVER TELEPHONE I WILL BE IN LONDON CARE SIDNEY BERNSTEIN THURSDAY 19—"

My letter of July 6, 1951 had been sent by registered mail to defendant at the address she had designated, and I subsequently received a return receipt postmarked from Rome, July 13, 1951.

Because of the radiogram from defendant and in order to avoid unnecessary publicity, I did not use my train tickets from Southampton to London, but arranged for Pia and myself to go to London by automobile.

11. Defendant states in her affidavit that she learned of our arrival in London at noon on Thursday, the 21st of July.

ANSWER: In July, 1951, there was no Thursday, the 21st. The fact is that we arrived in London on Friday, July 20, 1951, and that on that very day, as soon as Pia and I had gotten settled in our hotel, I contacted Sidney Bernstein in accordance with the radiogram which I had received only the day before arriving in England. This I did notwithstanding that it was I, and not the defendant, who had been taken by surprise.

Within one hour after I called on Mr. Bernstein, I took Pia to the home of Mr. and Mrs. David Lean, at whose home Mr. Bernstein informed me that the defendant was. I had never met the Leans before and they were strangers to me.

14. In her affidavit defendant relates what she claims was the conversation which she had with me at the home of the Leans on the first day that Pia and I were there.

ANSWER: It is not true that in that conversation I dwelt on our previous personal relationship. The fact is that this was the first time I had seen defendant in over two years and that Pia had seen her in two and one-half years. The picture which defendant paints of this first meeting after so long a lapse of time is completely distorted. That neither the child nor I found ourselves responsive to the defendant's emotional excitement on that occasion is not difficult to understand. After the first hour which was devoted mainly to casual conversation, most of which was between the defendant and the child, defendant expressed a desire to talk to me alone, and we went out to the garden. With a vehement outburst, she said, "Now, you can go! I am going to take care of the child!" I then calmly asked, "What are your plans?," to which she replied, "I have the right to take the child wherever I want!" I maintained that she had no such right since the arrangements which I considered to have been made in good faith were that she should visit with the child in Sweden. Defendant then said, "I will under no circumstances go to Sweden!" I asked her, "Why can't you go to Sweden where we both lived and have friends and relatives. I am perfectly willing to let you have the child alone in Sweden for three or four weeks. I know the child will be comfortable there, and I will feel that the child is safe when you have her there." Defendant replied that Sweden had treated her badly and that she (the defendant) didn't like it there. I replied that if the child had come all the way from California when she had not even wanted to come, the least that defendant could do was to take the possible discomfort of traveling to Sweden, which is only a few hours by airplane from England. I reminded her, too, that one of the principal reasons why I had promised to take the child to Europe in 1951 was to visit my father, who was expected to celebrate his eightieth birthday that year.

Defendant then insisted that she had the right to take the child wherever she wanted, including Italy, and that she was going to take the child to Italy. To support her contention, she produced a letter from her attorneys in California, which she claimed substantiated her contentions. The letter was signed by one of defendant's counsel, and I remember especially one sentence which said that nothing would please the writer more than to take me before Judge Clarke and charge me with contempt of Court.

In view of what defendant had said as to her right to take the child to Italy, and of the past experiences which I had had and which have been hereinabove partially referred to, I told defendant that I did not feel that I could leave the child with her in England. Nevertheless, I told her that I would rearrange my plans so as to delay our departure from England and stay longer than the couple of days which were then planned.

It is not true that I told defendant that she could not see Pia on the day next following our arrival in London. I did tell defendant that I had engagements for the fore part of the day which I had previously arranged, and that I would bring the child over in the afternoon, which I in fact did. The Leans invited me to stay for dinner that first day, and I did. It is not true that Pia expressed a desire to stay for the night on the occasion of our first day at the Lean's; at least no such desire was expressed in my presence, and on the contrary the child was quite happy to leave when we departed at 10:30 P.M. Most of that evening defendant spent with the child alone upstairs. When I left with Pia that evening it was definitely understood that I would not be able to bring her back until the afternoon of the following day.

15. Defendant gives her version of the second meeting at the Leans.

ANSWER: At first the Leans said they could not understand my concern about leaving Pia, and although I had not formerly been acquainted with them, I felt that the circumstances required that I should explain my concern, which I did. Mr. and Mrs. Lean thereupon stated that they could appreciate my apprehension. Therefore, the second day, when Pia was to stay overnight, they insisted that I should stay in the living room on the sofa; and they proceeded to make a bed there for me. I told them that I preferred not to trouble them by staying there overnight.

Mr. Lean then insisted that I should take the key to the house, which I did. It is absolutely untrue that after defendant or any of the others had gone to bed, or that any time during the night, I re-entered the house and sat all night or any part of the night in the hall. The fact is that I went back to my room at the Washington Hotel in London and slept there overnight, but arose in time to arrive back at the Lean house at about 8:00 A.M., the reason for this being that Mr. Lean had said that he would be up early since he planned to go to work on Sunday at 8:00 A.M., and I wanted to thank him and say goodbye. In addition, I had made arrangements with the defendant that she and the child and I would leave on Sunday morning at 9:00 A.M. for the country home of our mutual friend Sidney Bernstein, where defendant and the child could be undisturbed together.

When I arrived at the Lean home at about 8:00 A.M. Sunday morning, Mr. Lean's plans had apparently changed because he did not leave until later. I had had breakfast at the hotel and therefore declined the Leans' invitation to breakfast. I had no discussion that morning with defendant or anyone as to any belief that defendant was planning to steal Pia. On the contrary, the atmosphere was friendly that morning, and the three of us, (defendant, Pia and I) left for Mr. Bernstein's country home in Kent at about 11:00 A.M., when defendant and Pia were ready, in good spirits.

16. Defendant in her affidavit describes her version of the manner in which we spent the time at Mr. Bernstein's country home. It is significant that in the first paragraph which she devotes to this, even defendant admits that I stayed most of the time in my room. It is significant, too, that the effort which I made to allow defendant as much time to herself with the child as possible is exemplified by my offer to eat some other place.

I had in fact come to the Bernstein farm armed only with a brief case full of medical journals, which I proceeded to study in my room. When I found defendant and Pia settled for the weekend, I even offered to leave for a couple of days while Mr. Bernstein was there, although this would have been against the advice of my counsel. Defendant told me this would be unnecessary. Over the weekend I barely saw defendant or Pia except at meal time. The atmosphere on Sunday and Monday seemed to be without animosity. Mr. Bernstein returned to London on Monday, and on Tuesday I informed defendant that I could hardly longer delay my departure for Sweden, and I again suggested that she should come to Sweden where she could spend several weeks alone and uninterrupted with Pia at any place of her own choosing. Not only did I have commitments to be in Sweden, but I felt that should any trouble arise between defendant and myself, the interests of the child would be better protected there. Particularly would I feel more confident in permitting defendant a free hand with the child if she would go to Sweden because so many of our respective relatives were there and because Sweden was the country of our origin. Commencing on the morning of July 24, 1951, it was the defendant who insisted on bringing up our past in front of the child and in berating me. I pleaded with her repeatedly not to discuss such matters while the child was there, but the defendant insisted that this was what the child should hear. She kept repeating in front of the child that defendant had a right to take the child wherever she wanted. She tried to justify and gloss over her own conduct by attempting to find fault with the kind of life we had led together. She unfairly reprimanded me in front of the child, saying, "Why did you save money? And why did you buy all that insurance? We could have spent the money and had fun with it!" I found it necessary to answer that we had lived well, and that she had never denied herself or been denied anything she wanted. She retorted, "We (meaning Rossellini and herself) live much better on debts. We have more cars and servants than you and I ever had, but we have nothing but debts." I naturally resented very much defendant's attempt to dignify such an irresponsible approach to home life.

IN front of the child defendant said, "If you don't change the custody agreement so that I can take Pia wherever I want, and sign a paper to that effect, I'm going to sue you in October." Suddenly, still in front of the child, defendant accused me of having stolen $50,000 from her. Defendant said, "You stole $50,000 from me in 1949! And it's only because I and my lawyers are so generous that we haven't put you in jail!" To this baseless charge I made no reply whatsoever in front of the child. She said her lawyer had told her that I had never been able to account for that $50,000, referring to an item in that amount which was paid out in January of 1949. In point of fact the item so paid out represented taxes to the United States Government paid for income received in 1948.

It is not true that I said to defendant that she "had better say goodbye to the child tonight." Defendant knew from the time we arrived at the Bernstein place on Sunday that we were only planning to stay there for the weekend. On Tuesday morning, July 24, 1951, having already postponed our departure, I told her that we would have to leave the next morning for London. It is not true that I told defendant that I intended to stay a couple of more days in London, but that I would not let her see the child during that period. The three of us (defendant, Pia and I) drove back to London in a taxi Wednesday morning, July 25, and it was only that day that I arranged for new reservations enabling me to prolong my stay in London until Friday, July 27; and defendant knew that we had had reservations to leave Thursday morning, July 26, for Sweden.

17. Defendant in her affidavit gives her version of the Alice In Wonderland incident.

ANSWER: Before leaving Mr. Bernstein's country home defendant had insisted that she and the child were going to meet the press. I objected to her subjecting the child to such deliberate publicity.

A few hours after Pia and I arrived at our hotel in London on Wednesday, on the day that we returned from the country home, Mrs. Lean called and urged me to let defendant and Pia go to see Alice In Wonderland. Mrs. Lean explained that she realized how concerned I was and that she could put my mind at ease because she and her daughter were also going. I then asked whether Pia's playmate who had just arrived by plane from the United States, could accompany them, and this was arranged. Mrs. Lean assured me that there could be no publicity and she

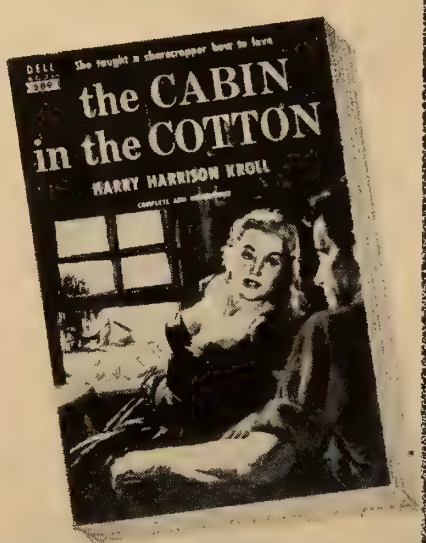
by Anne Meredith



"Then it was too late; she was in his arms and with the first touch, passion rose like a tidal wave and he knew he could not let her go. In that first moment he knew such delight as had not come his way in twenty years."

That was how it all began. For five years Oliver Youngman and Lily Brown defied convention to share love's happiness—and its pain. How could they have known that cruel fate would intervene when the flame of passion had blinded them to all else.

further assured me of Pia's safe return.

That I should have had misgivings about permitting Pia to go to a movie in the first place is understandable. Defendant had assured me that it was ridiculous for me to suppose that Mr. Rossellini might be on his way to England. I had not hesitated to tell her that I did not care to have my young daughter meet him again. It is significant that Mr. Rossellini did arrive in England almost immediately after we left.

It is not true that I granted interviews in Hollywood, New York, London or on shipboard. Such pictures as were taken were the minimum that could be permitted, and were only such as I was unable to avoid while traveling six thousand miles with the child for the purpose of meeting defendant.

18. As to the affidavits of Mr. and Mrs. Lean, I am frank to state that I am puzzled by them. During my brief acquaintance with them on the occasion of Pia's visit to their home, I had thought that our relationship was characterized by friendliness and mutual respect. We parted with friendly words, I presented them with some minor gifts in appreciation of their hospitality and when I returned to the United States I wrote Mr. Lean as follows:

"September 21, 1951

Mr. David Lean
Ilchester Place 1 (W 14)
London, England

Dear David and Anne:

Just a little note to again thank you for your hospitality while I and my little daughter were in London, and for your kindness.

We are now back to work, both at school and in hospitals.

With kindest regards,

Very sincerely yours,
P. A. Lindstrom, M.D."

Shortly thereafter, I received a reply from Mrs. Lean, who is also known as Ann Todd, and the reply from her reads as follows:

"ANN TODD

Dear Peter

It was nice hearing from you—& thank you so much for writing. Give my love to your darling daughter. Your nylons are wonderful even though I spurned them. 19. Defendant in her affidavit refers to her visit at the hotel on the morning of the day that Pia and I departed from London.

ANSWER: As a gesture of common courtesy, I accompanied defendant down to a taxi. There was no discussion of any kind between us at that time, and we parted with a handshake.

20. In her affidavit defendant attempts to psychoanalyze the relationship between herself and Pia. Defendant says that my behavior has given to her meetings with Pia an atmosphere of "exceptionality." I can only reply that if there is such an atmosphere, it has been caused by the conduct of persons other than myself or Pia, and by incidents beyond our control. If the concept of "meeting mother" has for Pia lost its ordinary connotation, it might be time for defendant to reconsider where the fault lies.

21. I can offer further proof that the precautions which I took during the trip which Pia and I made last summer were not only justified but were approved by this Court.

For on April 13, 1951, a hearing took place before Honorable Newcomb Condee upon my petition as guardian of Pia that an allowance be made from the guardianship estate in connection with the trip to Europe to be taken by Pia that summer.

Immediately after the hearing, I was informed by Rudolph Pacht, that Judge Condee inquired:

"Is there any chance of the California courts losing jurisdiction over the child?"

Mr. Pacht informed me that he replied:

"There will be special precautions taken to prevent it."

Given such instructions by this very Court, and expressly warned as I was by my counsel that I should not permit defendant to have the child alone under circumstances that would enable her to apply to a foreign jurisdiction which would not be bound by any orders of the California Court, I believe this Court is now able to judge whether I did not in fact accord defendant even more latitude than that to which she was entitled.

CONCLUSION

I have given calm and fair consideration to defendant's motion.

I believe it completely unreasonable that I, a citizen of the United States, should be forced to send my daughter, also a citizen of the United States, overseas to a foreign country where she will be outside the jurisdiction of any court of the United States and in the home of defendant and others, who are not citizens of the United States.

In addition, Pia herself has repeatedly expressed her preference not to go to Italy. That I, who because of professional commitments am unable to go to Europe this summer, should be required to entrust to a third person the safety of my child for a trip to Europe in time of political unrest seems inconceivable.

Apart from the obstacles that distance and the lack of protective jurisdiction impose, it is unlikely that it would be to the best interests of Pia to be exposed to the personal environment which defendant has chosen.

I therefore respectfully request that the motion of defendant be denied.

PETER A. LINDSTROM

no time for modesty

The onlookers' astonishment was compounded when, right after the pair went to work, they heard MacRae boldly suggest, "Look, Margaret—you're singing too high above my baritone. Why don't you drop down a third? You won't have to reach for the high ones then and you can't go flat." To which Miss Truman immediately replied, "That's a good idea. Let's try it."

The harmonious results of Gordon's impetuous suggestion soon showed on the air. So much so, in fact, that afterwards, driving home with his wife, Sheila, Gordon pulled up at a Western Union office and impulsively scribbled a telegram saying how great Margie was on his show and how much all the gang loved having her. He sent it off to the White House, Washington, D.C. And he got back an appreciative, personal letter bearing an internationally famous signature.

By doing what comes naturally, whether it's giving the President's daughter a hearty smack in public or bursting into full throated song while ambling down the street, Gordon MacRae has earned a certain reputation in Hollywood for being cocky, super self confident, even bumptious and brash. He'd be the last guy in the world to deny any of these estimates, by the way, also the last to dream of changing himself. "I'm strictly a square," he'll admit cheerfully, "I act first and think afterwards," which trait, he'll further confess, has brought him transient trouble at times, but usually kept him out of it. In fact, being nobody but Albert Gordon MacRae, morning, night and noon, is exactly what has brought him his triple threat fame, a lovelaced marriage, a happy home and a busy world which, to him, is one large, succulent oyster.

Right now "Nature Boy," as Phil Harris calls him, is sitting on top of that world—a favorite singer on radio and records and the hottest male attraction at Warner Brothers. Right now "Muscles" MacRae, as Bing Crosby addresses him, is having the time of his life doing everything he's dreamed about doing since he was four years old, and at 31 he figures he's just getting going. The other day, after belting out a song in a manner which particularly pleased him, Gordie sighed appreciatively at his own efforts and spake thus: "I am probably the best darned young baritone in captivity— or could be" he qualified, "with a lot more work. Someday I'm gonna sing at La Scala!"

And again, on a recent afternoon when he had swatted out a tidy 68 on the Palm Springs golf course to trim the ears off the local pro, he said something else concerning another ambition next to his confident heart. "If I can just spring myself with The Desert Song in the can and tape some radio recordings ahead, I'll go to England this summer for the British Amateur and the Open. Looks like I'm ready at last, and who knows? Maybe I'll win 'em." Thus fired up, he ripped off another round for a disastrous 79—but that fiasco dampened his sporting ardor only fleetingly.

THE truth is that Gordon MacRae is the original, incurable optimist, an affirmative full-of-beans character who's never nursed an inhibition in his life. People who call him a "canny Scot" on the strength of his bagpipe handle are only talking to the birds. Actually, Gordon MacRae's ancestry is as much German as it is Scotch, but more actually he's the prototype of the all-American go-getter—reckless, aggressive, confident, and ready to shoot the moon, if there's an outside chance of hitting it, which he invariably believes there is. He's never played a card close to his vest in his life (and at poker he's deadly). He's never pussyfooted, hesitated, cavilled or gazed at the world over a dour frown. He's never hoarded anything—money, love, friendship or talent. He's not rich today; in fact, he's in debt, although he collects around $250,000 a year and keeps nine cents on the dollar of it after taxes. He's still paying for the Cadillac he bought in 1947, and not too long ago with hardly more than that tax money in the bank he looked at a $70,000 house his Sheila liked and bought it that afternoon. "Because," he explained with MacRae logic, "it was just right for us and besides the fellow who'd lived there had raised the same family we have—two girls and a boy—wasn't that wonderful?"

That may not be the most cautiously conventional way to acquire real estate but Gordon MacRae couldn't be cautious or conventional about anything if he tried. Whether it's sporting a green Tartan dinner jacket at a formal Hollywood affair, as he did once, or donning a silk top hat, which nobody's worn since the days of Valentino, for a Boulevard premiere, he acts as he pleases and obeys every impulse. Rules just don't dig him. Once, back East, Gordon got mobbed at a theater by a bunch of predatory teen age dolls. One swiped his handketchief and raced up the street. MacRae raced after her for three blocks, caught her and snatched it back. "Hey, that's mine," he said, "I want it."

Last Christmas, Gordon planned a big surprise for Sheila—the mink coat she's wanted for so long. With half the 14 rooms in his house still unfurnished, he certainly couldn't afford it but that was a small item to Mac. So he bought a beauty and took almost FBI pains to keep it undercover for the big morning. On Christmas Eve the furrier delivered it to him stealthily at Lakeside Golf Club and Gordon sneaked it in the back door at home, buried it under blankets high in a back closet. Then that evening, setting out for a cocktail party, Sheila happened to mention that it was a cold night and the cloth number she had might be chilly. So Santa MacRae raced back for the box, ripped it open and threw the premature surprise over her shoulders, after all the weeks of secrecy. "Here," he said, "maybe this will keep you warm." That's the kind of a Joe he is—just has to do what he feels like doing, right now and all the time.

What Gordon MacRae feels like doing most of the time is singing. He vocalizes every day of his life, no matter where he is—in the shower, hustling around the Warner lot, dining at a cafe, or slamming a pill on the Lakeside golf links. Members at the Lakeside clubhouse always know when MacRae's playing golf—they can hear him. As Bing Crosby has quipped, "When Muscles joined the club, seven crooners quit in disgust."

Mac himself tells a story about the time when he snagged a tiny singing role in his first Broadway musical. Between acts the weary principals flopped on couches, closed their eyes, their tonsils and rested. But Gordon kept on practicing his notes back of the wings. Finally one of them asked him sarcastically, "Gordon, do you know a song called, 'You'd Better Go Now'?"

"No," he replied gullibly, the hint floating right over his head, "but I'll look it up and learn it."

Yes, the boy likes to sing. And what he likes to sing best are his operettas on "The Railroad Hour" where he's been keeping pace with such Metropolitan Opera talent as Dorothy Kirsten, Rise Stevens, Pat Munsell, Blanche Thebom et al for the past five years. He loves that job above everything.

But he loves golf too, has ever since boyhood when he won the New York State Juvenile Handicap cup. So, about those irresistible impulses of his—

One Sunday morning when Gordon was fairly new to Hollywood and just clicking on "The Railroad Hour" he got a phone call. "Hi," said a husky voice. "This is Bing Crosby. How about a game of golf?"

As with most young singers, Bing was Gordon's idol, and the prospect of matching mashies with the Great Groaner made his pulse pound. But Gordon had a long Sunday rehearsal—one to four—he knew if he played golf he'd never make it back in time. He wrestled briefly with his conscience—and he lost. He called up the producer, "Got a cold, kind of hoarse," he said, "about that rehearsal today—"

"Stay in bed—take care of yourself by all means," counselled his anxious boss. "Don't take any chances with tomorrow's show." Relieved, Gordon grabbed his bag of clubs, and soon teed off with his idol, Bing, way out at Bel-Air.

Well, on the first hole he canned a neat birdie. On the second he collected a par. On the third his high, arching five-iron dimpled the green, scampered straight for the cup like a home-coming gopher and plunked out of sight for any golfer's dream shot—a hole-in-one!

Bing was delighted. He ordered the ball mounted on a silver trophy, spread the news around the clubhouse and of course the newspapers picked it right up. And the next day when Gordon showed up at NBC, a little sheepishly, what he got was, "I see by the papers that you were a very sick boy yesterday!" But in justice to Gordon it should be reported that the operetta he was singing he knew backwards and forwards already. Furthermore, it's the only time in his life that he every hookeyed away from work, or wanted to—and in his case you might reasonably call the lure of a golf match with Crosby an extenuating circumstance.

Usually, the question of work versus play is a conflict which simply doesn't exist with Gordon MacRae. The line between the two, in his consciousness is so fuzzy that he'd really have a rough time picking it out. It may sound corny, but actually Gordon was born to sing. He never wanted to do anything else, so to him work is play, and he eats it up. As to his self-confidence, he has a ready answer.

"Confidence," he'll tell you with no false modesty, "is nothing in the world but knowing your stuff, and that in turn comes from working hard and you don't work hard unless what you're doing is what you're crazy about. I've worked because I wanted to. I wanted to learn to sing the best I could. Now I know what I'm doing, so what I'm doing doesn't rough me up."

GORDON isn't a big man, but he's as sound as a rock. He's five-feet-eleven in his socks, and usually weighs in at 170. His father was a strong man before him. Gordon has never been seriously sick, today he collects about three colds a year and he doesn't know a Hollywood doctor's name or phone number. He swims every morning in his pool at home, slips in a golf game somehow, even when he's working (Lakeside's only a brassie shot from his studio). He's early to bed and early to rise, drinks lightly, eats ravenously and works it right off. At every studio break he's off to the mountains to rough it. That "Nature Boy" tag of Phil Harris' is really no gag, but Gordon MacRae all over; the outdoors has set his pattern for health ever since boyhood when he used to shatter the sleep of his neighbors whistling at dawn for his pals to hike for the wooded creeks and ponds around Syracuse, N.Y. with a can of worms, bent pins and a bobber. He played football, basketball, baseball and lacrosse in school and from all of that collected only a trick knee which bothers him sometimes when he dances. Otherwise, the results have been markedly constructive.

Although he's built like a light heavyweight he's never had a scrap in his life or even come close. There used to be a tough kid named Jack Sweeney in his home town who occasionally roughed him around but one day when Jack's baby sister tumbled out of a tree Gordon caught her and saved a crippling fall. After that Jack never bothered him, and maybe it taught him a lesson. Gordon didn't need one. The father he adored early taught him the precept of "turn the other cheek," although usually he doesn't have to. People don't pick on a guy like MacRae, and he doesn't flare to anger easily himself. He's spanked his children only once, and that was when he caught Meredith, his oldest daughter, turning on the gas jets and figured he'd have to impress her for safety's sake, or they'd all get asphyxiated. But that experience was twice as painful to him and he's never done it since.

This doesn't mean that Gordon MacRae is in any sense a softie inside. On the contrary he's never been wanting in any kind of courage. Last fall, after finishing About Face Gordon took off on a fishing trip to Lake Mead back of Boulder Dam where the bass are big, hungry and belligerent. He lured along some companions from the studio who weren't as experienced in outdoor sports as he is, so when the boat they hired conked its motor out right above Roaring Rapids, and the anchor slipped, there was bad trouble.

It drifted, of course, right into the narrow neck where the water was running 25 miles an hour and cold enough to crack a thermometer. The rocks ahead were wicked, there was only one thing to do. Gordon yelled, "Jump for it!" and jumped with the others after him. But they weren't all young and husky as he was. One man, in his fifties, couldn't make it to shore against the fast current, another got swept into a 30 foot hole. Mac saw what was happening and didn't hesitate. He jumped back into the stream, grabbed the men and helped them back inside the boat. Then he climbed in himself and off they all shot, careening through the foaming race that roared destruction around every boulder.

After the wild ride was over and they were all panting on the pebbly shore in the sun, the middle-aged pal reached over and took Gordon's hand. "Thanks, Mac," he said.

"What for?" came back MacRae. "I was saving my own skin too, wasn't I? Besides," he grinned weakly, "I wouldn't have missed that ride for a million bucks." But just the same he was plenty scared and he admitted it, and there have been other times, too.

Once, down at Ellington Field in Houston, Texas, where he was earning his navigator's wings during the war, Gordon went up in a Lockheed trainer whose pilot suddenly swerved into a speed bank that sent him rattling back in the ship like a loose bolt and grabbing for the escape door. Luckily, before he could open it, the plane, which being green he was sure was headed for a crash, straightened out and flew right. Luckily that is because, as he discovered when they landed, his chute was on cockeyed and if he had jumped he'd have planted himself like a potato from 3000 feet up.

At times like that a man has a right to sweat a little, and Gordon MacRae is only human. But as for moxie of the moral sort, there's nothing on his record to show that he's ever funked any kind of decision or responsibility—and he's had some very adult ones since he was twenty years old.

On last May 21, Gordon and Sheila Mac-

Rae celebrated their eleventh wedding anniversary. He had turned 20 just two months before he took the vows, was only two years out of prep school, and his prospects consisted of a precarious $50-a-week job with Horace Heidt's band, from which he was later fired. Reviewing their romance recently, a Hollywood reporter asked Mac, "Weren't you scared taking on a wife so young without any money to support her?" Which question only struck Gordon as silly. "Scared?" he puzzled, "What do you mean? I was in love!"

GORDON first laid eyes on Sheila Stephens, the blonde, British born beauty 11 years ago when she interviewed him for a spear-toting job at the Millpond Playhouse on Long Island. Their meeting and subsequent romance has been well and often described—but one angle to it hasn't. Gordon didn't enroll at that straw-hat theatre to meet Sheila Stephens, and he doesn't go there primarily to act. The reason Gordie sought a job near Roslyn, Long Island, in the first place, was because he had tumbled for a schoolgirl in Switzerland the summer before when he sang his way to Europe and back on a boat. It was because this girl lived in a nearby town that MacRae headed that way. Only, to show you how fast Mac knows what he wants, goes after it—and gets it—the minute he saw Sheila he switched compass points without wasting a date or a look the other way. And throughout the cold winter which followed he plodded four miles on foot through the snow to court Sheila.

She gave him a hard time at first on that project so it took a while but with Bulldog MacRae, Sheila didn't have a chance to say "no" and she knew it. He popped the question one night before a credit jeweler's window in Radio City where he was making exactly five bucks a day as a page boy, and at her first shy nod whisked her in and bought the ring, a microscopic stone so tiny it still falls out of the setting.

Herman Hover saw something terrible on the Strip. Actor driving an MG stuck out his hand for a left turn and tipped over. He forgot to remove his ring!

Mike Connolly

It hasn't been all a Merrie Melody, of course, or strictly candy and cake. Marriage never is. Gordon and Sheila have had their ups and downs, ranging from the time Cadet MacRae had to borrow 50 dollars from the Red Cross to pay his bride's hotel bill in San Antonio, through the luckier stretch when he landed on the Texaco Star Theatre and a Broadway show, Three to Make Ready at the same time. That's when he collected $400 a week and spent every dime on a fancy apartment in the swank East Sixties, a nursemaid for Baby Meredith and high old times around Manhattan. Now there's Hollywood. Along the way there have been troubles to meet and facts to face, the kind that make a boy and girl not just two people living together but a team.

They've had their feet on the ground, domestically speaking, since one day years ago in Chicago which proved to be the turning point of their marriage. That day Sheila, who was an ambitious actress herself and is still a good one, tried out for a part in a road company, got it, at three times the salary Gordon was making, then tearfully turned it down because it would keep them apart. She was only 18 then but she's never regretted it for a minute because stacked up against fame look what she's got—Gordon, Meredith, Heather and Gar, and a MacRae family share-the-success plan for them all, including the kids, which cuts everybody in on everything their old man does. Even the moppets are welcome wherever he works, and Sheila goes everywhere he goes—even up into the Sierra on camping excursions, where the last time her sightseeing nag peered over a thousand foot cliff and almost dumped her, her husband dropped their dinner in a trout stream and man eating bears—she swears—growled around their tent all night. More her style are the frequent trips to New York, where, if Gordon's singing, she sits rapt through every performance and then lets him take her out to the Blue Spruce Inn where they used to meet, or their favorite bistro, the Epicure, and occasionally clear up to Jones Beach where, as Mac sometimes grins crudely right in front of his wife, "we used to go and neck." And even today, when Sheila strolls out by the pool in her bathing suit (she's designed like Venus) he'll wolf-whistle and then act surprised, "Why, it's only my wife!" Which he knew, of course, all the time. But he means the whistle. "Someday," she's warned him, "you're going to whistle at the wrong girl and get your face slapped." But he doesn't think he'll make that mistake.

WHILE she's pretty soft on her man and proud of him too, Sheila MacRae would be the last girl in the world to claim that she owns the model husband. For one thing, he's inclined to get tied up too often and stay too late with the boys at Lakeside and show up when dinner's cold. For some others, he wrecks everything he sets out to fix around the house, hates to go dancing, is by his own admission the third worst dressed man in Hollywood (Monty Clift and Marlon Brando come first), drives his car too fast, and sometimes falls asleep at dinner parties (he even snored at Dean Martin's the other night). And about business and money matters he's a self confessed "pathetic babe in the woods."

His manager, Jerry Rosenthal, now has Mac on a tight allowance of $17.50 a week, nothing to paint the town red these days, but obviously a sound fiscal maneuver. There are occasional dollar limit poker games which go on sometimes when Gene Nelson, Jeff Chandler, Dean Martin, Pete Lind Hayes or some other of his closer pals shut the girls out for some hands of dealers' choice—or of course a slight "nassau" stake on the links with Bing, Bob Hope, Forrest Tucker or the pros, Ed Dudley and Harry Cooper, with whom he likes to match sticks.

Gordon had only one friend in Hollywood when he arrived—Bill Orr—the Warner talent executive who found him in New York and brought him out. By now he has hundreds, including Bill, of course. With MacRae his friends know where they stand. One lady, for instance, asked him and Sheila over socially one night, then made it pretty plain she had him there strictly to sing and entertain her guests for free. Gordon sang, all right. He didn't send her a bill as Will Rogers once did in a similar circumstance, but he never went back to her house. On the other hand, if he likes anybody he'll give him the shirt off his back.

No one who knows him has ever underestimated the size of Gordon MacRae's heart, and if sometimes he uses it to think with instead of his head, perhaps he can be excused. It's not a bad failing. The habit may not win him stacks of gilt edged stocks and bonds or acres of oil wells, which seem to count most with some Hollywood stars, but he's not the type to worry much about that. Maybe he's crazy to long for the Met and La Scala, the British Open, a fishing lodge at Tahoe which right now seem straight out of dreamland. And maybe he's not. They don't ever come true unless you dream them first.

the joan crawford myth

(Continued from page 49) disguised and he agreed to slip her in at the side entrance. But when Joan arrived she was wearing a big fur coat, the Crawford glamor bob, a big hat and even gardenias—her trademark flower in those days. Her silhouette was unmistakable even in the dark and two minutes later she was mobbed. Police had to be called to get her away from the theater in one piece.

Joan had really wanted to see her movie with that audience. But it was psychologically impossible for her to step from her car into a restaurant, a shop, or a theater filled with wild fans unless she was Joan Crawford. And to be Joan Crawford she had to look like Joan Crawford.

She wants everything. She says she wants a good marriage most of all and she claims that the failure of her three marriages was her own fault. "I gave both the men and the marriage too much," she says. "I wanted the perfect marriage but I knew that in Hollywood this is difficult to achieve. So I was going to show them I could do it . . . Well, I showed them."

But, if you will examine the record, you will see that she worked not harder but more purposefully on her career. When this career fell into the doldrums and her agent told her he couldn't find a job for her, Joan fired him and got herself a part in Mildred Pierce. It won her the Academy Award.

Joan was ill the night those awards were given out. Dramatically, her picture with the Oscar was taken at her bedside. She was criticized for not appearing at the Academy, sick or well, the way other stars who are nominated do. But psychologically it was impossible for Joan to go unless she was sure she would receive the award. Just as she always feels much more at ease in her own home than at other people's parties.

JOAN has handled her career as a movie star magnificently. Her career as a wife has not been so good. Actually she gave her husbands too much attention. When her husband was working on a film and she was not, she'd get up at the crack of dawn to prepare a lunch because she didn't want him to eat the studio food. Commissary food is sometimes bad but who wouldn't prefer kidding around with his fellow actors at noon to sitting alone in his dressing room? This desire to serve her husband stemmed from a good motive but Joan smothered him with kindness!

She needs love and romance. "I'm lonely," she says, but then she adds, "So what? Lots of people are lonely. I have a lot more than most lonely women."

She is a romantic. She says that her ambition is to "fulfill myself as a woman." But Joan has rigid ideals. She sometimes thinks she envies the girls who take their fun where they find it but Joan's spiritual qualities inevitably form her way of life. This being the case, it's hard for her to find a husband.

A charming, personable young man wooed her, recently, with delightful notes, cute telegrams and silly gifts. (Joan loves surprise packages. It doesn't matter whether the present comes from Cartier's or the ten cent store, she's like a kid when you give her something to open, something new to explore.)

This admirer couldn't have been more delightful and the notes and wires and silly presents were all in perfect taste. One of the notes told her that his ambition was to meet her and, he said, one day he would find a mutual friend who would introduce them. He found the mutual friend and he was, finally, properly introduced.

Then he promptly asked for a role in one of her films!

Cesar Romero—better known to his friends as Butch—is an old friend of Joan's. Butch is a wonderful dancer and when he and Joan get on the floor other couples form a ring around them to watch the poetry of motion they create. But Cesar is no romantic interest to Joan and that's why she was so amazed when, one day, the press started calling madly. There was a rumor that she and Butch had had a big fight on New Year's Eve.

"Me? Fight with my Butch? Why, that's why I've known Butch all these years. Because we don't fight," she said.

She told the columnist what had happened. They had gone to the New Year's Eve party. Joan had collected all the left-over horns and funny hats to take home to her children. She had danced a lot and at two o'clock she had begun to yawn. Joan is an early-to-bed. But Butch was having a ball and, she didn't want to spoil his fun so she decided the only sensible thing to do was to take a taxi and go home with the horns and funny hats for the kids.

At one time it seemed as if she were in love with Greg Bautzer. This was a wild and stormy romance. Neighbors reported that when the gates were locked against him Greg, his hands bleeding, scaled the garden wall. Joan would vow she'd never see him again, but then he would make some impetuous gesture or tell her how much he needed her advice—and she'd relent. But Joan does not thrive on off screen drama. Quite the opposite—she is always searching for peace.

Today Joan says, "I've been enormously lucky during my life time. Yet every now and again things pile up and up and up and the flood gates open and I cry my eyes out alone. Which is not conducive to good photography the next morning. When a woman's blue she's told to go out and buy a hat or change her hair-do. But I have three hats and never wear them and I've cut off practically all my hair. It doesn't do any good."

JOAN has put the full force of her energy into her four adopted children. But she has learned that even that can be a frustrating experience. A woman has a great desire for children. But they are babies for such a little time, and are quick to show their independence. You want to be their friend, give them the benefit of your own experience, and when they won't accept that you're baffled. Kids resent discipline when they are striving to be independent, so mother, to them, becomes not a friend but a dictator. "I've had to learn," Joan said, "that my children must go through this."

Joan never criticizes her children for publication. But because her name is newsworthy she was caught in a trap when Christopher, a high-spirited, handsome boy, ran away from home. Joan reported this to the police, and immediately, reporters and photographers flocked to her door to record the episode and whatever words—foolish or wise—the distressed mother said.

This publicity was bad for Christopher. It gave the episode an importance it did not merit. After the event he told a friend, "I guess I'll run away and get my name in the papers again."

Joan believes that if her children disobey the law they should have some privilege taken away from them just as an adult who disobeys the law has his freedom taken away from him. Joan believes that if a parent is playing a game with a child the child should not be allowed to win, intentionally. "You don't always win in life," she says. "Sometimes you win. Sometimes you lose. You learn that."

Not too long ago Christina, now 12, came to Joan and said, "I hear you used to be quite a Charleston dancer, Mother."

Joan repressed the smile. Was she a Charleston dancer? Why, when she wasn't doing the Charleston in her movies she was winning cups at the Cocoanut Grove night after night.

"I can Charleston," Christina said.

"I'm sure you can, darling," Joan said.

Christina gave her version of the Charleston and Joan applauded. Then Tina asked her mother to dance for her. Joan did the prettiest, easiest, most rhythmic Charleston the eyes of man have ever seen.

"Did you really do it that way?" Tina asked. Joan knew, of course, that this was the child's typical amazement at discovering that a parent can do anything well. Later Joan said, "If I hadn't lived off those cups I could have shown them to her."

This is the kind of honesty Joan Crawford has. And the kind of humor. But about herself as herself she has no humor. She says funny things that are funny but since she is her own conception of a movie star she must take herself seriously. Also she knows that movie stars must work.

Joan has two full time secretaries at her house and another away from the house. She is the only star who has personally dictated an answer to every fan letter received over the years. During the last World War she had a file of over 5,000 boys' names to whom she wrote regularly every week. This Christmas she sent out over 12,000 Christmas cards. When she is not on a picture she spends her time reading scripts and dictating. When she is working at the studio she has one of her secretaries come to take letters between scenes and for a couple of hours after the day's shooting is ended.

She works hard on the set, too. She has never been late in her life. She still puts on her own makeup. Nothing is too tedious for her to do if it will help the picture. Joan believes it is a good thing to be a movie star. And she has no patience with any girl in pictures who doesn't think so, too. As witness her attitude toward a new, untried girl who was given a good role in one of Joan's movies.

This girl looked down her nose at movies. She yearned to go "back to the theater," where she had never been. She thought Hollywood was just a good racket, a way to make big money. Also this girl was sloppy and Joan is immaculate both in her home and away from it. And besides, as Joan said, "she was rude to hairdressers, cameramen, makeup men, wardrobe women." This is something Joan can't tolerate. Joan always loves her crew and they reciprocate.

When the last day of shooting arrived everybody kissed Joan and she kissed everybody, and everybody was sad because they had finished a pleasant engagement. At last the girl came up to Joan. "Have you any advice to give me, Miss Crawford?" She asked. Joan, who is noted for giving good advice to earnest newcomers, gave her a long, level look, "Yes, indeed," she said, "I have some advice for you. Enjoy yourself while you can for I don't think you'll be with us very long."

"I've seen them come and go," Joan said later. "And this un-cooperative, rude, sloppy type goes faster than it comes."

JOAN, the movie star, is perfect. But faced with the reality of marriage, parenthood and day to day living she must know frustrations since she has to leap from the real to the make believe that has now become real. So she has thrown herself wholeheartedly into her new film Sudden Fear.

Sudden Fear is an independent film and she will participate financially in it. Contrary to what the public thinks Joan Crawford is anything but rich. In fact, at the moment, she is badly off financially. She has earned a fortune and lost it in real estate because she took an expert's advice.

To sum up this remarkable woman's character you must remember that for years magazines have printed stories called "The New Joan Crawford." Is she a new person every year? Hear what she has to say on the subject. "There has never been a new Joan Crawford. All the Joan Crawfords are me. I just grew faster and my growing pains were more acute, somehow. Why, all of a sudden I'd meet someone I didn't know and I'd say, 'Why, that's me.' It wasn't a new me, it was me finding new things in me and finding how to use them. These new things were always a part of me but I just didn't know it. I'd think I had finished growing and then there would be those growing pains suddenly. And I'd be surprised because I didn't expect them. I'm still surprised about that."

All these years Joan has been trying to blend the woman she could have become with the woman she made herself become. It's a neat trick. That she has not quite accomplished this blend of personalities accounts for Joan Crawford as she is today.

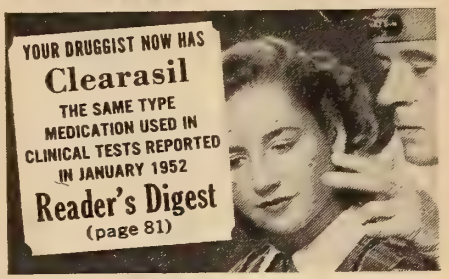
(Continued from page 51) many years working in nightclubs to prefer them to open sky and fresh air. Cocktail parties are awkward for us because we don't drink, and that often makes other people feel uncomfortable.

Even before we were married, Mike and I did a relatively small amount of handholding in restaurants. Our first dates were spent in the out-of-doors. Almost every week-end, we would pack a picnic basket and drive to Mount Wilson or the Mojave Desert. We went to the zoo, to the baseball games, and, occasionally, to the ballet in Hollywood Bowl.

There couldn't possibly have been a more romantic setting for courtship than the moonlight rides we used to take through the rolling hills behind Monte Montana's ranch, where Mike stabled his horses.



Mike is fond of telling people that the reason he fell in love with me was my mother's home cooking. There must be some truth in that; he had dinner at our place every night for months before our marriage. But the first inkling I had of my true feelings for Mike occurred when I became aware of his genuine fondness for animals. He cared for his horses with a gentleness and completely personal affection that set him apart from other men. From childhood, I have known that I could never love a man who was cruel or insensitive to animals.

I will always remember the day, only a few months after we started going together, when Dinky, my Boston bull pup, ate some poison on the lot. His death was a great loss to me, and I felt suddenly all alone until Mike talked to me. He was so sincere and sweet that I knew he understood completely how I felt. I was so broken up that I couldn't have managed the details of burying Dinky myself. But Mike took over the arrangements at the pet cemetery just as if Dinky were his.

The Quimbys don't believe in ads

You can't fool the Quimbys with any fancy advertising! They don't even read the ads.

Back in the days when all of our modern household conveniences were first advertised, lots of folks rushed out and bought them—later when the ads told of new and better models, they traded the old ones in. Still are!

But not the Quimbys!

The Quimbys just don't know very much about these things of modern America—and they don't own any of them!

And what you don't know can't hurt you—unless you want to enjoy life!

We think the Quimbys have been overlooking a mighty good thing.

The manufacturers of the products you buy have been trying to outdo each other for years to bring you new conveniences, new ideas . . . new improvements on the old . . . all of which have given us more of the good things of life than any other country in the world!

Companies can only grow when more people prefer their brand names. No matter how large or how small firms might be—you the consumer by your daily brand selections have the first and last word about their future.

I don't know of another man who would put up with the swarm of dogs I have around. There is Dukie and Rooney, and Annie, an over-friendly Airedale and Doberman pup who hasn't yet learned that she's too big to sit in people's laps. Mike likes them as well as I do, and I am sure he wouldn't mind a bit if I rescued another dozen dogs from the pound and brought them home.

It's difficult for me to explain to people, who don't realize how painfully shy I used to be, the many ways Mike has helped bolster my courage. I used to become absolutely petrified at the thought of watching myself on the screen. But after many months of going to movies and analyzing performances with me, Mike has at last begun to convince me of my own ability as an actress. The self-confidence I have gained has helped my work immensely.

Confronted with a problem, Mike is always buoyant and optimistic, and his sense of humor will always see him through any situation. I need that balance in my life, for my first inclination is to hide until the trouble blows away. Two years ago, when I went to England to play Lady Barbara in Captain Horatio Hornblower, I was simply terrified when the British press began printing critical stories about an American girl playing the role of a British aristocrat. When we were still a few days out of port, they began calling the ship to get a statement from me about it. I wouldn't have known exactly what to say. But Mike quite wisely told them to wait until we docked, and, in the subsequent interview, when he was asked what he thought about my playing Lady Barbara, he settled the matter once and for all.

"What's so great about Lady Barbara?" he asked the assembled newspapermen. "In the history books, she looks horse-faced and a little masculine. Now, we certainly didn't complain when Vivien Leigh came over to the U. S. to portray a beautiful southern belle. Why should the British press get in such an uproar about Virginia playing the role of an ugly female like Lady Barbara?"

After a hearty laugh, the reporters had to admit the logic of Mike's argument, and the dispute was quickly dropped from the papers. I seriously doubt that I would have made any sense at all if I'd talked to them alone.

There have been many other occasions when I needed Mike's calm disposition to guide me. I suppose some people, in similar circumstances, would have been upset by the hectic complications which surrounded our marriage. But because of Mike, they didn't bother me. I was working in A Song Is Born at the time, and we had difficulty finding, on such short notice, a minister who would marry us in the Presbyterian church. But after talking it over, Mike and I decided to be married at the Little Church of the Flowers in Forest Lawn. That evening, Mike picked up my mother and me and drove us out to the chapel. My maid of honor, Audrey Schuermann, an old school chum from St. Louis who is now a commercial artist in Los Angeles, was there. But Mike's best man, Eddie Foy, who was coming by train from the east, hadn't arrived. We waited and waited until it became clear that his train might be delayed for hours. Then we went ahead with the ceremony with Dr. Fox acting as Mike's best man.

After we were married, we all drove out to Mike's house in the San Fernando Valley for a brief reception where, finally, Eddie Foy showed up an hour later.

That evening, several people asked me what I intended to do about the decor in Mike's house. The place was obviously a man's lair, with Indian rugs, guns, and cowboy trappings everywhere, and I suppose his friends expected me to pull them down and move them out into the stable. But I told them that I thought the place had a lot of charm, just as it was, and that it would be lost the minute I started applying the feminine touch. In fact, until we rebuilt the whole house in 1950, the only room I changed at all was my own bedroom, where I added frilly curtains.

We had to delay our honeymoon until I finished A Song Is Born. But right away, I discovered that I had moved into a man's world. Every Sunday, we went out to Monte Montana's ranch, where Mike and Monte spent hours teaching me how to ride. I started my lessons in the corral, riding bareback to learn the natural gait of a horse. In no time at all, I became confident on horseback, if not skillful. Since those days, I have made two westerns and what I learned about horses from Mike was extremely valuable.

I have lost track of the number of times we have ridden to rodeos around Southern California in the back of a dusty old horse truck, bumping along over rough roads and loving every minute. That first summer, Mike bought me some beautiful riding clothes, and we made dozens of appearances at rodeos, riding in the grand parades just for the fun of it.

Many women I know would be completely unstrung if their husbands were called out of bed at one in the morning to help track down a half-crazed man who had just shot his wife and escaped into the hills. Yet that's what Mike did just a few months ago, and I was able to accept it with a reasonable amount of calm. He has been getting after-hours calls of this kind for three years, ever since he became a member of the Los Angeles Sheriff's Mounted Division, which works on emergency cases that the regular police cannot reach by squad cars. Last year, his group was called out to drive the cattle down out of the mountains during a big brush fire, and I have to admit that was one night I had to sit up over the coffee pot until Mike got back home safely. Still, if that is the way he chooses to serve his community, I know I'll never complain.

Ever since Mike and I were married, we have wanted to own a ranch—a real working cattle ranch that will provide us with an income and a stable existence after our careers in Hollywood have ended.

Last year, Mike and I bought a ranch near Tucson, Arizona, in partnership with Verne Goodrich, former rodeo rider and veteran stunt man.

Shortly after we bought the place, we spent five weeks in the big adobe house there, while Mike and Verne worked every day at clearing away the mesquite to plant a cotton crop. Even with a tractor, it was a man-killing job; but finally, after considerable expense, the mesquite was all uprooted. Surprisingly enough, the cotton grew and later was sold on schedule. But less than a month after that, the mesquite had taken over everything again and the job of clearing the land was there to do once more. Fortunately, before planting time this spring, we were able to sell the place at only a small loss.

This summer, Mike and I intend to take an extended automobile trip through most of the western states. One of the reasons, in addition to just being out-of-doors, will be to find a ranch. But this time, you can be sure, there won't be a clump of mesquite in sight! END

the road I travelled

(Continued from page 56) My family life was the troupers' life actors have written about so often. We were on the road most of the time. We liked to think of Danville, Illinois, as our home, because an uncle actually owned a house there, and it made us feel less like nomads. The truth was we couldn't even pause for tragedy. A sister died in one town, and two months later, when I was just over a year old, my father finished his performance while we were playing another city, walked into the wings and suffered a fatal heart attack. We would bury our dead and head for the next date, torn with grief even as we had to improvise new routines to replace the gap in the act left by the one who was gone.

In the mystic life that children lead maybe mine was not too strange. When I was singing or dancing for people I felt most justified for being alive, and what I was doing was almost a form of adoration.

"They like you tonight," my mother might whisper to me on stage. Nothing would please me more and I would throw myself into the rest of the number with everything I had.

At that age a youngster doesn't often distinguish between strangers, and when I had contact with one, even on the street, there was the feeling that he was always the same man. For instance, no matter what town we might be playing, if occasionally I got into some difficulty, fell, or feared crossing a busy street, there was always the big man who picked me up or helped me out and called me, "Sonny." He was always very tall, very strong and he'd win my complete confidence. To a child anyone who is friendly seems that way and such men are everywhere, of course. But to me he was one of my "people," and this added to the illusion that they were omnipotent and benevolent.

Two producers were talking and one of them asked the other what he thought of the last picture he had filmed.

"Well, frankly," was the reply, "I was a little disappointed."

A bit nettled, the other said sharply: "Who are you to be disappointed?"

"Huh?" was the testy reply. "Say—who do you have to be around here to be disappointed?"

Dan Bennett

Children brought up in homes have their fairybook heroes to help conjure up a magical world. Perhaps I, without such background, and yet with an active imagination, had to create my own and there was nobody but the people in the audiences to choose from.

There were exceptions, however. Strange little boys of my own age were not placed in such a category. They were just boys and you had to keep an eye out for them.

One winter we were in Spokane and between shows I was playing in the alley back of the theater with some empty boxes, just kicking them around. Then a kid my own age (about six at the time) showed up and claimed I was breaking his boxes. Before I knew it he had hit me and we were fighting. Even though he was smaller than I, as I remember it, he gave me a licking. But my lesson came not from that but from what happened when I yelled that he had won and I wanted him to get off me.

He got up and walked away. "Hey! Don't you want your boxes?" I cried.

"What boxes?" he asked. I knew then that they hadn't been his in the first place. He had just been looking for a fight. No . . . boys were just kids. They weren't people. Neither were little girls, perhaps because you didn't see them often in a theater, or maybe just because they were little girls. At that age that was reason enough!

It may strike someone that a kid as mixed up as I was spiritually and spending most of his life around theaters, hotels or boarding houses might easily have gone wrong. Yet I cannot remember ever being considered a vicious boy.

The worst family stories about me have to do with my dislike of being petted by anyone, even as a baby. If a strange woman would pick me up and coo at me I would drool horribly on purpose because I had learned that this made for a distasteful sight and I would be quickly put down.

And also, for a short period, I was a stink bomb thrower. I somehow had gotten hold of strips of film and learned that if you lit one and stamped it out immediately it would smoke for a while producing an unpleasant odor. What annoyed my mother particularly was that I used to throw most of them in the doorways or porches of our landladies. This was a direct violation of theatrical ethics; you often don't like your landlady but the nature of your vocation is such that you soon learn to treat her with the greatest courtesy. She stands for shelter and food in a foreign land—and you are always in foreign territory as an actor.

A PERSON can take many roads to God—a love of people was the one I stumbled on. It wasn't a bad one. All the qualities of spirituality were present even if it was perhaps only a form of make-believe. As a matter of fact there is a healing power in people under certain circumstances, as I learned one day when I had grown up and we were playing a New England city.

Our act was half-way through when I began to realize that we were winning no reaction at all from a half dozen patrons seated in a group in the front row. They just stared at us devoid of any expression at all. I began to concentrate on them but with no result. Finally, a little annoyed, I even heckled a bit. The idea of this, as far as a performer is concerned, is not to get any satisfaction from insulting the person he is addressing but to stimulate a response, any sort of response, after which he quickly re-establishes a friendly relationship. But I got nowhere with my frozen six.

When the next show started and I ran out on stage I was disagreeably surprised to see them still sitting there. Again I worked on them and again I got nowhere. The rest of the actors were angry about them, too.

As soon as I was offstage I ran up front to the manager to complain that a rival theater must be sending over "deadpans" to spoil the show and bother the actors—a practice not unknown in show business. He was sitting in his office with another man and came out into the hall to talk to me. He asked me whom I meant and I described the group. When I got through he smiled and told me I was wrong.

"The man in my office is a doctor from the state insane asylum on the edge of town," he said. "Those six persons who bothered you are his patients. He often brings groups of psychotics to the theater because they are greatly benefited just being in the presence of normal people. While you were feeling annoyed they were feeling proud that they could be there. But because it was an unaccustomed event to them, they were a little too nervous to appreciate what was happening on stage. They were being thrilled by a wonderful adventure of their own."

He introduced me to the doctor who talked further on the subject. And I was really thrilled by his words. It's funny how the knowledge that one has helped anyone, even accidentally, warms the heart. Every performer backstage felt good about it when I told them.

But my odd fancy, immortalizing the people in my audiences, couldn't last forever. It got a bad blow in Long Beach, California, when I was about eight years old. We were playing a short engagement. While we were in a cafeteria the earthquake of March 10, 1933, which took the lives of 127 people and injured more than 4,000 others, began rocking the city. I was frightened, of course, but not any more than the older people. But a little while later, when things had quieted down and we started to walk down the street, we had to pass a building where a heavy steel marquee had crashed to the sidewalk killing 15 people. The forms of some of the victims were still lying there, covered with blankets, and suddenly I wanted to scream but couldn't. I waved my arms and my mother bent down to speak to me.

"Donald! Donald! What's wrong?"

I tried to tell her but not a word came from my lips. Up to that moment I had really believed that strangers lived forever and that only we, the O'Connors and the others in the theater world who were actors, ever died. But here were people lying dead who were just like the people of the audience whom I revered. For the next two weeks I walked around dumb—the shock had taken away my voice. Believe it or not, but at the age of eight I was already suffering from having my faith shattered!

WHEN I finally could explain it to my mother she was understanding enough not to laugh about it, and afterward when we'd have periods of quiet together she'd tell me about the teachings of Catholicism. But either I wasn't ready for it, or I just couldn't make the switch from what I had believed. It took somebody else to get me thinking about religion—a seven-year-old boy whose father was a Presbyterian minister.

This was in Chicago while we were laying off between theater bookings. The boy was a neighbor, we liked each other, and one day I visited his house. I sensed immediately that his father was not like the priests who came to visit us, nor was his house like the parishes I knew. It bothered me. Perhaps because I had lost one faith and was trying to understand the one I was born into, it was disturbing to feel that there might be still a third to worry about!

When I got a chance I asked the boy about it and I remember his attitude; since he was the son of a minister he acted as if he could easily explain the whole thing to me—and he began. I don't have any recollection of what he said exactly but out of our talk I got my first knowledge that there were lots of religions . . . yet all very much the same. One thing bothered me and this question I can recall asking.

"Then people are the same . . . no matter who they are or where they are?"

He said they were and I felt better. Because I still relied on people, even though they had tumbled from their pedestals. People still made up most of my world. I knew I would always have to depend on them.

THIS may seem like odd kind of talk for small boys to engage in, and friends sometimes scoff and refuse to believe me when I tell them about it. For a while I started wondering myself if this ever happened, if seven and eight year olds were really talking religion. Then the other morning I overheard my daughter, Donna, who is only five, talking about a playmate of hers to our maid one morning at breakfast.

"Betty is not like me. Do you know that?" Donna said.

"Oh. Is she taller?" asked the maid.

"No, she's not religious like me," said Donna.

The maid gave a little gasp. So did I where I was sitting just outside the breakfast nook. And I listened closely for the maid's next words.

"Are you sure, Donna?" she asked.

"Oh, yes," Donna said. "She told me. She isn't religious like me. She is religious like she. She said it wasn't the same at all. And I don't like it."

"Oh, don't you worry," the maid said comfortingly. "I bet in the long run it gets you to the same place."

I could tell from Donna's voice that she felt better immediately. And so did I.

Donna goes to Sunday School while I had little or none of such training. By watching what she goes through trying to understand the perplexities of the world, even with this advantage, I can appreciate that my fanciful philosophy as a youngster was not too weird. Donna knows that there is a distinction between people and God, but she is also vague enough about it to say things like, "Of course, I was very young when Christ died."

In her way she will come to the same faith that I came to in my way. I feel confident that even those friends of mine who are non-believers in God, and who are so articulate in defending their atheism, will eventually find the security of following in His footsteps.

By whatever road I traveled I got where I longed to be and with an understanding of my relationship to Him. Somehow I have learned what prayer is, that to ask for the specific is meanness and only to seek the all good should be the purpose of such communication from the soul. One's conscience, one's sense of good and evil make this all plain in time.

And all this I learned in my own sort of Sunday School . . . the dingy theaters of the country . . . where I started off by worshiping the plain people who attended them! END

hollywood's most passionate loves (judy garland)

Did Miss Garland have any intention of returning to motion pictures? Yes, but she had no definite plans.

Any truth that Miss Garland was already married to Sid Luft, had, in fact, eloped with him to Cuba? Ridiculous!

How did she feel about being back in California? Just wonderful.

Did she have any plans for the immediate future? Yes, she would do her vaudeville act in Los Angeles, then repeat in San Francisco. She would finish there by June 21st or 28th.

Was it true that Miss Garland planned to marry Sid Luft as soon as her divorce from Vincente Minnelli was final? Judy turned beet red. "How dare you ask that question in front of my child?" she stormed. "Don't you have any common sense?"

JUDY'S divorce from 44-year-old Minnelli became final on April ninth. He promised to pay Judy $500 a month for the support of Liza, aged five, and gave up completely any interest in Judy's Malibu Beach house. Judy, in turn, paid him $25,000 for his interest in the home they had shared in the Hollywood hills.

As soon as this final decree was entered in the Superior Court, it was expected that Judy would elope with Sid who had flown into town a day after her arrival.

The day after her decree, however, she didn't rush to the preacher; she took Liza for a drive to Palm Springs.

"We had a nice quiet rest," she recalls. "We talked and took walks, and then when it turned hot, we drove back home. It was a pleasant, simple Easter vacation. Liza and I both had a wonderful time."

"But everyone expected you and Sid to get married," said an omnipresent reporter.

Judy grinned. "I know," she admitted. "What's the big hurry? Sid and I have each been married before, and we don't take marriage lightly. I love him, and he's definitely my fella. If the relationship continues as it has, we'll do it. But we're not a couple of kids who've got to get married this very minute or else.

"Some time during the middle of summer or maybe even before that when things slack off, we'll get married. Right now, there are shows to do, rehearsals, a million and one details, and I'm not going to sandwich a wedding in between."

What a change from the frightened actress who once felt that she must live every day as if it were her last, from the Judy Garland who once felt that no man really considered her desirable.

At 29, Judy has finally grown up. She has developed a realistic sense of values. She realizes that there is more to marriage than the passion she once thought was all-important.

Sid Luft, she knows, is responsible for her confidence, her comeback, her present happiness. When he's near her, she feels that everything will be taken care of, nothing will disturb her.

Yet, she is wise enough to know that Sid, too, is fighting a battle, making a comeback, regaining his stature.

It is no secret, for instance, that when Sid first met Judy, his financial condition was none too good.

As a matter of fact, his ex-wife, Lynn Bari, testified that at various times in their unhappy marriage, she had given him $16,000 in cash, $13,000 in property equity, and that after their divorce, he was delinquent in his support of their son, John.

To friends she confided her bewilderment at Luft's ability to take Judy dining and wining at expensive restaurants while he was $3,000 in arrears.

After Judy opened at the Palladium in London, and Luft flew over to manage her appearances, his financial affairs began to improve.

Upon returning to Los Angles, he immediately took care of his delinquent support payments with a check for $2,889.

Everyone talks about how wonderful Sid has been for Judy. It works both ways. Judy has been the anodyne for everything that troubled Luft.

Before he met her, Luft had been one of those handsome, personable men-about-town who somehow find it extremely difficult to settle down and specialize in any one type of work.

For a short while he worked as confidential secretary to Eleanor Powell. Then he joined the Canadian Air Force as a pilot officer. The pay was low, the prestige high. Later he worked in picture production, aircraft plants, and according to friends, "conducted an enterprise connected with horse-racing."

His best job, to date, however, has been as Judy Garland's personal manager, a job which has given him money, position, confidence, and the reputation of being a very shrewd cookie whose sole aim is Judy's welfare.

Sid is the organizer of M. S. Luft Productions, a company of which Judy is the principal asset. He has hopes of making a musical version of A Star Is Born, the old Selznick classic about Hollywood. It would be an independent venture and Judy's motion picture comeback.

One of Judy's closest friends is of the opinion that Judy will not marry Luft until Sid gets on his feet financially. The way Luft's been going this past year, he should have a substantial bank account very soon.

This thinking about money is another indication of the startling change which has taken place in Judy.

Three years ago, when she was drawing $5,500 a week from Metro, she had no interest in finance. Money poured through her fingers like water.

Nowadays she takes an interest in her earnings, discussing various investment practises with Sid and Abe Lastvogel of the William Morris Agency.

When Sid suggested that Judy might earn considerable royalties by making a record album for RCA Victor, and use those earnings to rent an apartment in New York, she checked the rent, the possible income and went ahead with the deal.

She is also investigating annuities and a trust fund for Liza.

Judy has been in show business her entire life, and she has seen what happens to men whose sole occupation is the management of their wives' careers.

Some of these men deteriorate into messenger boys.

Others develop into full-fledged stage producers, entrepreneurs of great acumen managers of distinction who branch out into allied fields.

Suppose after a few years of marriage to Luft, something happens to Judy, and she is unable to continue her career. What happens to Luft?

Judy herself won't discuss this with anyone, but she has thought about it, because she has developed a sense of realism.

What sort of step-father will Sid make? How will he treat Liza? How will Liza take to him? What sort of step-mother will I be to his son, John? Where will we live? Will we have any children? Won't we get on each other's nerves, not only living but working together? Can a man devote his whole life to a woman? Isn't there always time for marriage?

These are some of the questions Judy was asking herself several weeks ago. This was the type of introspection she never indulged in prior to her other marriages. This is why she said, "I don't think Sid and I will possibly get married before July or August. Working together as manager and artist, you know, is a good deal different from living together as man and wife."

Luft, too, is in no particular hurry. He loves Judy and has found the secret of keeping her happy—work and independence. But he knows, too, that she is a high-strung girl who requires careful handling. This is no easy job, especially for a fellow like Sid who's always relished his freedom and self-reliance.

As long as they have doubts, Judy and Sid won't make a move toward marriage. If by chance they have, as you read this article, then rest assured that it was only after the clouds of doubt had disappeared. For at 29, Judy has finally put passion in its place.

Steve Cochran is not an easy man to know. He talks very little about his childhood, although his family seems to have shared his easy-going attitude toward life. He was born nine years after his sister Vina in Eureka, just off the coast of northern California, where his father worked in a lumber mill. From the schoolroom in Eureka, Steve could hear the pounding of the surf on the beach, and more often than not he played hookey to sit on a jetty looking out over the Pacific and dream of sea-faring.

Before he finished third grade he'd been in love seven or eight times, but this career was interrupted when, at eight, his family decided to take him to Denver, Colorado, on a visit to his uncle. They got as far as Laramie, Wyoming, where the family jalopy, and the family finances were both exhausted. They were not only flat broke, but stranded in Laramie's worst snowstorm in years. For seven days and nights nothing moved in or out of the city, and Steve's father got a job in an ice house. They figured Laramie was a likely city so they settled down there and put Steve into school, where he fell in love the first day.

Steve can't figure now how his parents got the money—there never seemed to be any left over—but somehow they enrolled Vina in college. Despite Vina's having one of history's most tormenting kid brothers she got through, taught school one year and married. This left Steve more or less on his own where family life was concerned. His mother worked off and on, he never seemed to be close with his father, and almost their last act as a family unit was their trip to Denver, which they finally made.

From the time he was 12 to 15, Steve's summers were spent working on surrounding ranches, and on high school vacations he earned money as a gandy dancer. A gandy dancer, explains Steve, is a shoveler on a railroad section.

His name was enrolled and stayed for one year on the student roster at the University of Wyoming. He left because he couldn't see any sense in studying dramatics if he wanted to be an actor. He figured the only way to learn was to act.

Steve tackled it the rough way. His first acting job was with a Federal Theater project in Detroit, a city which he remembers with considerable displeasure because of his various lodgings there. No matter which boarding house he tried, the results were always the same. He had to creep quietly into the beds, for if he jumped in with any force he was choked by the resultant mist of green powder (bug-killer) that enveloped the room. This green powder has become synonymous in his mind with Detroit, for it was always there, in the corners, on the floor and in the mattresses. The sad part was the bugs seemed immune to it.

Steve tried Hollywood a few times, leaving it as soon as he had train fare. For Hollywood in the late 30's wanted men with lean jaws and drawing room noses. In those days, Steve Cochran looked like an itinerant who specialized in cow punching and gandy dancing. He soon added to his list of vocations, becoming a carpenter, a policeman, and a shipyard worker.

All this was neatly interspersed with acting jobs here and there. Once he directed and acted in the Junior League's Theater For Children in San Francisco. "As an audience, those kids were monsters," he says grimly. "Unless some guy was being stabbed or shot on the stage, they weren't interested. All they did was run up and down the aisles, puncturing each other with blow guns."

He kept trying Hollywood, and Hollywood kept sneering. His first real start was when he played opposite Constance Bennett in the Theater Guild road show of Without Love. On opening night in Columbus, the always confident Cochran suffered his first case of stage fright. "You're stupid," he kept telling himself. "You're opening in Columbus. Who's covering the show in Columbus? Calm down." But he didn't calm down and when he opened his mouth to speak his first lines, nothing came out but a humiliating squeak. He carried on in true fashion after that, and never again had any trouble unless it was the shattering experience in John Loves Mary. As the hero, Steve was to remove his trousers in the second act, and soon after the curtain had gone up on said act, a terrible realization came over him. In the next clinch with the heroine he whispered desperately into her ear, "I haven't got my shorts on!" After her next exit from the stage he could hear her footsteps tearing across the boards behind the backdrop, and when she came on again she gave him a reassuring nod. At his next opportunity to fade slightly out of sight he slipped into the wings, ripped off his trousers, and literally jumped into the shorts that were held there waiting for him.

Had he not done some quick thinking he would have found himself in a situation embarrassing even to him. For Steve may be a character, but he does draw the line. He bemoans, for instance, the fact that he has a reputation for being a 16-cylindered wolf. A lot of men, single and attractive, would find such a reputation to their liking, but Steve shudders for the times he has asked girls for a date and they've backed away from him, all but screaming with fright.

"Ye Gods," he says helplessly. "I'm only a man." But that, the dolls figure, is precisely the trouble.

He claims he's quite serious when he's in love but admits that his heartache over a broken love affair lasts from two P.M. to four P.M., at which time he once more has his eyes in focus. He was engaged four times, and married twice, once to Florence Lockwood, daughter of a portrait artist, by whom he had his only child, a daughter Xandria, and once to Fay MacKenzie. His first marriage lasted eight years, the second two years. Steve has now been single for three years and likes the idea.

"Once in a while," he says, "I start thinking about the advantages of marriage—a home and an anchor and hot meals and all that—and then I catch myself up. Whoa, boy! You'd be miserable within a year."

Steve likes his freedom. Considering the fact that most of his friends are married, he was once asked if he didn't feel like an odd wheel with them. "Nope," he said. "They're the odd wheels."

For companionship he has Tchaikowsky, and few men could ask for more. Tchaikowsky is a mutt, which fact cannot be safely stated in Tchaikowsky's presence. Tchaikowsky has to date bitten 21 people and been quarantined 19 times. The two times he escaped quarantine were pure luck and only served to make him wonder what was wrong, because he has come to expect such action directly after the spanking given him by his master. Tchaikowsky is part Schnauser and part heaven-knows-what, and was so-named because he has a faint resemblance to the composer, except, of course, that he is very much alive. He also has a slightly frightening countenance, as witnessed by the fact that one visitor to Steve's home keeled over in a dead faint when first beholding the dog. The man was sitting in the living room one night, facing the window behind Steve's back, and suddenly his eyes went past Steve to the window and his face froze in terror. Tchaikowsky was out there, standing on the hill by the window, which made him appear to have the height of a man. The light from the living room shone out and revealed two glaring eyes and a pair of appalling fangs, framed by a stiff mass of hair which stood straight out from the face. Nothing else was visible but it was enough, and the visitor breathed a choking sigh and lost consciousness.

Tchaikowsky was acquired 11 years ago by Steve as a decoy in the matter of meeting a girl. This particular girl had a supercilious Afghan which she used to walk in Central Park every evening. It was spring, and Steve had a hankering to meet this girl. He tried every ruse in the books but received only fishy stares for his pains, so as a last resort Steve became the owner of Tchaikowsky. Armed with his mutt, he sallied forth on an evening in May, certain that dog owners could always start a conversation. The end result of it was that Tchaikowsky bit the Afghan and the friendship never got started.

Tchaikowsky is, in his inimitable way, almost as famous as Steve because Steve talks about him all the time. Once Steve watched the dog coming home along a Carmel road, watched him pass a little boy without so much as a flick of his dog eyelashes. Thirty yards past the boy, Tchaikowsky turned on a dime, bolted back and nipped the kid in the derriere. "I don't know what gets into him," Steve says. Another time, when Steve was up in Folsom making Inside The Walls Of Folsom Prison, Tchaikowsky up and bit one of the guards. But the dog's real fame has come from his ability to play the piano. This he will do most willingly, in a haphazard way, at a whispered command from Steve, and once, when Steve got the idea of having Tchaikowsky play on a personal appearance tour with him, the dog made headlines when he tangled with the Musicians' Union. The dog could not play the piano, said the union, unless there was a standby musician, or a full standby orchestra in the pit, or unless he got a membership card. Tchaikowsky was furious and would have bitten Petrillo himself had the man been available.

The dog accompanies Steve wherever he goes, with the possible exception of Hollywood cocktail parties, but Steve shies away from these. "Ugh," he says at the mere mention of one. "Everybody trying to impress everybody else." Tchaikowsky did used to play the piano in sundry saloons. In appreciation of his talents the customers would toss pennies, and inasmuch as Tchaikowsky had no use for coins of the realm, Steve would collect a beer or two for himself.

Steve's dream idea of entertaining consists of a Roman style dining room. He wants a long, long table down the middle of the room, surrounded on all sides by comfortable couches. To lie down while eating is his idea of Eden, and he probably wouldn't object to having grapes dropped into his mouth by a batch of curvesome cuties.

The impression that Steve never moves unless necessary is erroneous. He just seems that way. He owns a 24-foot ketch which he keeps harbored at San Pedro, and is a Sunday afternoon sailor. If he doesn't sail, he paints or caulks. scrapes or polishes, and although he's never had the boat out longer than two days, he'd sail more if he didn't have other things to do. He rides a lot, and is making a home movie with some pals who have managed to get together a script, camera, sound equipment and lights. The film has been shot spasmodically for some months now, in places like the San Pedro wharves and a San Francisco boiler room. He writes letters to his mother, who now lives in Alaska, the result of a round trip ticket some six years ago. Mrs. Cochran decided she liked Juneau, in much the same manner she had liked Laramie, cancelled her return ticket and now runs a restaurant there, on the wharf.

Steve writes letters to his daughter in Carmel and fiddles about with the writing of plays. He keeps promising himself, every week, that he will start painting again, but there never seems to be time enough and his brushes and canvases remain in the closet. He studied art at one time but could never make up his mind whether he wanted to know about fine art, illustrating or cartooning, and settled on acting instead. His friends from Laramie keep in touch with him, one pal in particular who engineers trains through Wyoming, and wants to know why on earth he doesn't "come home for some hunting or fishing." Steve is paradoxical in that despite his boyhood in the wide open spaces he doesn't really miss them at all and enjoys himself in the city just as well.

"If I ever had my swan song in Hollywood," he says, "I'd go back up to Maine and work in a shipyard. You can always do something, you know. Or maybe I'd join the Merchant Marine. Every time I work on a boat for a picture I get the urge to sneak off to sea and leave the picture flat."

Travel has a strong fascination for him, not because he wants to visit famous libraries or castles or shrines, but simply because there are places he hasn't seen. He associates cities he has visited with strange memories. As it was bug powder in Detroit, it is whistling kids in Philadelphia. "Never saw anything like it anywhere," he says. "You drive down Broad Street and on one corner a bunch of guys are standing there and they all whistle when you go by. The next corner it's girls, and they whistle!"

When he's at home in Benedict Canyon, however, he contents himself easily. He has a battered collection of records which includes chamber music, and a library whose most well thumbed books are those by Shakespeare, Jack London and Erskine Caldwell. And he has his friends and he has Clarence and Tchaikowsky.

Steve takes life as it comes and doesn't argue with it. He is completely without pretension. He is a charming bachelor not constituted for marriage, but there's hardly a female fan who wouldn't be happy to get one good crack at becoming Mrs. S. Cochran. END am I too daring?

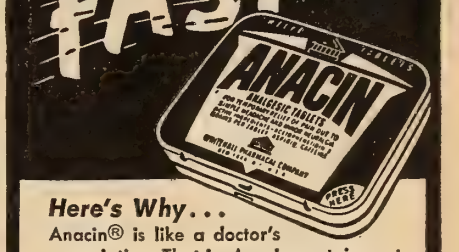
(Continued from page 40) calendar job, which I did as a legitimate figure model at a time in my life when the $50 I was paid looked like the vaults at Fort Knox. It was the first, last and only job of figure modeling I ever did in Hollywood. But having the news break at a time when several women were already making a point about my flamboyant taste in clothes, I quite naturally felt that both the calendar and the reasons why I posed for it might be misinterpreted.

I was advised to deny that it was me. But how can you deny anything so obvious? There must have been several hundred thousands of the calendar printed; you can get one anywhere. Anyone can tell that it is me, even though my hair was longer then and partially covered my face. So why try to deny it?



At the time I posed for the pictures, I was living in the Hollywood Studio Club, trying to pay for dramatic lessons with the irregular income I made as a model. Other than a few random fashion jobs, which pay very little on the West Coast, I hadn't worked for nearly a month; I was flat broke, the finance company was after my car, and I was four weeks behind in my rent. One day, in desperation, I called Tom Kelley, who is one of Hollywood's most artistic photographers, and told him I was willing to pose for the calendar job he had been asking me to do, off and on, for several weeks. As I told reporters, the job was perfectly professional and proper. Tom, who was shooting a series for an eastern calendar company, wanted a blonde model to illustrate the title "Golden Dreams." We worked only 30 minutes and he shot me in two poses. His wife was there, helping with the drapes and the lights. And the $50 he paid me for the job, I might add, was the most important money I've ever earned. It helped me to keep going until I got my first really important break in movies a few months later, in The Asphalt Jungle.

I am retelling this story, which has appeared everywhere by now, not because I like the story especially, but because I do not want it to have any relation to what I intend to say about the way I dress. I don't think it would be fair, and I do not want to put myself in a position where the obvious facts of my life can be distorted. I am very grateful that Hollywood has understood the circumstances associated with my posing for that calendar. It makes me wonder, in fact, just how much attention I should pay today to the criticism of my taste and habits of dress. Not much, I've come to think.

You see, I'm forced to admit that all of my adult life I have preferred to dress for men rather than for other women. For this reason, I suppose, I can not expect other women to appreciate or even like my clothes. But I do, and I was hurt by the accusation that I have no taste in my manner of dress. It is simply that, during the relatively few years I have been able to afford pretty clothes, I have always been most at ease when I am presenting myself on an unmistakably feminine level. Every suit, every dress, and every gown I own was carefully selected for its potential effect. Personally, too, I feel that if more women followed this same principle they would be more feminine. But that's only my own opinion.

I have always been clothes-conscious. Back in junior high school, I was painfully so when my entire wardrobe consisted of two hand-me-down navy wool skirts, two identical white cotton blouses, and an old red corduroy jacket. Then

FROM THE MOVIES

AN AMERICAN IN PARIS—Paul Whiteman* (Capitol).
This 12-inch LP record actually contains two complete albums' worth of music: the American In Paris suite on one side and the Rhapsody In Blue on the other, both conducted by Paul Whiteman, with Leonard Pennario's piano solo the highlight of the Rhapsody. Gershwin would probably have been very happy with both of these.

BELLE OF NEW YORK—original sound track album (MGM).
Maybe this LP, which presents eight numbers from the movie will help to remind you that good songs are still being written. These performances feature good melodies with delightful lyrics and many ingenious rhymes, ably sung. The music is by Harry Warren and the lyrics by Johnny Mercer.
Anita Ellis did the voice-dubbing for Vera-Ellen and she gets credit on the label for her two numbers, Naughty But Nice and The Bride's Wedding Day Song, which is subtitled Thank You Mr. Currier, Thank You Mr. Ives. Fred Astaire is his nonchalant self on Baby Doll, Seeing's Believing, I Wanna Be A Dancin' Man, and Oops! He's aided by the chorus on the clever Bachelor Dinner Song, and the chorus operates alone on When I'm Out With The Belle Of New York.

THE MAGIC GARDEN—Pennywhistle Blues by Willard Cele* (London); Buddy De Franco (MGM).
If you go for musical oddities, the original version by Mr. Cele himself is the one for you, though the flageolet isn't our idea of an instrument for lengthy solo performances. Buddy De Franco transfers the simple theme to his clarinet, with artificial results; jazz fans will prefer Buddy Blues on the other side.

QUO VADIS— Dramatic Highlights* (MGM).
Something new—MGM Records now comes up with a set of two LP records offering important scenes from the production just as they are done on the screen. Walter Pidgeon speaks an introduction written specially for this recording.
After Walter's said his piece, you'll hear Robert Taylor, Deborah Kerr, Feliz Aylmer, Nora Swinburne and just about everybody else you saw on the screen. Until the Hollywood companies start releasing the latest films for TV use this is about the closest you can get to having your favorite movies in your own living room.

SINGIN' IN THE RAIN—title song and Wedding Of The Painted Doll by Tex Beneke (MGM). All I Do Is Dream Of You by Ziggy Elman (MGM).

THE BRAVE BULLS—title song by Harry James* (Columbia).

WITH A SONG IN MY HEART—title song by Ziggy Elman (MGM). I'll Walk Alone by Leroy Holmes (MGM).

my only thought was that someday I might own, not a big wardrobe, but just enough clothes so other girls wouldn't make fun of me.

A few years later, at the age of 16 I began modeling, and was able to buy my first good dresses—dresses that fit. I discovered Vogue and Harper's Bazaar and, at the same time, discovered that the clothes they featured were designed for, and modeled by, women with boys' figures. Even at that age, I realized that I didn't have a boy's figure. I certainly don't now.

I wonder how many women really fall for that routine under the pictures of sliver-hipped models in the fashion magazines— "You can be an entrancing, new, exciting you, madam." Obviously, they must discover that they can't be the minute they go to a store and try on one of those creations, that is, if they can get it on in the first place.

Personally, I never tried to. When I was still a girl, I realized that I had a full woman's figure. I know, too, that my figure enabled me to earn a living as a model for several years before I got into movies. What, I ask you, is wrong with that?

Even today, I do not own an extensive wardrobe; I can't yet afford one. In fact, the clothes I own have had such a personal meaning in my life that I can remember every outfit I have ever bought since I started in pictures. They are all good clothes, however, and I think they are in quite good taste, if seemingly somewhat flamboyant.

The first expensive clothes I ever owned were the three suits which I bought on credit from a Hollywood ladies' shop when Twentieth first signed me in 1948. They were all expensive—one grey, one beige, and one dark blue dress suit. In a flush of enthusiasm, I also bought every accessory to go with them—also on credit. I learned a lesson from those clothes, and I never really wore them comfortably, for three months later, when Twentieth dropped my option, I couldn't pay for them. The minute I stopped working the collection agencies descended en masse. I had an awful time getting that bill paid, and I swore never again to buy any of my clothes on credit.

BELIEVE it or not, I did not own a single cocktail dress until a few weeks after I'd completed Asphalt Jungle. Then I bought a simply-styled, black silk faille dress with a long narrow slit down the front which is held together with a tie. I wore it with black arm-length gloves and no $125 was ever better spent, in my opinion. Some people thought it was a little daring, but I love the dress, now as then. I wish I could still wear it to parties, but it has had its day, I'm afraid.

My first expensive evening gown was the one I purchased for the Foreign Press Association's annual dinner, where I was presented with a Henrietta award, and named as one of Hollywood's most promising young players. I very gratefully accepted the award, and later, was told I looked nice doing it. But I also heard that some of the women present had thought my gown a trifle extreme for the occasion. I seriously considered these comments, but, in my opinion, they were not reason enough to take the gown back to Oleg Cassini, who designed it. I've always admired his taste and imagination in women's clothes, and my gown is no exception. It is a red velvet creation which fits snugly down to the knees and then flares out, in the Lillian Russell tradition. It plunges somewhat in the front, but not extremely. Frankly, I love the gown and wish I had more occasions to wear it.

I have another evening gown which other women criticize but which has won me an appreciable number of fine compliments from men. It is a strapless red silk taffeta, snug from the bodice down to the hips, which is covered with black French lace. At I. Magnin's, where I paid a stiff price for it, I was told that the dress was the only copy of an original purchased by a San Francisco social leader. I wonder if her dress has ever been criticized in her set the way mine was the night I wore it to one of the few formal Hollywood parties I have attended. This is the gown that provoked so much comment from the Hollywood columnists . . . it was the proof positive, they claimed, that I was utterly lacking in taste. I'm truly sorry, but I love the dress.

My favorite dress, however, is an off-the-shoulder cocktail dress, made of beige lace over coffee-colored silk. It has a sort of tail effect in the back.

My only other new cocktail dress is a black silk by Ceil Chapman which has a big puff at the side and drapes tightly around my legs. I like its slimming effect.

I have also heard a number of comments about the two suits which I own, both of which are simply styled and, I think, tastefully designed. Perhaps it is the way I wear them; I honestly don't know. The black one, by Christian Dior, I wear with a simple red beret, black pumps, and a red rose at the bosom to add a touch of color. The beige one, I wear with brown shoes and a yellow rose. I rarely wear costume jewelry, but I like flowers. I don't think however, that either suit is made especially provocative by wearing flowers with it.

The other day, when I was hurrying to the makeup department across the lot, wearing blue jeans and a T-shirt I had put on hurriedly at home, I was stopped by one of the executives in the casting department who told me, "Marilyn, you shouldn't wear blue jeans on the lot." "Why?" I asked, thinking that of all places, the lot was the one place I could feel completely at home. "An actress should always look her best," he said.

I suppose this is true. But I have always felt comfortable in blue jeans—they're my favorite informal attire. I have found it interesting, however, that people whistle at jeans, too. I have to admit that I like mine to fit. There's nothing I hate worse than baggy blue jeans.

I have only a few other idiosyncrasies about clothes. I like bare-looking shoes for both formal and informal occasions. I believe, like the classic Greeks, that a woman's feet are an important part of her beauty. Furthermore, when I dress for formal occasions, I never wear a girdle or other confining garments. Freedom of movement is very important to a woman, psychologically as well as physically.

During the brief period I have been in motion pictures, I have always considered that my clothes and the way I wear them are very important to me. But I have never consciously tried to make a public display of my clothes.

I suppose, however, because of my background as a model, I will always have to expect that a tinge of daring might seem to be associated with my attire. Not very long ago, I wore the bathing suit which I model in We're Not Married to lunch in the commissary at Twentieth. With a robe over it, of course. The next morning, I was surprised to read in a column that I was seen eating lunch in my bra and panties. I suppose that from across the room the flesh-colored inset on my suit made me seem scantily attired. But I wasn't.

I know myself rather well, I think. Personally, I don't consider myself too daring, in my dress or in my behavior.

I leave it to you to decide. Am I too daring?

darling, you're nuts!

"That threw me again. I thought, what's wrong with me that he wants to wait till next week to call? But I said, airily, 'Oh, sure. Do give me a ring.' That was Saturday night and he called me Monday morning. We nxed up a date for the following Saturday."

THERE's a tiny place tucked away in Los Angeles called the Tiffany Club. Only real hot music lovers know about it. But Janie's that, and so, it turned out, was Trav. He couldn't have made more of a hit with her than suggesting that they go, not to a plush nightspot, but to the Tiffany to hear Nat King Cole.

Thus, on their first real date together, they were bowling along downtown, and, to be in the mood, Janie was singing King Cole's "Lush Life" along with the record being played on Trav's car radio, when smash! Trav jammed the car in front of them which had stopped too suddenly.

In an instant, Trav was out and apologizing to the driver, a little old lady. They looked over her car and saw that he hadn't actually hurt it at all. He gave her his card, the name of his insurance company. The lady, responding to his charm and good manners, gave him a smile, and drove on. It wasn't until then that Trav noticed his own car—his new car, his luxury car. That had its whole nose jammed in! It was third-cousin to a wreck and it turned out to be a very special art to even limp it to the Tiffany Club. Finally, the automobile club came to haul it away.

In Bronco Busters, John Lund and Scott Brady play the title roles, so the studio wardrobe department fashioned some "saddle pads" for them to wear during riding scenes. "They're falsies," said Lund, "only with a reverse twist."

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

Janie and Trav laughed like crazy, heard Nat King Cole till dawn, took a taxi back to Jane's—and Trav said he'd call next morning. He did. They had two dates the following week. They had three the week after. The week after that they had four and by the end of January and up until they broke their engagement, they dated every night.

But in between there were those pressures—those special Hollywood pressures for love and the very special Hollywood pressures against it.

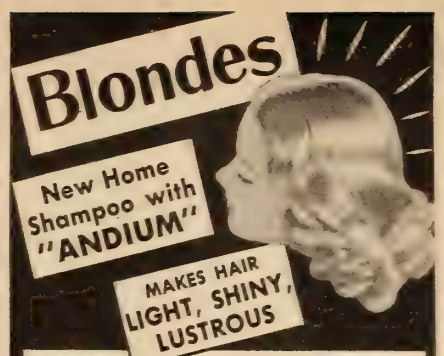
"I'm impulsive," Jane confessed, sitting in the library of her exquisite home. Outside, making an enormous racket, were Maureen, who is now 10, and Michael, who is seven. They were impatiently waiting for their mother, who was driving them out of town for a special week-end, just the three of them, away, alone together. "I'm madly impulsive," Jane repeated. "I do things and then I think, What did I do? And when I have that doubt, then I know I must pause and get it straightened out."

You can search the Hollywood record backward and forward and you'll never find a star who has kept things straightened out better than Jane. Take the matter of agents. Most stars change their agents about as often as they change their hair styles. Not Janie. When she first came to town, an unknown little radio singer, she signed with an unknown agent named Lou Wasserman. He's still her agent, still one of her best friends, but now he's climbed as high as she to head the mighty MCA.

For another example. It's an old Hollywood wisecrack that all stars fight with Warner Brothers, that is, if they are under contract to them. Jane started with Warner Bros. She is still with Warner Brothers. On both sides it's a mutual admiration society. On both sides they are happy as larks.

One more example. Most stars turn over their domestic help as often as they turn over their bank balances. Janie has had the same wonderful housekeeper, Carrie, since before Maureen was born, and the way they glow at one another makes you feel as though you were in a room full of white satin stoves. Now Janie, on her charm bracelet, wears a fifty cent piece, which has been dipped in gold. She gives that pixie grin of hers when she explains its significance to her. "When I first started out in this business," she says, "a friend gave this to me and had it engraved, 'It's the principle of the thing.' And it is. Everything is. You've got to get the principles right and stick with them, particularly in this town, or you are utterly lost. This gold-dipped 50-cent piece looks like gold, but it isn't really. On the other hand, it's not quite—or rather it's more, than a half dollar."

It is because Jane sincerely believes, and rightly, that love in Hollywood is like that 50-cent piece—at once itself and more than itself—that she felt she had to pause on the threshold of marriage. In justice to herself and Trav she wants to be sure of their love.



"Whether or not we like it," Jane said to me, "any of us who become so-called 'names' do become public institutions. I'm not saying we aren't royally rewarded for it. I'm not claiming it isn't all very exciting and wonderful. I love it. But the fact still is that our lives get cut up more than a boarding house pie. In the broadest sense my life is divided into three sections—Jane Wyman, the movie star, who makes two pictures a year or maybe more, then the mother of Maureen and Michael Reagan, who tries to be a good mother, then Jane Wyman, herself. However, on top of that, there's the 'institution.' The 'institution' calls me here to help launch the Red Cross drive or Community Chest or something like that every week or so. I'm asked to broadcast for the Hallmark Card Company, or a dozen other firms and I'm delighted to do so, because they have been so good to me in the past. Then, ever since 'Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening,' the 'institution' has been in the record business.

"Don't tell me that I don't have to do all these things. I know that. Yet they are very hard to resist. They are part of an enormously exciting business. Besides, all of us out here always think these extra activities will not take as much time as they do. In fact, they always take twice as much time as we expect, but still we don't believe it."

THE "institution" then was what exerted the special pressures on Jane, when she and Trav began dating seriously and nightly. One of those very special pressures can be traced to Hollywood's dramatic instinct to build up everything twice as high as it really is; a second pressure is publicity. All Janie's friends, and she has legions of them, began asking, "Darling, are you really in love again? When are you being married?" And when Ronnie married Nancy Davis the questions came thick and fast. "When are you setting the date?" Janie was asked from dawn to dusk.

Then publicity came along and said, "Hey, this is getting rough. What shall we tell the press?"

Naturally, Trav had his side in all of this, too. He's a handsome fellow—tall, dark and laughing. For a brief time, he wanted to be an actor. However, he changed his mind and went into the construction business, and to his great credit has made a wonderful success in the business world.

"That's one of the things I find so stimulating about Trav," Jane said, "that executive ability. But when I stopped to think about what marriage would mean to us, I began wondering where we would live. Not here. I would certainly never subject a new marriage to the pressure of living against an old background. You know how that can ruin things."

Janie's face lighted up, suddenly. "One of the best things I can say for Trav," she explained, "is the way my Michael likes him. Michael's all man, and very much my protector. In the past I've had a couple of escorts he didn't like. He behaved beautifully at all times, was very much the little gentleman, but simply too dignified. I knew Trav was 'in' the day Michael brought down one of his toys to him and asked, 'Do you know how to make one of these things work?' Trav was able to repair it instantly."

I think Jane would give up anything or anybody who'd seem to shadow Maureen's or Michael's happiness. The two of them attend a very fashionable school, about 40 miles out of Hollywood, and are home every week-end. Lots of other movie children go there—Joan Crawford's Christina and Christopher, for example—and Jane alternates with other mothers in going down to pick up their various broods. But Jane gives up every Friday to Monday, whether or not she is acting as school chauffeur, to her son and daughter.

Add up all of these factors and you see, as Jane does, "the special pressures."

Add them all together, and you can see how it was possible for her to go to dinner and dance all evening, and then, homeward bound, tell Trav that she felt it wiser to break their engagement.

And really it is wise as everyone knows to want your mind to be as completely in love as your heart seems to be. And really it is wise, particularly in Hollywood, to wait.

Except that even though Trav said, "You're nuts, darling," they still see one another every night and call one another every day. And she's thinking about his future and he's thinking about hers.

And do you think any two people, who aren't wildly in love, act that way? END

(Jane Wyman can soon be seen in Warner's The Story of Will Rogers.—Ed.)

hollywood's most passionate loves (liz taylor)

Elizabeth has always been looked upon in Hollywood as a sensationally beautiful ignoramus. This isn't so. Even Mike was surprised to discover the depth of her knowledge of art. Most people have overlooked the fact that Elizabeth, close as she has been to her father, has absorbed a vast knowledge about paintings. Her father once had the Hatfield-Taylor Art Gallery at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Unlike many another actress, Elizabeth never paraded her intelligence, but to prove the fineness of her taste, she gave Mike six in a series of Augustus John drawings for Christmas, and he gave her a Huldah painting of a young girl. (Huldah, by the way, did a portrait of Elizabeth for her parents).

When I last talked with Elizabeth, she told me the hitherto untold story of the struggle she and Mike had to find a house in Hollywood. Long before the trip to London, Elizabeth and Mike took long rides around Bel-Air, the beach and Beverly Hills, searching for the type of home they wanted to settle down in. At long last, in the Riviera district, not far from the old Will Rogers ranch, they found what they wanted—an extremely modern home with a view, which could be seen from practically any direction through huge glass windows.

Then, a few days after the marriage, Elizabeth called her mother, gave her the address and asked her to start negotiations. Cleverly, she told her mother not to divulge the name of the purchaser, and the deal had almost gone through when the prospective seller noted the name of the party on Elizabeth's check. Something went wrong then, and by the time the minor detail was straightened out, the price had jumped by $15,000.

But there was another house, almost equally attractive. It had a swimming pool, which is almost a necessity for both Elizabeth and Mike who are expert swimmers. At press-time, it was a toss-up between the two places. And here again, another lie about Elizabeth can be destroyed once and for all.

Mrs. Wilding has been pictured as an extravagant girl who has no sense about money. If this were so, how does it happen that even though her studio was prepared to advance her the down payment against her salary, she refused to complete the deal because it was too much money. Unlike some of her friends who have gone into hock for show palace homes, Elizabeth has insisted that her marriage be solvent from the beginning.

Girls with the dollar complex, of which Elizabeth has also been accused, are notoriously selfish and neurotic. On one occasion, Elizabeth said to me, "You know, it is a fact that Michael once seriously considered giving up pictures entirely to go back to painting, and he may do just that one day. When he does, I'll retire with him, you may be sure of that."

And, on the same subject, let me assure you that I have never heard Elizabeth complain about how much money was taken out of her check for taxes, which is a familiar theme with many an actress.

I recall that not too long ago, Elizabeth was publicly spanked in the press for dancing cheek to cheek in a Hollywood night club with Stanley Donen, but she won't be doing that with Mike. The fact of the matter is that Elizabeth, like a lot of other Hollywood stars, went night-clubbing because she was unhappy. Most people who go to night clubs do so because they are not happy at home. In London, Liz and Mike are seldom seen in the gay places.

Her routine is sleeping late in the morning, reaching the studio in time for lunch and spending the whole afternoon on the set. They rarely go out, except to the homes of intimate friends. They have been horseback riding at least two days during their weekends in the country, staying with friends. If, in a way, Liz was a doormat for her first husband's desire to show her off, she certainly isn't for Mike. She has a new maturity now, though she won't be 21 until next February.

It is odd that the moment you apply a microscope to the simple facts of Elizabeth's new life, you discover another old lie that deserves to be denied. During her first courtship and marriage, she learned to smoke, and she smoked too much, nervously. Today, she likes an occasional cigarette for enjoyment, not to prove that she is sophisticated.

ELIZABETH has always loved dogs, and she and Mike have been spending many hours romping with a mongrel wire-haired dachshund which he brought home, unexpectedly, as a present for her. This is the first pet that Elizabeth has had since her return from her first turbulent honeymoon when she learned the news that her dog had died of convulsions at the vet's.

Remember how fashion designers nearly reached a knock down drag out stage in creating a voluminous wardrobe for Elizabeth for her first honeymoon? At that time, she was extremely clothes conscious, but that's all changed now. Mike, who frequently shows up in one of those sport shirts, with no buttons at all, has brought a casual attitude into her feeling about fashions. Today she ignores mink capes for an omnipresent polo coat until one bystander at a cocktail party was heard to comment, "Good Heavens, doesn't that girl ever dress?" Perhaps that's where some of the stories started that she and Mike weren't too well off, financially.

I am afraid that the interest in our Elizabeth is so great that she and Mike will constantly be followed by the hounds of falsehood. As, for instance, the story about Liz' paying for the honeymoon. She did. But I learned that the rest of the story is that Mike could only take $70 out of England, and he insisted on spending every last cent of it on a big dinner in Paris, their honeymoon night. Naturally he had to draw on Elizabeth's dollars.

Elizabeth feels very strongly that it's idiotic to question anyone about whose money pays for what. On her new contract she earns $4,000 a week for five years without options. Mike earns perhaps half that amount here, but he has continuing properties in London; in fact, he has a percentage of the pictures he does with Herbert Wilcox, and it is entirely possible that in a year or so his total earnings could be more than Elizabeth's straight salary arrangement.

The contrast between Elizabeth's first marriage and her second will be forever inevitable so long as she is a star, but there is no genuine comparison. The child-bride marriage is almost completely forgotten in her life, now. Whereas Elizabeth lost many pounds of weight due to worry and sadness when she was Mrs. Nicky Hilton, she gains weight with ease now that she is Mrs. Michael Wilding—and this set off another widely circulated rumor concerning expected motherhood.

Recently, Elizabeth laughing heartily, said to her mother, "Look, Mother, I have a double chin," to which Mrs. Taylor replied, "I don't care if you have three double chins—just stay as happy as you are."

And what are the chances of this?

The girl who once said, "I thought I was grown up enough to handle marriage—but I wasn't. I found out two weeks after the wedding that I'd made a mistake—but it was a beautiful wedding, wasn't it?" now says, "I want to know my husband and like him as well as love him!"

Personally, I think that this marriage, full of youth, excitement and—yes, let's use the word—passion—is a wonderful continuing story of perfect romance, so long as Liz and Mike can keep it from following Hollywood tradition. And my personal wager is that they will!

P.S. About those baby rumors. They're planning a family—but not for another year. Although, nature has a way of ignoring brides and grooms and budgets. END

Q. Why does MGM keep suspending Ava Gardner and taking her off salary?
—B. Y., Smithfield, N. C.

A. Because Ava refuses to work in pictures offered her.

Q. Is it true that Ingrid Bergman plans to return to the U. S. later this year?
—S. R., Biloxi, Miss.

A. She hopes to make it around Christmas time.

Q. Every time I pick up a movie magazine I read that June Allyson's real name is something else. Once and for all, when June was born what name did her parents give her?
—D. R., Denver, Colo.

A. Ella Geisman.

Q. I understand that Kirk Douglas is the other man in the Lana Turner-Fernando Lamas love affair. Is this true or a publicity stunt?
—Y. T., Bath, Me.

A. Publicity stunt.

Q. Isn't it true that Dale Robertson now regrets his hasty marriage and wishes to be single again?
S. E., Reno, Nev.

A. No.

Q. Now that he's shed his fourth wife, with whom is Clark Gable going these days? —I. F., Little Rock, Ark.

A. Natalie Thompson, ex-wife of actor Robert Hutton.

Q. The Mona Freeman-Pat Nerney marriage has been played up for years as one of Hollywood's happiest. Was it ever really happy, and what broke it up?

A. The marriage has been foundering for years because Mona has been more successful than her husband.

Q. Wasn't Gene Kelly a lawyer before he became a dancer?
—T. O., Pittsburgh, Pa.

A. He studied law at the University of Pittsburgh as an undergraduate, but never entered law school.

Q. Why does Mario Lanza remain in Hollywood if he isn't particularly happy making movies?
—K. G., Phila., Pa.

A. He has a contract.

Q. Will you please settle an argument by publishing the name Kirk Douglas went by when he and his family lived on Eagle Street in Amsterdam, N. Y.?
—B. Y., Ellenville, N. Y.

A. Izzy Dempsky.

Q. Why won't Jane Wyman permit photos of her children to be taken for publication? —S. R., Ball, Minn.

A. In this matter she has always deferred to the judgment of her ex-husband, Ronald Reagan.

Q. Why did Jeanne Crain have to reduce so drastically after her fourth child? How much weight did she gain?
—D. U., Columbus, Ohio

A. Approximately 30 lbs.

Q. How come Alan Ladd and Joan Crawford answer letters from their fans, and some movie stars don't?
—R. E., Gainesville, Fla.

A. All movie stars try to. Ladd and Crawford happen to have very efficient secretaries.

Q. Isn't Bing Crosby retiring from the movies to concentrate on television? Doesn't Bing own two TV stations?
R. Q., Wilmington, Del.

A. Crosby isn't retiring from movies. He has filed applications with the Federal Communications Commission to own and operate two stations. Permission has not as yet been granted.

Q. Hasn't Ricardo Montalban been married more than once?
—N. S., San Diego, Cal.

A. One civil ceremony, one church ceremony, with the same girl, Georgianna.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

The Bennys throw the party of the season . . . Everyone's talking about the Tony Curtis-Piper Laurie feud . . . Will sisters Joan and Olivia make up? . . . Farley's playing it cozy in Europe.

MODERN SCREEN PAID A VISIT TO LIZ

Liz' dachshund is a lucky puppy (see page 52).

Dancing to waltz music is a favorite pastime.

THE PARTY of the Season was a dinner dance Mary and Jack Benny gave honoring Mr. and Mrs. William Goetz. All our glamour girls were out in full regalia looking like pictures.

Jane Wyman's lavender tulle with violets was one of the conversation pieces. So was Rosalind Russell's very long white dress with full skirt. I notice long dresses are coming back. Linda Christian's long white gown was much admired, too.

June Allyson seemed to be having more fun than anyone else there. She danced and danced, and when Dick Powell got up and played with the orchestra you could hear her laugh above everyone.

The dancing was rapid, gay and in the samba mood. To see dignified Dore Schary really cut a rug with Barbara Stanwyck, Loretta Young, Mrs. Schary and others of our beauties, was something.

Ginger Rogers was with Greg Bautzer, and, as this goes to press, she's mad about the popular lawyer.

I danced with Gordon MacRae, who was there with his pretty Sheila. What a nice boy that MacRae is. He's one of my favorites among the actors of our town.

To mention all the beauties would take this whole section of MODERN SCREEN. But I must say that Mrs. Louis B. Mayer, Irene Dunne, the hostess herself, Mrs. Goetz and Deborah Kerr all had gowns that were outstanding. I had a new dress myself—and I liked it.

The bobby-soxers have taken the new Mrs. Johnny "Cry" Ray to their hearts and well they might. She is sweet little Marilyn Morrison, daughter of Charlie "Mocambo" Morrison, and she's a very nice girl.

All this excitement of being the wife of the teenagers' craze is something new for Marilyn, but she's taking it in stride.

Both kids were on the phone with me right after the ceremony, because I was the one who said they would marry when other columnists denied it. Hope I can always be as right as I was with that one.

The long smouldering fight between Tony Curtis and Piper Laurie came right out in the open when Tony had a battle with his studio and was put on suspension.

There have been rumors of a feud for a long time between Tony and the flower-eating gal, but no one thought much about it until Tony said out loud in print that he'd never again make a picture with Piper.

I happen to know that the reason for Tony's stand is that he believes Piper said something that is a slight against his bride, Janet Leigh. Piper says she didn't mean it that way.

THE whole town was surprised when Tony lost his temper and said he wouldn't sign with Universal-International again.

In addition to the Laurie debacle, he is very bitter that U-I took him off salary because he went with Janet on location for her picture. He says he just wanted to spend his birthday and their anniversary with his bride.

The studio retaliated by saying they had made many concessions to the young lovers in the past—in particular a telephone bill for

AND MIKE WILDING TO BRING YOU THESE INFORMAL PICTURES OF THEM "AT HOME" IN THEIR LONDON APARTMENT.

Liz and Mike usually dine at home, sometimes invite close friends.

The Wildings both love good music, own a large record collection.

Her quiet new homelife agrees with Liz, who looks prettier than ever.

Mike, who likes to paint, is working on an oil portrait of Liz.

over $1000 Tony ran up calling Janet while he was on a personal appearance tour.

Now that she is so well—I can tell you that Shirley Temple nearly died following the birth of her son. Complications set in after birth and Shirley was unable to leave Bethesda Naval Hospital for two months.

Dr. William Bradbury, the Los Angeles surgeon who delivered little Linda Sue, was summoned east for consultation over Shirley's condition. Although Linda Sue's birth was natural, it was decided to have a Caesarian section performed for the birth of her second child.

I talked with Dr. Bradbury soon after he returned to the Coast. He had nothing but praise for Shirley's courage and the tenderness and consideration of her husband, Lt. Charles Black.

Of course, when Shirley's condition was so serious, her mother, Mrs. Temple, rushed East to her daughter's bedside.

Now what do you do in a case like this? I heard that Arlene Dahl and Lex Barker had reconciled and were on a "second honeymoon" in Laguna.

I called them there and got Arlene on the telephone.

"Now, Louella," said she, "don't say we are reconciled. It's true Lex is here with me. But there are still many problems we have to iron out."

She admitted, however, they were "having a lovely time."

What I want to know is—when is a second honeymoon not a second honeymoon?

Charlie O'Curran takes no sass from his movie star bride, Betty Hutton, which is the best way I know to keep her interested.

Recently, Betty corrected the way Charlie pronounced the name of Renoir, the French painter. "It's Ren-woir, not Ren-ore," said Betty to her bridegroom, but not unkindly.

"Okay, okay," said Irish O'Curran, "and remember this, baby. Stop calling me a dance director. I'm a choreographer. And until you can spell it, I'm still going to call him Ren-ore!" And that put Betty in her place.

Will Olivia De Havilland's separation from Marcus Goodrich have any bearing on her long strained relationship with her sister, Joan Fontaine?

Many people ask me that question, and my answer is—I think so, definitely.

Joan once told me that she was sure she and Livvie could get together except for the influence of Goodrich.

His (and Olivia's) intense dislike of Joan dates back to the time they announced their engagement and Joan is supposed to have made the wisecrack that Goodrich was an old beau of hers.

She didn't actually say that. What she said was that she knew him and had met him socially—or some such thing.

But Marcus never forgot—and when he takes hold of a grudge he is not a boy to let go. Of course, Livvie was hurt, too, by the manner in which her sister's remark was quoted to her. Joan once told me, "I love my sister—and sometime, someway, when she is not under the influence of someone unfriendly to me, I believe we will regain the understanding we once had. That will be one of the happiest days of my life. And it can't come too soon for me."

Joan is in Europe making a picture and she won't be back in this country for several months. When she does come back—well, we shall see what we shall see about these famous feuding sisters.

Zounds and Wowie! Am I getting mail from our service men protesting the Joan Evans interview (not with me) in which she talks on Parent-Child relationship. Joan scoffed at the "old-fashioned" idea of children calling their parents "Mom" and "Dad" and advocated substituting their first names.

A letter signed by "Two Soldiers in Korea" lambasts: "It's too bad these modern brats can't be over here for awhile—and then they would come to know what those wonderful words, Mom and Dad, really mean! Never in our hearts do we think of them as Elizabeth and George or Ann and Frank because we want to remember them with respect and affection as parents, and not as contemporaries.

"I'd like to get inside Joan Evans' mind and find out what makes her tick. She gives out the damnedest interviews about the damnedest bunch of modern nonsense we've ever read. Frankly, we are sorry for her. To grow up without sentiment and old-fashioned things like that is to miss some wonderful emotions in life."

Poor Joan—she does seem to get her foot in her mouth everytime she gives out one of those "modern youth" stories of hers.

FRANK SINATRA was telling us about his and Ava's harrowing flight home from Honolulu when one of the motors on the four-engine plane conked out exactly half-way over the Pacific. Too far out to turn back, the pilot decided to continue with the "injured" ship.

"We were told not to worry," laughed Frankie, "and rehearsed putting on our life-belts and on how to get out of the emergency exits if we were forced down.

"Then, over the loud speaker we were cheerfully told that a United States Army plane was following us—just in case anything happened. I looked at Ava and she said, "Well, it's nice to know a plane will be flying over us. They can look over and say, 'There they are—let's take some candid camera shots!' "

It may be funny to look back on—but it isn't anything the Sinatras want to go through again any time soon.

It's a riot to visit on The Road To Bali set while Bing Crosby, Bob Hope and Dorothy Lamour are working. The boys call lovely, glamorous Dottie "the old lady." The old lady has her hands full not being thrown for a loop by the way Bob and Bing ad lib dialogue. Usually, she manages to keep a straight face.

But the other day, they broke her up completely.

There's a gag scene where a gun goes off and the bullet goes straight up in the air. An elephant drops down.

"What's that?" asks Bob, according to script.

"A Republican!" ad libbed Bing—and it got such a big laugh it's going to stay in the picture.

The whole town's talking about Linda Christian's statue in the all-together which she presented to Ty Power for his birthday and had installed in the garden of their home.

I must say we're certainly getting a good view of many of our belles what with Marilyn Monroe's nude photo on a calendar and Julia Adams nearly-nude photographs which she posed so a statue could be sculpted of her. Her husband gave his permission.

WHY is Farley Granger playing the recluse in Europe? They're calling him the male Greta Garbo over there.

During the entire crossing from New York to London he didn't come out of his stateroom except to parade the decks late at night after everyone had retired.

When the Queen Mary docked at Southampton, he turned up his coat collar and brushed past newspapermen with a surly, "Nothing to say."

What a difference from the trip he made last year with Shelley Winters when they didn't stick their noses outdoors without being photographed or giving out with the interviews.

Farley's attitude isn't adding to his popularity abroad and, frankly, I can't see the reason for it.

WHILE I'M wondering about the conduct of gentlemen, I might bring up Travis Kleefeld, fiance of Jane Wyman for a hot moment.

Since his breakup with Janie, the rich Mr. Kleefeld has been romancing about town with the estranged wife of his former best friend, Keenan Wynn.

Romancing is hardly the word for the 'necking" Travis and Beetsie do in public. They are becoming something to stare at around the nightclubs with their persistent smooching.

If they have to do this sort of thing—why not wait until Beetsie at least files her divorce suit against Keenan.

Nobody arrives in the MGM wardrobe department wearing the gosh-awful outfits Debbie Reynolds whips up. When the studio calls her for fittings, Debbie goes just "as is."

The other day she whipped in wearing pajamas, a topcoat and mukluks!

Another time, she wore her Girl Scout suit. And still another, nothing more than a bra and slip under an evening wrap!

"Who cares?" yips Debbie. "I'm not a glamor girl."

In my grandmother's day they would have called Debbie "a card."

The least temperamental of actresses, she recently surprised her co-workers by ordering the I Love Nelda set closed while she did a specialty number—locked and bolted yet!

Then she hung up a fifty-cents admission price on the door.

She sold more than 150 boxes of Girl Scout cookies to those who wanted to watch and raised a nice tidy little sum for her favorite organization.

"Sometimes," mused Missy Reynolds, "I believe I have a touch of Hetty Green in me."

I FIND I have a few thousand words more to say about Tony Curtis' new attitude toward his career.

I'm sure it is unconscious, but I think Tony's close friendship with Jerry Lewis has had a peculiar effect on him.

Jerry's success with Dean Martin has lifted him high into the big money bracket. He has a big home with servants, swimming pool, camera room and practically all the other big star trappings.

Tony doesn't envy Jerry all this. He is glad he has it. But, somehow I feel that he expects his own career to bound along and skyrocket as his pal's has.

Young Curtis is an entirely different type of actor and he hasn't the big field to operate in that Jerry does—nightclubs, theater appearances, TV, radio, and other fields of entertainment.

I realize Tony's salary at Universal-International is not big—perhaps not big enough in view of his popularity. But he must remember that most of our big stars have served their apprenticeships in lower salary brackets and that when the right time comes, they get on the gravy train.

Tony's and Janet's days of living in a small apartment and economizing so they can help their families won't last forever the way they are both going.

He should be patient and bide his time. Quarreling with a studio has never benefited a new star.

THE Letter Box: "Persimmons," Chicago, writes: "Are you mad at Rock Hudson. You never mention his name." You are wrong, Prissy. I have interviewed him for a Sunday newspaper story and I print all the news I hear about your favorite.

From London, Cassie Carter tells about Janet Leigh when Janet was there appearing at a charity affair sponsored by the Duke of Edinburgh. "Janet admitted she was very nervous before meeting the Duke because she has a very loud laugh. 'And then I found out that the Duke laughs louder than I'."

Doris Day—please, please, please answer your fan mail and requests for pictures from our boys in Korea. Corporals Joe Gottlieb and Jim Wynne are the latest to protest to me their disappointment over hearing nothing from you. You should not have to be begged to do this, Doris.

Vivien La Monte, Kansas City, asks: "Is Carleton Carpenter always jiving it up, singing and playing drums in nightclubs?" No—I wouldn't say so. Carleton has his serious side. For instance, he plays an excellent game of bridge.

famous columnist for
The Hollywood Reporter

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

At the cry of "Fire!" all the stars dining in Warners' Green Room commissary were electrified into action. Seconds later every one of them was racing toward the expanding chaos. Among those holding their skirts high, running to do anything they could to stop the $1,500,000 blaze, were Kathryn Grayson, Virginia Mayo, Doris Day and Phyllis Thaxter. Also working feverishly, passing fire-fighting equipment from hand to hand, were Gordon MacRae, Burt Lancaster, Steve Cochran, David Brian and Lon Chaney, Jr. And, at the end of the struggle, they stood and stared at the gaunt skeleton of once glamorous sets . . . Barbara Stanwyck's son, Tony, donned the khaki of Uncle Sam at Fort Ord . . . Hollywood can't figure which Debbie Bob Wagner is most interested in: Reynolds or Paget . . . Ann Blyth is all smiles because the Army has returned Richard Long to Hollywood . . . Marilyn Monroe's only after-effect from her operation is a bent ear. The guy who was bending it was baseball's Joe DiMaggio—twice a day, and by long distance!

Paget

Shelley Winters gave her age as 25 when she and Vittorio Gassman were wed in Juarez, Mexico. Huh? . . . There was a buzz around town that a "deal" had been made with the District Attorney and that Walter Wanger would get out of his jail sentence for shooting Jennings Lang. The D. A. indignantly denied it. Wanger will serve the term . . . Meanwhile, Lang made his first public appearance since the shooting on the Racquet Club tennis court in Palm Springs, a few days after Wanger was sentenced . . . And her closest friends say that Wanger and Joan Bennett will never reconcile, although the Rev. John Smith of All Saints Episcopal Church in Beverly Hills has done everything possible to bring these two together again . . .

Hunter & Rush

Jeffrey Hunter and Barbara Rush finally got away to San Francisco for their honeymoon, after 18 months of marriage . . . I'm waiting for Bing Crosby to frame his birthday gift from Bob Hope. It's that nude calendar picture of Marilyn Monroe, with Bing's head superimposed . . . Bing dropped the keys and newspaper he was carrying when 100 couples greeted him in the living room of his Holmby Hills home singing "Happy Birthday To You" . . . Next time a star tells me he's too busy to make a charity appearance because he's busy making a picture, remind me to remind him of Jane Powell, Joan Evans and Vera-Ellen. All were working before the cameras every day but all entertained for the Mother Cabrini benefit one Saturday, then put in all day Sunday at the Santa Monica Auxiliary hospital benefit.

Dahl & Barker

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Arlene Dahl and Lex Barker separated shortly after a friend sent Lex a shrunken head from Lima, Peru, and Arlene ordered him to get rid of it—although I'm not trying to say that's WHY! Actually, these two will reconcile when she devotes less time to being an actress and writing a beauty column and more to being a housewife—if they haven't already reunited when you read this . . . Remember the fuss when Esther Williams won the Sour Apple Award? Hollywood Women's Press Club is seriously thinking of calling off the annual award headache. I guess there aren't that many uncooperative stars in town . . . Lana Turner screamed to me when the columnists started linking her romantically with Kirk Douglas. It looks like she and Fernando Lamas will wed in Mexico as soon as they get their respective divorces—although for a while there it looked as though Lana's lawyers wouldn't be able to locate Bob Topping to serve the divorce papers.

Turner

Liz Taylor went back on salary, after almost an entire honeymoon without a paycheck, when she returned to MGM to star in The Girl Who Had Everything. She asked the studio to change the title, claiming, "It's misleading—I don't have everything!" . . . Bet you'll agree with me that "Zing Me A Little Zong" is hit parade material after you hear Jane Wyman and Bing Crosby sing it in Just For You . . . None of their pals holds out any hope for Zsa Zsa Gabor and George Sanders to reconcile. Even though Zsa Zsa says, "This was never a marriage—it was a love affair!" . . . And the Gary and Rocky Coopers were just as rocky as ever at press time. Gary lunched with her at her home one Sunday recently, took her to the polo matches that afternoon, and then dined with her at home again that night. Next night she was out with one of the polo players!

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Jane Russell's business manager allows her only $100 a month pocket money . . . RCA-Victor's recording deal with Mario Lanza guarantees him $150,000 a year for life. His Red Seal royalties last year alone exceeded $500,000 . . . Vittorio Gassman's weekly paycheck from MGM is $1,250—just $250 short of spouse Shelley Winters' $1,500 a week from U-I . . . Howard Hughes rewarded Ann Blyth for taking over the role that Claudette Colbert bowed out of in The Korean Story with a free trip to Honolulu . . . Paramount paid Jean Arthur $150,000 to settle her contract. It called for $1,000 a week for ten years and it had six more years to go.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

They say Charlie Morrison, who operates the Mocambo, threatened various members of the press with mayhem when they printed that his daughter Marilyn would marry Johnnie "Prince of Wails" Ray. He kept denying they'd wed up until Marilyn and Johnnie said "I do" . . . You've got troubles? When last heard from, MGM's June Allyson was insisting on retiring, Ava Gardner was demanding that she be allowed to spend more time with her "Old Man" between pictures, Jane Powell wasn't able to make pictures because she was having a baby, and Janet Leigh was rebelling against making too many pictures . . . And Tony Curtis was insisting that U-I, the studio that made him a star, let him out of his contract.

The Gable divorce was one of the fastest on record. Lady Sylvia untied the knot in court here in exactly 12 minutes . . . This was exactly the same day, same court, that a girl named Jill Winkler Henry won her divorce from John Henry. For the record, Jill is the widow of Otto Winkler, the press agent who died in the plane crash that killed Carole Lombard! . . . Meanwhile, Josephine Dillon, Gable's first wife, pressed by a reporter for a statement, said: "I never asked Clark for alimony and didn't want any. Right now I'm happy sitting under my tree in North Hollywood and giving drama lessons in my barn" . . . Despite all the fights with Gloria Grahame and Jack Palance on the set while the picture was shooting, Joan Crawford tells me that Sudden Fear is far and away her best picture since Mildred Pierce. Joan could use a good picture just about now . . . Somebody noticed that one of the lady guests attending a Los Angeles Press Club party was wearing slacks and asked that she be ejected. But nothing came of it, because they found out it was the guest of honor—Jane Russell!

Russell

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Those close to Rita Hayworth will tell you that she will never love anyone as much as Aly Khan. At any rate no one has been found who has ever heard her say a word against him . . . Jean Simmons and Stewart Granger rented a 30-foot sailboat for July and August, and I sure hope it's smooth sailing! . . . Shirley Temple, who was laid up in a Washington, D. C., hospital for a while with virus and anemia, told chums she can't wait for hubby Charles Black's tenure with the Armed Forces to be over so that they can return to California. Can't blame her, if Washington's as hot this summer as ever . . . Marlon Brando finally found a permanent home for his pet raccoon. It's now languishing at his parents' place in Libertyville, Ill.

Don Loper decorated the three Beverly Hills Hotel bungalows reserved for Queen Juliana of the Netherlands and entourage of 40 with oranges (for the House of Orange) and white tulips . . . At MGM's reception for Her Majesty, Leslie Caron was the only one who curtsied. The rest shook hands with the Queen . . . The door chimes in Ezio Pinza's Connecticut home now ring out "Some Enchanted Evening" . . . Don DeFore has a plaque over his fireplace that reads: "God Bless Our Mortgaged Home" . . . Mario Lanza's nomination for the world's meanest thief is the so-and-so who sneaked into the new house Mario bought for his parents and removed all the electrical appliances—including refrigerator, deep-freeze, automatic washing machine, TV set and custom radio-phonograph—which he had had delivered there as a Mother's Day surprise. Neighbors reported seeing someone with a truck hauling things from the house but said they assumed it was okay. The radio-phonograph was equipped with a tape recorder so that Mario's mother could record and save his Friday night airshows.

FUNNIES:

Laugh and the world laughs with you. Cry (if your name's Johnnie Ray!) and you sell 2,000,000 records! . . . It strikes Steve Cochran strange that a guy will propose to a doll under a light he wouldn't think of choosing a suit by . . . Blackbirds building their nest high on the Stars And Stripes Forever set have been attacking Clifton Webb's beard. Clifton says they think he's from the Something For The Birds set . . . And over at Warners, the pigeons who nest in the ivy have been upsetting Ray Bolger, who says, "We'll either have to get rid of them or have them tuned" . . . School kids in Beverly Hills are now singing a song that goes like this: "Heigh ho, Silverware, Tonto lost his underwear! Tonto say, 'Me don't care—Wild Bill Hickok buy me 'nother pair!" . . . A snobbish young contract actress charged into the mail room at MGM and screamed, "Where's my fan mail?" The mail clerk squelched her with: "Two postcards came POURING in for you this week!"

Cochran

ODDS BODKINS:

Fantastic, all the fabulous picture deals that have been offered Alan Ladd since he left Paramount, even though he has appeared in nothing but mediocre pictures for years. Imagine what would happen if he came up with a real HIT picture! Could be Shane, incidentally . . . MGM plans sending Vic Damone on a two-month cross-country theatre tour the moment he steps out of khaki . . . Tribute To A Bad Man will be Hollywood's most candid look at Hollywood to date. In it, Lana Turner plays a temperamental film star. Kirk Douglas a producer, Dick Powell a writer, Barry Sullivan a director and Walter Pidgeon a studio boss . . . Loretta Agar is modeling for John's ma in the senior Mrs. Agar's Beverly Hills dress shop.

Sinatra

Lois Andrews, who used to date Michael North, went to Las Vegas to stand up at the wedding of Lee Levine and Michael North, who used to be married to Mary Beth Hughes, who is now married to Lois's ex-husband, David Street. Whew! . . . Janet got her hair cut shorter than Tony's! . . . Nancy Sinatra is taking singing lessons and everybody's wondering if she's planning a career like Frankie's . . . Kathryn Grayson, who's on loanout from MGM, inherited Joan Crawford's old dressing room at Warners. Katie's making The Desert Song there . . .During his dull, dreary locationing stint with The Pony Soldier in Arizona, Ty Power sent to Hollywood for his old pictures and everybody sat around, lacking anything better to do, and looked at them every night.

SEX APPEAL:

Models were so pretty, the male judges weren't keeping their minds on their work at Modern Screen's fashion show at the Jeanette MacDonald-Gene Raymond estate in Bel-Air. It was the month's most pleasant turnout. June Taylor opened the show with a splashy swimming splurge and platebearers at the buffet spread included Ann Sheridan, Terry Moore, Ursula Thiess, Bob Stack, Jeff Hunter, Barbara Rush, Frank Lovejoy, Vera-Ellen, Keith Andes, Corinne Calvet, Vanessa Brown and Sally Forrest . . . Order went down from the front office at 20th that there must be no back-lighting for a scene in My Wife's Best Friend in which Anne Baxter wears a mere four-ounce silk negligee . . . Joyce MacKenzie reverted to being a brunette after she finished Night Without Sleep—"because as a blonde I just felt too darned sexy!"

Connolly & pals

Gordon Douglas, who's directing The Iron Mistress, told me, "Virginia Mayo plays a hot-blooded New Orleans gal who drives men mad in this picture, and that's why I won't let her wear a girdle" . . . Cashing in on Marilyn Monroe's nude calendar publicity, an enterprising moppet in Stone Canyon has been hawking views of Marilyn sunbathing in her private patio at the Hotel Bel-Air. His dad's gardens on a high knoll overlooking the hotel offer a bird's-eye view . . . Some New York television executives decreed that Arlene Dahl's decollete gowns were too LOW AND BE-HOLED to be viewed by the folks watching her show in their homes. That's why she wore those high-necked outfits you saw.

WHO'S MAD AT WHO:

Jeff Chandler is very unhappy because Ty Power got the role he wanted in U-I's Mississippi Gambler. Jeff is on straight salary at U-I. But Ty has a 50/50 deal—that is, Ty owns half the picture and the studio the other half. And all this despite the fact that Jeff's Apache Pass, which cost only $680,000 to shoot, is making as much money at the nation's boxoffices as U-I's other big money-maker this year, Bend Of The River . . . They've dubbed a femme columnist who loves nothing better than to write about the matrimonial difficulties of the stars Miss Friction Writer of 1952 . . . Dr. Lindstrom decided not to sell his house after his custody fight with Ingrid Bergman over their daughter, Pia. He'll be back in Hollywood with Pia after he finishes his present job in that Pennsylvania Veterans' Hospital.

PAT AND MIKE

■ MGM took two veteran stars (Hepburn and Tracy) and added them liberally to a sparkling script by Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin. The result, like its predecessor, Adam's Rib, is a fine warm human comedy called Pat And Mike.

Katharine Hepburn (who never looked more enticing) is cast in a hand-tailored role as a high-class lady named Pat, who can golf, play tennis and do everything sportswise. Her stuffy educator fiancé (who resembles Willard Parker but is named William Ching) keeps repressing her. So, in an effort to be an independent success, she turns pro athlete.

Promoter-manager Tracy (as Mike) is a New York sharpie with an eye for a fast dollar and the maintenance of his reputation at Lindy's. He owns a race horse (Little Nell) and a big dumb prizefighter (Aldo Ray) and isn't loath to add a female gold mine to his collection.

His bad grammar and shady connections don't detract from the fact that under his loud pinstripe beats a heart of gold.

Katie's fiancé mixes things up by jinxing her every time he watches her play, and there's a small complication of three soft-spoken racketeers who think they own part of Miss Hepburn.

But if you can't guess the ending, then you're immune to this inspired casting of two unretouched grownup charmers who belong together like ham and eggs, Scotch and soda or . . . Pat and Mike.

There's an added fillip in the appearance of real-life athletes like Helen Dettweiler, Babe Didriksen Zaharias, and Gussie Moran plus panties.

But the big moments are when Hepburn gives her off-hand delivery of lines (like people really talk) and Tracy goes in for some tempered histrionics. Aldo Ray also scores brilliantly as a likable bruiser whose brains are in his fists.

NO ROOM FOR THE GROOM

No Room For The Groom will set many a comparatively aging moviegoer reminiscing about a couple of prewar screwball films: You Can't Take It With You and Three-cornered Moon. Those set off a cycle of farces about family life, but No Room For The Groom is not likely to do the same. The reason is a simple one: The people in the earlier movies were mostly attractive freaks, while in the current Tony Curtis-Piper Laurie picture they are, with the exception of the principals, practically monsters. Possibly by comparison Curtis and Miss Laurie seem more effective than ever—real young people caught in a kind of cinematic zoo. That's the sad part of the story—both of them can play that kind of part so effectively and seem to find the script and opportunity so seldom.

Cast: Tony Curtis, Piper Laurie, Don De Fore, Spring Byington.—Universal.

THE SAVAGE

It would be easier to discuss The Savage if the recent Broken Arrow hadn't happened to come along first. As it is, comparisons, necessary and obvious as they are, are not odious. Both concern the relations between white men and red men during approximately the same period in U.S. history. Both take a view that is still novel and has heretofore been pretty unpopular: that the wrong wasn't necessarily always on the Indians' side. Once this approach is accepted for what it is—an intelligently magnanimous re-examination of our past—there isn't too much to choose between the two pictures, for both offer lots of effective melodramatic excitement. What with ambushes, escapes, warwhoops and what-not, The Savage ranks as a better-than-average adventure tale.

Cast: Charlton Heston, Susan Morrow, Peter Hanson, Joan Taylor.—Paramount.

LOVELY TO LOOK AT

Certainly the story sometimes gets in the way of a good many attractive girls and pretty melodies, but MGM's current musical remake is as definitely Lovely To Look At as it is to listen to. Not quite so successful in integrating song with scene as some of the recent pictures that had original plots, it makes up for most of its shortcomings in sheer production effectiveness. Whenever the libretto fails, one of five charming people (Kathryn Grayson, Howard Keel, Marge and Gower Champion, Ann Miller) is usually around to take up the slack with an act, a dance or a song. The plot is about a Broadway performer, Red Skelton, who inherits from his late aunt half a Paris salon of haute couture (otherwise a dressmaking establishment and, like the film's and stage's original, known as "Roberta"). Trying to sell it to raise money for a New York show, he arrives in Paris with his buddies, Keel and Gower Champion. It turns out the other "half" of the "Roberta" ownership is composed of sisters Grayson and Marge Champion and that this half is worth no more than the newcomers in terms of hard cash. So the group gets together to put on a real Broadway type production of a style show that will put "Roberta" back on its feet again. The show, of course, turns out to be more Hollywood than Broadway, but then so does the movie. Keel and Miss Grayson do an effective job with Jerome Kern's well-known melodies, and the Champions prove themselves a well-named dance team who will be around motion pictures a long time. Ann Miller is likable but mostly wasted, and the rest of the cast exist primarily to fill out the omnipresent plot. Most moviegoers will be somewhat bored by this story line now that Paris dressmaking is no longer the news it was, but the players do their best—and they're pretty successful—to make what is essentially old hat the new fashion.
Cast: Kathryn Grayson, Howard Keel, Red Skelton, Marge and Gower Champion, Ann Miller.—MGM

THE WILD HEART

Jennifer Jones plays a child of nature in her latest vehicle, and if it is not one of her best films it is certainly one of her better performances. Based on Mary Webb's novel, Gone To Earth—a title, incidentally, that better describes the story of the fated, feyish heroine—the picture tells how a shy, half-gypsy country girl foretells and meets her doom on the rolling hills of Shropshire, an English county on the border of Wales. Hazel Woodus is the daughter of an aging coffin-maker who is usually half dazed by drink but who plays the harp like a sober angel. Left mostly to herself since her gypsy mother died and educated in only the most rudimentary fashion, beautiful young Hazel is a sweet but simple creature. Her "bible" is her mother's book of black magic, her friends the forlorn and lamed little animals she finds in traps made by man—foxes, rabbits, blackbirds. Hazel's enemy, in fact, is man, both individually and collectively. The theatrical landscapes that provide much of the picture's background, the storms both of nature and angry man, are thoroughly effective, particularly in full color, but the fact remains that Hazel never seems quite all there. Where simplicity is called for, the script has made her appear simply simple-minded. What should

Are you in the know?

For a back-to-school ice breaker try—

☐ A new romance ☐ A Leap Year dance

New term—new faces; and it's up to you femmes to start the shy guys social-whirling. Plan a Leap Year dance, with ample eats; each doll inviting a new classmate. And for a quiet riot—feature a cut-in, where the gals tag and lead! "Ice breaking" is a matter of forgetting about yourself. As you do (at certain times) with Kotex—knowing those flat pressed ends prevent revealing outlines. And you get extra protection with that special safety center!

How should they settle the check?

☐ One for all ☐ Pool the moola

Spare the waiter needless waiting while you buttercups pool your loot! Let one settle for all. You can pay her in advance or when leaving. But when buying sanitary protection—there's no "one for all" absorbency of Kotex, because different gals have different needs. So try all 3; find the absorbency for you. And remember Kotex holds its shape, keeps you really comfortable.

If you're a problem blonde should you—

☐ Brush up ☐ Brighten up

Towhead, woehead!—when shadowy roots bedim the gold. Brushing helps; draws up excess oil. Also, tinted shampoos (wash-outable) brighten topknots—safely. You'll always be the fair-haired gal, if you watch your grooming; guard your daintiness. On problem days choose Quest deodorant powder, best for napkin use. Safe. Positively destroys odors.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

*T. M. REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

How to prepare for "certain" days?

☐ Circle your calendar ☐ Perk up your wardrobe ☐ Buy a new belt

Before "that" time, be ready! All 3 answers can help. But to assure extra comfort, buy a new Kotex sanitary belt. Made with soft-stretch elastic—this strong, lightweight sanitary belt's non-twisting . . . non-curling Stays flat even after many washings. Dries pronto! So don't wait: buy a new Kotex belt now. Buy two—for a change!

be a dark and moody drama like Wuthering Heights ends up only as a case history against Englishmen who kill foxes and, in this case, by mistake, Jennifer Jones.

SKIRTS AHOY!

The producers of Skirts Ahoy! have had the bright idea of making a musical about three enlisted members of the Navy who are also bosom buddies. If this sounds like On The Town, the producers must be pardoned, because they were the very same people who made that fine film, and this one is a twist on the original idea. The buddies here are babes—Waves, to be exact—and are played by Esther Williams, Vivian Blaine and Joan Evans, which is even more of an excuse. Each joins the Navy at the identical moment: society-girl Esther, because she can have anything she wants (in this case, a man) and never wants it when she gets it; country-girl Joan, because she can't get what she wants (her man jilts her at the altar), and salesgirl Vivian, because she simply yearns after a sailor. Unfortunately the film doesn't manage to maintain an amusing, spoofing quality. More often it alternates between moony, spooning romancing and a variety of specialty numbers, in the water and out (Billy Eckstine appears in an earthbound sequence), so that it sometimes seems to be a semi-serious musical comedy, sometimes just a hodge-podge of revue acts. The stars never take it too seriously, however, and neither should the audience unless they happen to be particularly fond of Esther Williams, in which case they're likely to love it.
Cast: Esther Williams, Joan Evans, Vivian Blaine, Barry Sullivan, Keefe Brasselle.—MGM

GLORY ALLEY

Glory Alley is the name the narrator of the film gives the street in New Orleans where the picture takes place. It is a section where almost anything can happen—a passageway to man-made heaven or hell. Grifters, quitters, grafters, gunmen frequent it, and so do heroes, it has so much that is bad and good to offer. The movie does, too. The narrator's technique is technically effective. It gives a certain realistic feeling to what is essentially a romantic view of a sleazy sector and story. And its falsely heroic attitude is bolstered by a fine, straightforward performance in the role of an introverted young prizefighter by a newcomer named Ralph Meeker. He plays a pug named "Socks," a nothing from up north who matches fists with the South's finest, wins and becomes a Delta favorite. Offering, as it does, Ralph Meeker and Leslie Caron, the personality and voice of Louis Armstrong and a pungent if somewhat involved story, Glory Alley provides an easy way to while away the time.
Cast: Ralph Meeker, Leslie Caron, Kurt Kasznar, Louis Armstrong.—MGM.

LYDIA BAILEY

The imposing, six-foot-five Negro figure of William Marshall, as King Dick, a Haitian patriot, towers both literally and figuratively over the rest of the cast of Lydia Bailey and helps set the picture's pace and mood. That is one reason why this is a completely different, often really fascinating adventure film. The time is 1802, the scene the Haitian port of Cap Francois and the verdant jungle around it. Dale Robertson, as a Baltimore lawyer, arrives on a legal mission involving both the U. S. Government and Anne Francis, an American expatriate living on the island. He finds that Napoleon has sent a fleet, due momentarily, to fight the infant republic of Toussaint L'Ouverture and attempt to regain the territory for the French. Most of the whites have fled; Miss Francis is living in the jungle plantation of Charles Korvin, her fiancé and an agent of the emperor. With the help of King Dick, Robertson outwits Haitian renegades and reaches the young woman he is after, only to discover her unwilling to sign the papers he has brought along. There is a mounting sense of terror-to-come as Haitians perform blood-dances, and when King Dick kills a Negro turncoat officer who is aiding Korvin, Robertson helps his friend escape and finds himself haunted by love and hunted too. War and civil war now rage in earnest, with the forces of King Dick's leader, Toussaint, fighting a double battle: against the French renegade republicans under native cutthroats. The pictorial transitions from scene to scene and the overall integration of a very involved mixture of fact and fiction are so well handled by the screenwriters and by director Jean Negulesco and his fine camera and editing crew that this must be listed as one of the most successful recent filmings of a well-known novel (Kenneth Roberts' best-selling book of the same name). Some day, it is to be hoped, some movie-maker will attempt a more intensely focused study of Toussaint and his proud, freedom-seeking people.

CLASH BY NIGHT

Clifford Odets' powerful, if only partially successful, prewar stage drama about love, passion and responsibility has finally been made into a movie that contains a surprisingly large percentage of the play's plot but a lesser amount of its high-voltage passion or power. Yet the story of Mae Doyle, who returns to her native fishing town emotionally burnt out after ten years making her way in the big city, is still mostly an engrossing one, and Barbara Stanwyck gives one of her finest dramatic performances in the part, a role not easy to play. It is Mae's tragedy that when she finds the man who can give her the peace and security she is looking for, she finds in his best friend a man who awakens her passion. Close as it is to Odets' original, this script fails to achieve the dramatic punch of the play partly because it portrays the husband, played by Paul Douglas, as too decent a man—almost unbelievedly saint-like rather than just a man who expects his wife to behave. Even more important is the shifting of the problem to a moral level, whereas on the stage the trouble was basically animalistic. The movie catches most fire when Miss Stanwyck and Robert Ryan, as her lover, break through the script, in effect, in some of the more torrid scenes on recent record. The fact remains that the generally fine performances, the interesting theme and the taut direction and photography all deserve recognition. Clash By Night is still something for an adult audience to see.

Cast: Barbara Stanwyck, Paul Douglas, Robert Ryan, Marilyn Monroe, Keith Andes.—RKO.

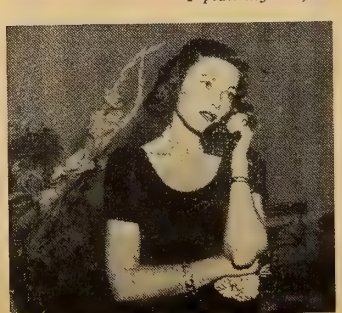
MODERN SCREEN presents a new service department in which the stars themselves trade ideas, opinions and problems with our readers. Gene Tierney contributes the fourth in a series of columns to be written by top Hollywood personalities.

Take my word for it

by GENE TIERNEY, star columnist for August



I like women who use their heads.

Makeup sets my mood.

I plan my outfits.

I depend on my friends.

WHEN I WAS A LITTLE GIRL, a beautiful lady came to visit us for several days. I can't remember her name or exactly what she looked like, though I know she had beauty. But one thing has lingered over the years and I will never forget it—a certain deliriously lovely perfume. Weeks after she left it still hung about the linens she had used, after several launderings, pleasantly reminding us of her again and again. It was then that a love of perfume (and a sense of its importance) was born in me that will be with me the rest of my life.

I have a variety of perfumes, of course, because here again it is a question of mood. One kind affects you one way and another a different way. It is odd about perfumes, too, that they smell different on different people, like lipstick will change color on different lips.

I HAVE ALWAYS BEEN INTRIGUED by the relationship between mood and makeup. Is there anything that can more quickly give you new heart when you are low than to catch sight of yourself in the mirror when you happen to be looking well? Is there anything that can ordinarily lift you so completely from fatigue and depression as spending an hour primping and fussing in your bedroom and bath to finally achieve a sparkling, beautiful you? You have done things only to your skin, your hair, apparently; yet the effect has transformed your inner self as well! That is why make-up and beauty care are to me more than just a mechanical process, a business of using this or that in such and such a way. There is more in a cold cream jar than just cold cream, more to a lipstick than just color, more to a lotion than the tingle it leaves on your skin. Here is the stuff to make you feel desirable and wanted—and that translates into happiness!

That's why I don't have just one kind of lipstick or lotion or cold cream; I have a selection and rotate them. How can I experiment, how can I make that difference, if I don't have the proper ingredients? Of course, I have some favorites.

I love the pleasant odors, the attractive jars, the sense of femininity that these things bring to a woman's life. And nobody can tell me that these things aren't important . . . that they don't inspire . . . that they don't make the difference.

WE ARE ALL SEEKING the difference between feeling just so-so and feeling and looking our sparkling best. If we are young or if we are old, the desire to look that one bit better never leaves us; that, I believe, is the truest characteristic of the feminine human, as well as most of the males. Sometimes we do ludicrous things to achieve this, but our goal is a worthy one.

Among all the habits of man which are blamed for the world's ills, the love of beauty is not to be found.

It's hard for a person to find out what is good taste! Yet this is the first thing a girl must learn about herself. One way of finding out might lie in recalling whether you are ever complimented on your clothes and to what degree. If you never get a compliment, there is definitely something wrong and you need advice.

There are some basic rules, of course. Simplicity is one of them. Irene, the famous dress designer, and Walter Plunkett at MGM, who did the costumes for The Plymouth Adventure, my latest picture, both advise that after a girl gets all dressed up her last act should be to check herself in the mirror to find out if there is anything that should be left off. Clothes and accessories and jewelry must never be on you, they must be part of you.

I think about this very carefully when I am ready to dress. The shampoo I have used, the trouble I have gone to brushing my hair, the care I have given my face, my nails—they can all be wasted by a wrong guess at the last minute. I lay out everything I plan to wear and visualize myself completely against any background and in any situation that may come up. When I am sure I am right I give myself a good hour to do the job.

I LIKE WOMEN who use their heads as well as their hearts about situations. I hope my friends do. As a divorcée I have come to think a lot about their attitude towards me. I don't want them to start considering me as a problem. This business of worrying about who to get as the extra man at a party, which is to be attended by a divorcée, is definitely old hat, or should be. Don't get anyone if it is a problem. Just let me come alone. What I am trying to say is that if you like a woman who is unattached, don't let this business of getting an extra man stop you from inviting her. Invite her anyway. She is going to miss a lot of good times if you insist on being technical as a hostess. Your divorcée friend wants your friendship more than ever now; she is depending on you more for that than for a solution to her romantic future.

Don't miss a swim —use Tampax!

Frequently women give up swimming on "those certain days" for no other reason than bathing-suit worries. Please get this fact clear in your mind. Tampax monthly sanitary protection can be trusted even with a wet, form-fitting suit. That's because Tampax (worn internally) discards the harness of belt and bulky outside pad. Tampax will never embarrass you.

Its convenience for swimming (or tub and shower) is only one of the many advantages of Tampax—as millions of all-year-round users could tell you. Odor cannot form with Tampax. Bulging and chafing are impossible; no edge-lines to show under dresses. And so Tampax adds to a woman's poise and self-confidence at the time she needs them most.

A doctor invented Tampax for this special use. Tampax is made of highly absorbent surgical cotton compressed into efficient applicators. Easy to use and dispose of. Comes in 3 absorbency-sizes: Regular, Super and Junior. Sold at drug and notion counters. A truly remarkable improvement. Don't miss it. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

I PREFER SEVERAL MIRRORS in my bathroom because I don't judge my weight so much by what the scale reads as I do by how I look. You may need toning up only in small areas, and you might be able to go about this specifically instead of generally. For instance, I weigh more than people think, but this is because I try to keep proportionate and at all cost I don't want to be too thin. Sometimes I diet a little because circumstances have brought about a change in my regular mode of life. The period I spend waiting for a picture to begin, for instance, making tests, trying wardrobe, discussing the script, finds me more than ordinarily nervous and given to munching between meals.

I'M NOT MAD ABOUT excessive jewelry; a pin at the neck, a clip on the lapel, some cultured pearls are touches I like. Earrings, perhaps. I think few women can get away with enormous-sized jewelry pieces. And I don't think that in this day when such wonderful cloth is being woven, and so many types of fur material are being evolved, that expensive furs are at all necessary. Particularly bad is the attempt, I think, to imitate expensive fur. Cloth coats are unbelievably chic if the cut is good; there are occasions when I know mink is not suitable and another coat, of far less value, will be more complementary.

Well, let's drag the furs to one side and talk about simpler delights. I love the scent of lilacs, and lilies of the valley are a favorite flower, too. I'm a mush for an old, sentimental song. I like factual reading, even in romances —it makes it twice as interesting when you know the story actually happened!

Best for burley-cue.

A Hollywood stripteaser, Lili St. Cyr, says Bette Davis would have the best chance of all Hollywood stars to make the grade on the burlesque circuits.

The shapely Miss St. Cyr's list of good burlesque queen material are Lana Turner, Ginger Rogers, Jane Russell, Gene Tierney, Katharine Hepburn and Rita Hayworth.

But Virginia Mayo and Elizabeth Taylor rate a thumbs down. "Too lady-like," says Miss St. Cyr.

smile when you say that

With a chip on each magnificent shoulder, Stewart Granger is winning a strange reputation for himself. But this battling Briton is nobody's fool.

BY JACK WADE

■ Several of Hollywood's topflight directors were overheard while taking their 10 o'clock coffee in the studio commissary one morning.

Their topic of conversation was, "Movie stars I would least like to direct."

Two candidates for this doubtful honor rushed immediately to all their lips: Shelley Winters and Stewart Granger.

Said the first director, "I will direct any star in this business except Shelley. As a matter of fact, before I direct her again, I will dig ditches, return to the Army, or even go back to my second wife."

In the tone of a man who has been subjected to the tortures of Hades but has managed, somehow, to stay alive, the second said, "Compared to Stewart Granger, your Shelley Winters is a dream."

Two other directors who were present nodded in agreement. "From what we hear," they said, "Granger wins hands down."

In the two and a half years that he has been in Hollywood, cocky 39-year-old Stewart Granger has succeeded in getting himself disliked by an inordinate number of fellow-workers who refer to him as "the prize ham, the magnificent jerque, the know-it-all Englishman," and "the male Shelley Winters."

Why is this man, who is so well-loved by millions of female movie-goers, disliked by so many of his colleagues?

Deborah Kerr, who is genuinely fond of Granger, explains the fact by saying, "He's extremely good at a number of things, but getting along with people isn't one of them."

Jean Simmons, Granger's wife, states simply, "Many people don't understand Jimmy."

Michael Wilding, a loyal friend, says, "He was always a stormy petrel, that one."

All of which adds up to a tacit admission that Stewart Granger does not go through life like Dale Carnegie, winning friends and influencing people.

Granger is hot-tempered, self-centered, irrepressible, impetuous, intelligent and hardworking. In the words of a non-admirer, "He (Continued on page 87)

Separation rumors about Stewart and Jean Simmons are a direct result of his irascible behavior.

LANA TOLD ME ALL...

Harassed by cruel gossip, Lana has decided it's time these true facts reached her public. She asked her good friend Louella Parsons to present, in this exclusive article, the story of her love for Fernando Lamas.

LANA TURNER'S voice was shaking with indignation over the telephone and she was near tears as she told me—

"I'm so embarrassed I could cry over that printed stuff that I'm making eyes at Kirk Douglas on the set.

"I love Fernando Lamas and he is the only man in my life. We are going to be married as soon as we are free, and we want the world to know it!

"Louella," my girl friend cried, "can't you help me fight these ridiculous, vicious stories about me? Every day it is something! If I'm not flirting with Kirk Douglas, I'm holding out a $250,000 non-existent emerald necklace on Bob Topping. I'm just not going to take it any more. I—"

"Lana, Lana," I interrupted, "Wait a minute, honey. Take it easy. Where are you ? If you want to give me a story, I'll be out."

"I'm at the studio," she said promptly, "and I do want to give you the story. How long will it take you?"

No longer than it takes to cover the distance from my house in Beverly Hills to the MGM studios, I can assure you, for I could tell that Lana was in a mood to talk. And when she is ready, this girl really "gives" in a big way.

As always she looked like a big, beautiful doll when I met her. We took a small table in the Commissary, and as I looked at her, I couldn't help thinking how increasingly lovely she becomes from meeting to meeting.

As slender as a reed, she had on a red robe over the strapless white bathing suit she wears for a scene in Tribute To A Bad Man— Esther Williams never did more for a bathing suit than Lana was doing (Continued on page 60)

Brother, can you

There are lots of men in Hollywood—but for every man, there are ten love-starved women who'd give anything to get their pretty paws on him!

BY MARSHA SAUNDERS

■ For every successful young male star in the movies today, there are four successful young female stars. For the older women stars who are unmarried, the problem is even worse than that. For them, there are probably only three or four eligible older men in all of Hollywood.

In no city in the world, with the possible exception of Reno, are men at such a premium. And in Reno the lonely ladies need to amuse themselves for only six weeks. In Hollywood, the pursuit of a mate is a 365-days-a-year project, and the few men there are hunted and chased by desperate Dianas year in and year out.

The Hollywood wolf is well fed and lazy, for Little Red Riding Hood comes to him. He doesn't need to masquerade as a sheep. He is chased. And what does he do? He runs, brother, he runs the other way! He flees like hunted men and animals have done since the beginning of time.

And the more desperate the girls become, the more spoiled and bitter are the men!

Farley Granger is bitter. He says, "I go to a party. I look around, and suddenly I realize there is a girl there that the hostess has decided is for me. Why? Why spare a date?

can't I be allowed to pick my own type?"

Bob Taylor's friends laugh about the situation. Bob has three great enthusiasms—hunting, fishing and flying. After his divorce from Barbara, he became one of the most desirable men in town—attractive, rich, unmarried. And overnight, girls who didn't know what a forest or a stream looked like became passionately interested in hunting, fishing and flying.

Scott Brady, despite the crazy interviews he gives, is a good kid. He adores his mother. He is devoted to his brother, Larry Tierney, to whom life has dealt some crushing blows. He's a friendly guy, but he has learned to hate the telephone. It rings all the time and on the other end there's usually a young lady angling for a date! Every time you ask Scott Brady about his love life, he tells you. "I'm very much in love with Dorothy Malone." This may be true. There may be some good reason why they don't marry. On the other hand, it could be an alibi. It could be a way for Scott to brush off the girls who call him on the telephone constantly.

Kirk Douglas thought, when his marriage ended, it would be wonderful to be free. Why, he could go out with dozens of different girls. He could choose them. But they chose him. And he got so tired of being chased that he felt like a fox instead of a wolf and just wanted to crawl into a hole and hide. His latest date has been Marlene "Grandma" Dietrich, a superb woman, but hardly a matrimonial candidate. And maybe that's why he's interested.

After the tragic death of Maria Montez, Jean Pierre Aumont returned to Hollywood. He is a charming and brilliant Frenchman. But he is also an available unattached prospect. Top flight stars made fools of themselves over him.

And then there (Continued on page 102)

He's up—he's down! He's glad—he's sad! He's not in love, but he wants a wife! Farley has mixed emotions over everything—and nobody knows why, not even the guy himself!

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

"Sometimes I'm happy..."

■ "I'm just not madly in love," Farley Granger said. "There are periods in your life when you're not madly in love. This is one of those periods for me. So what do people want me to do? Make up a big love affair? Everybody in Hollywood expects a person either to be madly in love or just recovering from being madly in love or carrying a big torch or feuding with somebody.

"The night after Shelley and Vittorio Gassman announced their engagement they came to a party. I happened to be at the same party. Well, such a buzz started. People parted like the Red Sea. You would have thought it was an international crisis. And everybody was real disappointed when the three of us sat down together and talked and had a wonderful time. Everybody seemed surprised that we didn't kill each other.

"You see, what people can't realize is that Shelley is one of my closest friends and always will be. We could be away from each other for years and years and I know that if I was in trouble Shelley would help me."

This all sounds very simple. Farley makes it sound simple because he actually does not know how complicated he is.

Look at him. It's an intense face, isn't it? You would think not only from the way he looks but from the way he behaves that his career drives him. Farley is occasionally misunderstood by the press, because, he says, "I can't be a master of ceremonies on the set. Between scenes I stay in my dressing room. I can't get out there and yak it up, I have to concentrate and (Continued on page 89)

From their living room window, the Champions can see Catalina on a clear day. Perched on a terraced hillside, their house appears larger than it is. It has only two bedrooms, a living room, dining room, kitchen and studio.

Marge's bedroom is as small as a room can be and still be bigger than its closet. She arranged the twin beds along each wall and then added an over-sized mirror that gives an illusion of extra space.

Marge and Gower never intended to own a swimming pool—but it came with the Connecticut-type frame house. They were afraid people would

The Champions' hillside home is a tailor made answer to the dreams of a boy and girl who danced their way, cheek to cheek, into the Hollywood spotlight. by Marva Peterson

■ Fifteen years ago when a Hollywood mother wanted her little darling to study dancing, she usually sent the youngster to one place, the Belcher School.

Ernest Belcher, who ran the school, was not only the great ballet coach who had taught Betty Grable, Loretta Young, and practically every other movie star how to dance gracefully, but he also had the cutest daughter—a brown-eyed, winsome, little widget named Marge.

Marge could dance anything—ballet, Spanish, tap, acrobatic, ballroom—so that on occasion her dad put her to work as his assistant. She taught the five-year-olds to tap and sometimes danced with shy, awkward adolescent boys.

One day, when Marge was all of 11 a new boy was enrolled in the school. He was tall and skinny and awfully quiet, but there was nothing awkward about him. He seemed to have a natural grace, a wonderful suppleness, a born bent for dancing.

He was 14 years old, and his parents had been divorced before he was born. He came from Illinois, and he had (Continued on next page)

Every dancer dreams of some day having a rehearsal room in his own home. Marge and Gower realized this ambition when they found a house with a basement that would make a dance studio.

As a sure way of remembering his dance routines, Gower records them on film. He's also a home movie fan, and he and Marge entertain their guests by showing 16 mm. prints of current movies.

Perched on a hillside, the Champions' house appears larger than it is. Contrary to Hollywood custom, Marge and Gower get along perfectly well without maid's quarters, or a guest room.

Gower Champion designed all the furniture for his pale gray room, and it fit exactly to plan. An art collector on the side, he owns two Goya etchings and a large Picasso lithograph.

a real funny name—Gower Champion.

Marge danced with him once and fell completely, hopelessly, and utterly in love.

Fifteen years later she became his wife.

Today, Marge and Gower Champion, Hollywood's newest dancing sensations—they were terrific in Show Boat and are even better in Lovely To Look At and Everything I Have Is Yours—live and dance together in a small, six-room hillside house, which might as well carry a neon sign identifying it as the residence of two people who are very much in love with each other.

"Marge and Gower are perpetual honeymooners," one of their neighbors points out, "and their house fits them perfectly."

"I guess Gower and I look like newlyweds," Marge says, "but honest, we've been married five years, and all that stuff about our having a real fairytale love affair—well, it isn't exactly true. Gower had a different dancing partner for years, and like all men, he was very difficult to get to the altar."

There is a theory which holds that every girl, no matter how young, regards every boy who takes her out as a potential husband.

In Marge's case, that certainly was true.

She and Gower both attended Bancroft High in Los Angeles, and after each date, Marge would come home and write in her diary: "Dated Gower Champion tonight—H.T." The "H.T." (Continued on page 100)

HOW THE STARS FOUND FAITH

I could hear my mother's voice. "God is with you," she said. And that terrifying night in Korea I seemed to feel His presence the fifth passenger

by Piper Laurie

■ I want to admit, first of all, that up to several months ago I didn't give much thought to the war in Korea. When I did think of it I'd sometimes get a faint feeling of guilt but could overcome it without much trouble. I was too young to worry about things that didn't touch me personally. Then, last January, when I was actually in Korea on a ten day entertainment tour of the camps, that guilty feeling came to me again. But this time I didn't try to dismiss it. I don't think I could have. I did something, instead, and out of that came a strengthening of my spiritual devotion, where there had perhaps been weakness.

After our group had given its show on the evening of our fifth day in Korea I was talking to a Protestant chaplain, Lt. Mason E. Bondurant, who seemed to be preparing for a trip. It was very cold, in fact, a temperature of 20 below was predicted for the early morning hours.

"Where are you going on a night like this?" I asked.

He smiled. "All the nights are like this. I'm holding prayer service up in the front line in a few hours."

"The front line!" I exclaimed. "How near are we?"

"Twenty miles," he replied.

"I think I'd like to go along," I said.

I wasn't serious when I spoke. I knew the army frowned on that sort of thing so I was just making talk. And the chaplain knew it, too. He just looked at me and shook his head.

I felt a sharp sense of self-annoyance. It was as if I had taken for granted that I was a sort of privileged person who must not be subjected to personal risk, and I didn't like myself for that. In a few days I would be back in the U. S. A., safe and warm. But these kids up in the line, most of them no older than me, and just as fond of life as I was—they would still be there sweating, or rather freezing out whether they were going to live or die. And they were doing it for me. What better (Continued on page 68)

MADLY IN LOVE

Mitzi plans to wed 31-year-old Richard Coyle, to whom she's been engaged for five years.

■ When she first saw him backstage on that June night she knew he was the man for her. She was 16 at the time; she's almost 21 now. But for Mitzi Gaynor, tall, handsome attorney-at-law Richard Brown Coyle is still the man.

"Some time ago," says madcap Mitzi, "when I read in a Hollywood column that a young star's mother admitted to 13 engagements before she married, I was slightly startled. Especially when she said she hoped her daughter will know lots of men, be engaged often, before making a final choice. Of course, I'm willing to admit that that may have been good advice for that particular girl, but as for me I'm a one-man gal . . . and have been since I met Richard."

Mitzi confided this in an interval during dance rehearsals for Bloodhounds Of Broadway. Wearing navy denims laced up the front with white cord, a tiny red sweater, enormous droopy antique earrings and tennis shoes, she had been dancing from platform to platform, losing combs, earrings, scarf, along the way, while the temperature hovered in the '90s. At the end of the number her pert little face was streaked with perspiration and a towel was wrapped around her shoulders, but she walked as though an invisible book were balanced on her head. "I love to dance—hot, cold, anything," she said. "And I've loved it since my Aunt Francine, a dancing teacher, tore me away from a hopscotch game, put ballet slippers on my feet and turned them out like a duck's underpinnings, when I was all of three. In school I'd be amazed to hear my pals deciding one day to be Florence Nightingales, the next day bareback riders. I always knew I'd be a ballet dancer. And I've never changed my mind." they want him bad

Some like 'em sexy, some like 'em suave, but Dick Widmark's fans like him with a spine chilling laugh, and a maniacal gleam in his eye!

BY WILLIAM BARBOUR

■ Every once in a while a scene flashes on a motion picture screen, often for only a brief moment, and a star is born. There was the time Lana Turner walked down the street in a tight sweater and skirt for a Warner Brothers' picture—the single shot of Clark Gable as a chauffeur opening a car door in A Free Soul. Marilyn Monroe's entry into The Asphalt Jungle wearing a one-piece black pajama outfit. Jimmy Cagney pushing a half-grapefruit into a dame's face. And Humphrey Bogart's first menacing appearance as the killer in The Petrified Forest . . .

It only takes one scene sometimes. It only took one to make Richard Widmark a star. The movie was Kiss Of Death. Widmark, made up as a moronic killer, pushed an old lady in a wheel chair down a flight of steps and stood at the top laughing gleefully. Audiences never forgot it, and to them he'll always be the maniac with the low brow and the wild giggle. That's the way they want him—and they've got him back now in a soon to be released 20th Century-Fox picture called The Clarion Call.

There is no question that the fans wanted killer-Widmark back. A magazine columnist found proof of this some time ago when he printed an item stating that Richard Widmark was not at all a hard guy, but a gentle, scholarly chap who wouldn't hurt a fly, let alone an old lady. From that one statement he got more response than he had ever gotten before. Fans wrote in by the hundreds calling the columnist a liar, demanding retraction, and vowing that they had actual proof that Richard was by nature a woman-whomper and tougher than Mike Mazurki.

Widmark himself has had experiences which would indicate that his fans like him when he's bad. Once at a personal appearance in an eastern city, Dick had just finished a short talk in a shy, quiet voice when one of his rooters, a young lady of about 17 who was on the brink of complete disillusionment, leaped to the platform and let loose a haymaker at the star's jaw. She (Continued on page 97)

Dick has that menacing look on his face again—but it's strictly for public consumption. At home (right) he's a nice normal guy.

■ It's true . . . when John Derek stepped up to Gloria Greenwood on the Columbia lot to tell her she had just been named a Golden Key Girl, she opened her lovely mouth to say something, gulped once, and keeled over in a dead faint!

As the lightning of new-found fame struck Gloria, so too did it touch 14 other talented Hollywood newcomers from all parts of the world. One day, each of these girls was just one of hundreds working hard in the studios, hoping for some big break that would make them immediately known to the public—that first big step to stardom. The next day, each of them had a big-name star sponsor and stepped into the worldwide spotlight at Modern Screen's welcome party for them at the Beverly Hills Club, where the top stars of Hollywood gathered to do them honor.

The winners were selected by a long and careful search among hundreds of young women. They were chosen for their talent, beauty and outstanding qualities of character and are, in the opinion of the editors of Modern Screen, worthy of future stardom.

We want you to look at their pictures, read their success stories as told for the first time by their famous sponsors, and wish them luck in movies.

The most glittering social event of the season was MODERN SCREEN'S

Bill Lundigan's protégée, Penny Edwards, couldn't make the party, so Bill long distanced the good news to her.

Penny was on location in Arizona tor Pony Soldier, in which she plays opposite Ty Power, the night Bill phoned to say she'd won the award.

Howard Duff took time out from pacing the floor (Ida's baby was due momentarily) to sponsor Dot Hart.

Maureen O'Sullivan, who has appeared on several television shows with protégée Kathy Sharpe, feels that tiny Kathy has a big future ahead.

Eileen Christy, a Golden Key girl with two sponsors, received her award from John Russell, Ella Raines.

Virginia Mayo and Virginia Gibson made a toothsome twosome when the first presented the second with MODERN SCREEN'S Golden Key award.

ANNE BANCROFT: TV LOST HER TO HOLLYWOOD

By David Wayne

Being a stage actor myself, I'm delighted to tell you about Anne Bancroft, for whom I am the sponsor in behalf of 20th Century-Fox. Anne was born in Gotham, and she stepped directly from high school into study at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. Even before graduation, she won roles on important television shows and she was twice tested by 20th before she was signed after her farewell TV performance in Lights Out.

Right now, Anne is attracting a great deal of attention because of her superb performances in Don't Bother To Knock, with Dick Widmark and Marilyn Monroe, and in Treasure Of The Golden Condor.

At twenty years of age, Anne has a great future before her, and one for which she is thoroughly prepared. I hope you give her as big a hand as they did the night she accepted her MODERN SCREEN Golden Key Award!

JOAN TAYLOR: COULDN'T ACCEPT HER AWARD

By Ronald Reagan

When Mrs. Reagan and I arrived at MODERN SCREEN'S Golden Key party, we were surprised to discover that Joan Taylor was not there to accept her award. The poor girl was in the hospital with a serious case of pneumonia, so we sent her Golden Key over in a burst of flowers and she recovered in record time. No future star has ever worked harder than Joan for her achievement, although from birth she seemed destined for an important place in the entertainment world.

Her father operates the Deerpath Theater in Lake Forest, Illinois, which he opened the night she was born. From her mother, who was a vaudeville dancing headliner, Joan learned ballet, and graduated from the Chicago National Association of Dancing Masters when she was only sixteen. During the war she entertained for many hours with the USO, and afterwards graduated from the Pasadena Community Playhouse where she won attention in the role of a sixty-year-old woman.

Golden Key Party, when all Filmdom arrived to honor the winners

Jane Powell's protégée, Barbara Ruick, got started in show business the same way Jane did—on radio. Barbara's parents are both radio stars.

John Derek presented Gloria Greenwood with her Golden Key a few nights after her studio gave her a new last name. She's delighted with both!

Bill Lundigan (right) gave David Wayne a helping hand when Dave presented protégée Anne Bancroft with her award.

The minute Red spotted Lucy Knoch, he snapped her up for his TV show. Now she's a Golden Key girl, thanks to "talent scout" Skelton.

Jane Russell, one of America's most beautiful women, is the sponsor of Ursula Thiess, one of Germany's most beautiful and talented actresses.

Tony Curtis takes a good look at the Golden Key trophy before awarding it to lucky screen-hopeful Suzan Ball.

Kathy Phillips was so nervous when she auditioned for Dennis Day's television show she almost backed out. Now Dennis is her Golden Key sponsor.

Mary Sinclair, who made a name for herself as "the first lady of TV," comes to Paramount as a Golden Key girl under Bill Holden's sponsorship.

Peggy King, who received her Golden Key award from sponsor Howard Keel, has been called "another Garland."

Hollywood knew all about sex appeal until it found Leslie Caron who has everything and more of it than anybody else around!

BY JIM HENAGHAN

Gorgeous Gamin

Can-can by Caron.

■ Now that the chips are down, her career set and the film in the can, so to speak, we can tell you about Leslie Caron.

At this writing, Leslie is probably MGM's brightest prospect. With several pictures under her belt and a half-dozen more planned for her, she has attained the status of full star. On the lot she is a woman to be respected as one of the top money makers. Right now they're painting her image for billboards, setting her name up in big type for advertisements, and whipping up a sandwich they can name for her on the studio commissary menu. In other words, the kid's in.

What is happening to Leslie Caron right now is the dream of a million girls in the world today. It is something that youngsters begin thinking about early and never forget until they take a look at the score and see their day has passed. Something that happens to a very, very few. It's the tag of the Cinderella story. The only thing wrong with the picture is that it was never Leslie Caron's dream. In fact, until a couple of years ago she couldn't have cared less.

Probably if Leslie Caron had been born in Kansas and had been subjected to the movie-fame fever all her life, she might have wanted the things she has now. But she wasn't born in Kansas, and in her formative years, which were spent under the Nazi occupation, the only movies she saw were German films starring busty blondes or dreary Spanish movies (Continued on page 98)

love on the run

■ When Janet Leigh was Jeannette Helen Morrison not too long ago and one of the best baton-twirlers Stockton High ever had, she used to read movie magazines like this one and day-dream about becoming a rich and famous screen star.

And then one day she woke up in Hollywood, the dream was in the hollow of her hand, and she was living it breathlessly, completely, unbelievably. She had her own home in Brentwood, a flashy convertible, expensive clothes, $850 a week, and a handsome husband named Tony Curtis.

Last year reporters who asked Janet how she felt about her situation in life were given a typically ecstatic Leigh reply. "Five years ago," the young actress would exclaim, "I used to worship Greer Garson, John Wayne, and Walter Pidgeon, and here I am, actually playing opposite them! And I can't get over it. I simply can't!"

This year, Janet has gotten over it. She is no longer the enthusiastic, wide-eyed Cinderella she used to be. She has reached that point where she can view the life of a movie star objectively, honestly. And, while she still ardently loves the life—"I think it's the most divine thing in (Continued on page 94)

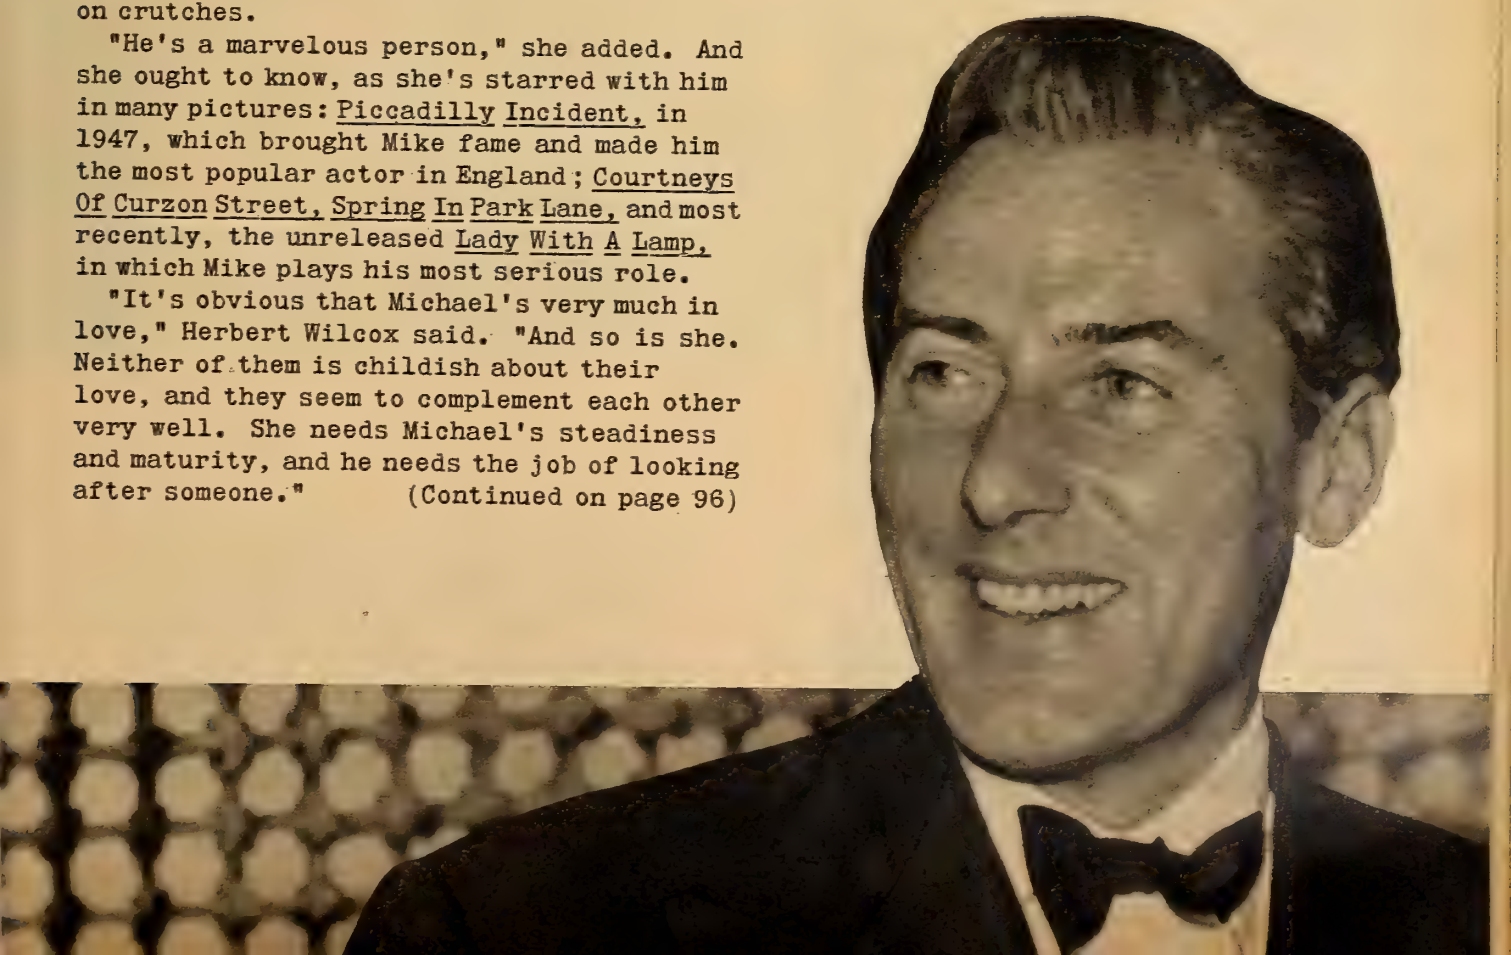
Letter from London

Dear Mr. Saxon:

The other day I ran into Herbert Wilcox and Anna Neagle, whom, as you know, stood up for the bride and groom at the wedding of Liz Taylor and Mike Wilding.



I asked them if they'd seen the newlyweds since their honeymoon trip to that secluded, snug little town in the French Alps. Very little has been heard from the Wildings, who have been keeping to themselves lately.

The Wilcoxes, though, see them regularly. They're very enthusiastic about Liz, and Mike, of course, is their closest friend. (They call them Elizabeth and Michael).

I asked them confidentially if they thought the marriage would work out. Both of them said without hesitation that they were sure it would work, even in the face of serious disadvantages. "Never have two people in love been the object of so much praise and censure," Anna Neagle said. "From hearing all that's said about the difference in their ages, one would think that, at 40, Michael is on crutches.

"He's a marvelous person," she added. And she ought to know, as she's starred with him in many pictures: Piccadilly Incident, in 1947, which brought Mike fame and made him the most popular actor in England; Courtneys Of Curzon Street, Spring In Park Lane, and most recently, the unreleased Lady With A Lamp, in which Mike plays his most serious role.

"It's obvious that Michael's very much in love," Herbert Wilcox said. "And so is she. Neither of them is childish about their love, and they seem to complement each other very well. She needs Michael's steadiness and maturity, and he needs the job of looking after someone." (Continued on page 96)

What women have done to BILL LUNDIGAN

Bill, who fought all over the Pacific with the Marines in World War II, is a man's man. An avid sports fan, he likes to read the baseball news every morning at breakfast.

Whenever they can get away, the Lundigans take a picnic lunch and drive into the hills till they find a secluded spot near a lake. There they spend the day just relaxing.

Every man needs a good woman—the wrong one can wreck his career, ruin his life. Luckily, Lundigan always found the right one at the right time.

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

■ Hollywood's the place where most actors attribute their triumphs to themselves and their failures to women. But a tall, well-built, blue-eyed Apollo named Bill Lundigan stands out as a refreshing exception. Bill frankly admits: "Without women, I'd be a dead duck!"

With women, he's one of the most popular stars on the 20th Century-Fox lot, where he's just finished Down Among The Sheltering Palms with Mitzi Gaynor and is now getting ready to star opposite Susan Hayward in a sequel to I'd Climb The Highest Mountain.

Marilyn Monroe, for example, when asked recently which Rena's love is the best of all the good things women have given to Bill Lundigan. Their marriage is one of the most solid in Hollywood.

actor she'd most like to work with, quickly answered, "Bill Lundigan, because he really knows how to treat a girl."

Ten years ago, Deanna Durbin said the very same thing, and later on such top-flight beauties as Hedy Lamarr, Gloria de Haven, Arlene Dahl, Susan Hayward, and Jeanne Crain agreed with her.

Bill Lundigan is the type of sweet guy the girls simply love to be nice to. But while Bill is terribly appreciative of what they've done for him and what they've taught him, their fondness embarrasses him, because essentially he's a man's man, one of those big, quiet, steel-muscled heroes of World War II, who fought all over the Pacific with the Marines and then refused to talk about his exploits.

I remember a few years ago when Bill was making Dishonored Lady with Hedy Lamarr. In addition to starring in this one, Hedy was also the producer. She and Lundigan went into a clinch for one scene. When the rehearsal was over, Hedy looked at Bill rather strangely. "I can't understand it," she said. "You kiss as if you've never kissed a girl before."

Bill grew beet-red. "I'm a married man," he said, "I've kissed girls before."

So easy to love

IN HAWAII, ANN FOUND WARM SAND AND LAZY SURF, BRIGHT FLOWERS, A PALE MOON–

by Jim Newton

AND, BEST OF ALL, THE ANSWER TO A LIFE-LONG DREAM

■ The big Pan American Clipper nosed gently down toward the glassy sea and the pilot grinned at the eager-faced girl beside him. He pointed dead ahead. "Well, there it is," he said, "Blue Hawaii."

Ann Blyth strained to look at the horizon. At first she saw nothing, only the endless blue-green world she had eagerly scanned since dawn, when she left her rumpled berth to watch the sunrise. She hadn't slept—not a wink since she boarded the plane at midnight in California. She was too excited. And now, as her eyes focussed at last on a velvet spot with a cloud for a halo, her heart skipped a beat. "Hawaii!" she breathed, and that was all because, oddly enough, her thoughts flashed back 5,000 miles to a drab little room in a New York City apartment where the Third Avenue "El" rattled past.

There wasn't much romance or adventure, actually, in that room. It was plainly furnished, because Ann and her mother were poor. But not too poor to own a radio, and the 12-year-old girl was an accomplished day-dreamer. Each week she would turn the knob excitedly to a favorite spot on the dial, lie back on the worn sofa and go on a trip. She would close her eyes as the program opened with the plaintive, throbbing rhythm of steel guitars, soft drums, ukuleles, and native voices chanting Aloha Oe . . . "From Heavenly Hawaii in the Blue Pacific come songs and Island music saying, 'Come, come to Hawaii!' This is Webly Edwards . . . 'Aloha!' . . ."

Ann would open her eyes then and stare at the ceiling where there were cracks in the plaster. But what she would really see was a paradise of swaying palms, pink sands and creamy surf, of golden people feasting, playing and singing straight to her "from under the big banyan tree." When it was over she would quickly snap off the radio, so nothing could break the spell. Then she would promise herself fiercely, "I'm going there. Some day I'm going to Hawaii!"

Lots of things have happened to Ann since then. Broadway, radio, and the movies. Fame, fortune, a fascinating, successful career, the opportunity to employ her talents and bring herself and others happiness. But always there were the pressures of the moment, too much she wanted and too little time to do it in. And so, at 23, romance, dreams of Hawaiian idylls somehow had just been put off. This was the first real holiday trip Ann had ever had in her life, and it was hard for her to believe it was really happening.

The studio technicians that worked on Ann's latest film, Sally And Saint Anne, were in on the deep dark plot that lured her to a glorious vacation in blue Hawaii.

Many famous personages, among them Governor Orin Long of Honolulu (above), went out of their way to welcome Ann and make sure her trip was a success.

Learning the hula was a high spot in Ann's trip. Here two dancers explain one of the more intricate steps while Ann listens. She became an expert at this native dance.

a new love, a new life

John Agar turned from the spotlight's glare to the calm of suburban living —with the girl who has given him a glorious year of marriage and the peace he has always longed for . . .

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

John relaxes on the porch of his apartment in quiet Westwood, a suburb of Los Angeles. This particular real estate development is relatively new and the Agars, whose marriage is just a year old, feel at home here.

Loretta encourages John to make use of his many talents, one being song-writing. Here they put his latest tune, "I Wonder If You Know" on the tape recorder. Their design for living is characterized by their informal apartment.

Rain cancels John's golf game and he is forced to take a putting fix inside. He and Loretta are both golfers, first met because of the game. Once John played 72 holes in a single day.

■ There is a quiet, tree-lined street in Westwood, a suburb of Los Angeles, that is brand-spanking new. Homes and small apartment houses have only been built on this street for a year or two, and most of the lawns are just patchy-green against black loam; and the trees are sprouts with tender bark and ambitious little leaves. It was to this street that MODERN SCREEN sent a reporter recently, not to cover a story but just to pay a call—to see what was doing with the John Agars. To find out how they live.

No particular story came out of the interview. There was no news. Shortly after the reporter and photographer arrived it began to rain, and everyone just sat around and chatted and spun yarns. And it turned out to be a very interesting afternoon, because we came away with a real insight into John Agar and his wife, Loretta. As yarns were spun and tales of boyhood and living in Hollywood and other places were swapped, it developed that Agar was a very different guy than a lot of people think—and that he shared with his wife a really happy marriage.

It was information that is worth passing on.

When he was a boy John Agar circulated in a pretty affluent atmosphere. He lived in Chicago where his family was in the meat packing business. They lived in a fine home, and young Jack had all the advantages. But he wasn't a wastrel—no rich kid with a piggy bank full of twenty dollar bills. He had to earn his spending money. From as long as he can remember he got every dollar he spent the hard way.

The first job that ever amounted to anything was just about the oddest chore a boy can work at—pig herding. Jack was paid three dollars a week for getting up at four in the morning and, in the company of several older men, escorting something like three or (Continued on page 78)

lana told me all

After we had ordered, I said, "All right. Let your hair down (it's short) and tell me all about what's troubling you."

Lana laughed. She had to. It isn't natural for her to be angry for she has a really good disposition. But she was deadly in earnest when she said, "I hardly know where to start, there's so much junk being circulated."

Of course, the big talk is about Lana's marriage to the good looking South American, Fernando Lamas, so for good and sufficient reasons of my own, I was willing to start with them, and their wedding plans.

"Is there a chance you and Fernando will elope to Mexico and be married before I can get this story in MODERN SCREEN?" I asked promptly.

"We may," Lana nodded. "Our wedding will take place just as soon as we are both free—whether it is in Mexico, or Hong Kong, or South America when Fernando and I go there to make a picture together in the late summer.

"The point is—we are so much in love, Louella. Why can't people let us alone? Fernando and I mind our own business. We are very quiet. We stay away from nightclubs and attend only a few private parties.

"And, then, just because Kirk Douglas and I are working in the same picture, all this nonsense starts that we are flirting. It's so cheap.

"The morning the picture started, Kirk sent me flowers—just a nice custom in this business. Almost every actor I have worked with has done the same thing.

"I say 'Good morning' to him—common courtesy. And yet it comes out in print this way: 'Isn't Lana Turner getting a wee Kirk of Douglas these days?' How horrible can they get?"

Not since those days, long since gone, when Lana was deeply in love and then deeply hurt by Tyrone Power have I seen her so emotionally upset over gossip. And her greatest concern was for Fernando. I have to admit I was a bit surprised for I had thought in the beginning, along with many others, that her romance with the handsome Lamas might have been just to stimulate interest in their Merry Widow.

I had only to listen to Lana mention his name to realize how wrong I was.

"Our marriage will be so right, Louella," she told me. "He loves my little daughter Cheryl, and she is devoted to him.

"Fernando's divorce, as you know, has been held up because he wants, rather he is insisting on, having his little girl with him at least part of the time. I wouldn't respect him if he were willing to give up his child even for me.

"He and Mrs. Lamas have been separated several times, and now that they have come to a final parting of the ways, it isn't as though I had broken up his marriage, or he—mine.

"When all our troubles are worked out, all we are asking for is to share a good, solid family life. I tried to have that with Artie Shaw. I tried with Steve Crane. I tried with Bob Topping, and you know what happened each time."

Having gone through each of these upheavals with Lana, I most certainly knew what she meant. Artie Shaw preferred the intellectual life. He never thought Lana was "cultured" enough for him.

Steve Crane loved being married to a glamorous movie star, and Lana spent most of her life with him in nightclubs posing for the photographers.

Bob Topping—well, shall we say he just likes to play around?

"Tell me about that $250,000 emerald necklace you are supposed to be holding out on Bob," I put in, "and all those other jewels belonging to his mother he says you are refusing to return."

If it is possible for a blonde as beautiful as Lana is to snort, that was just about her answer.

"Nonsense," she snapped. "Those jewels are a myth. The only jewels I have that were Bob's mother's are an emerald ring and a pearl necklace. There never was any 'fabulous emerald necklace' except in somebody's imagination.

"Believe me, I wouldn't mind giving the ring and the pearls back to Bob if I felt he was really sentimental about them. But I don't think he is.

"I think this talk about him being a multi-millionaire is as phony as these stories about the family jewels. It is my opinion that he has spent most of his inheritance."

Lana went on, "My attorney is doing everything he can to bring about a settlement with Bob so I can get my freedom. But, believe me, I am going to insist on getting back some of the money I sank in that marriage. Even getting back some of that money won't begin to make up for the many heartbreaking things that happened." Her voice trailed off, almost sadly.

I'll never forget the deep heartache she suffered when she miscarried two children—babies she had wanted very much to have. I was sure she was thinking about that now—of how she had cried and cried as though her heart would break both times motherhood was denied her.

Following the loss of the first baby, she had been gravely ill. It had been months before she had been able to return to work. During that time, many people and even her studio believed she might give up her career to be just Mrs. Bob Topping—that's how eager she was to make a real homelife for herself and him.

I remember she had said, "I'll work just when Bob is willing to remain in Hollywood. If he prefers to travel, I'm going with him." And she meant it. I believe it wasn't until later that Lana came to realize that if there was going to be money enough for travel and mansions for homes in her life with Bob Topping she was the one who was going to have to earn it.

But that is in the past. Sometime she will forget it all, she hopes. And she doesn't stay long off the subject of her one and only present interest—Mr. Fernando Lamas.

"One reason I am perfectly sure our marriage will work out is because I respect Fernando so much," she said, calmly now, stirring a cup of coffee.

"We both have careers. We understand each other's problems. The only good thing to come out of all this silly gossip about Kirk and me is that Fernando was not once the slightest bit jealous. He just laughs and tells me not to take it so seriously.

"And, he is such a wonderful actor. I think he gives one of the best performances I've ever seen on the screen in The Merry Widow. Oh, how I love that picture, Louella! It was just heaven playing opposite Fernando. I don't care if they say he steals the picture!"

We both laughed, for, believe me, when a star of Lana's stature says a thing like THAT, it's bound to be love with a capital L.

She is eagerly looking forward to the time, in the late summer, when she and Lamas and Cheryl will leave for South America, where MGM will star Lana and Lamas in a picture to be called Latin Lovers.

"I'll meet his family there . . . and we will be, very quietly, just homefolks. The last time I was in South America it was quite a different story: the full glamor treatment all the way—parties, luncheons, dinners, cocktails, meeting dignitaries, nothing but a whirl from morning to night.

"This time I shall get a chance to know the people and how they really live when not entertaining a movie star from Hollywood."

She said, seriously, "With all our efforts to keep our happiness to ourselves and our attempt to be dignified about it, it breaks my heart when ridiculous and vicious stories are printed. I guess that's why I blew my top the way I did to you, Louella," she explained a little apologetically. "Is it so wrong to want a solid marriage and to have a happy home for my child, and a place where his child can come and be with us?"

I didn't bother to answer that because I am sure that Lana knows I am her good friend and that I will always wish her happiness.

I was really kidding her when I said, just before I was ready to go, "There's one little rumor you haven't denied, Lana," I laughed.

"What's that?" she asked quickly.

"That you are being temperamental at the studio for the first time in your career."

"Oh, that," she winked. "Temperament, or a little of it now and then, is good for the game. Seriously, the only thing I was annoyed about was that I wasn't able to get my own hairdresser for A Tribute To A Bad Man. I've had this girl for years and years and I thought it was silly to give her to another actress when I was ready to start my picture. But," she sighed, "I wish that were all I had to worry about!"

As I mentioned before, my friend, Lana, is a very even tempered girl, except when she gets her dander up! END

FROM THE MOVIES

ABOUT FACE—No Other Girl For Me and If Someone Had Told Me by Tony Martin and Dinah Shore (Victor).

MERRY WIDOW—Vilia by Skip Martin* (MGM).
MGM's new Technicolor musical brings back this familiar Lehar melody, neatly done up here in modern dress by the new band of arranger Skip Martin (he's the fellow who wrote Les Brown's hit record of I've Got My Love To Keep Me Warm).

ROBIN HOOD—Whistle My Love by Henry Jerome* (MGM).
Pleasant performance of a song from the new Walt Disney opus, with Ray DeMeno on the vocal.

SKIRTS AHOY—Hold Me Close To You by Billy Eckstine (MGM).
Here's a truly outstanding vocal performance that Billy does in his first movie. Accompanied by Georgie Stoll and the MGM studio orchestra, he does a splendid job.

WITH A SONG IN MY HEART—Album of songs by Jane Froman (Capitol).
Title song by Doris Day* (Columbia); Perry Como (Victor); Hildegarde (Decca); Ezio Pinza (Victor).
Tea For Two by Guy Lombardo (Decca); Frank Sinatra & Dinah Shore* (Columbia); Gordon MacRae (Capitol); Bing Crosby (Decca); Charlie Ventura (Victor).
Embraceable You by Paul Weston* (Columbia); Dave Rose (MGM); Kate Smith (Columbia); Nat King Cole* (Capitol).

POPULAR

PEGGY LEE—*Lover (Decca).
Peggy will almost certainly have her biggest seller in a long time with this disc, thanks to the excitement-packed Gordon Jenkins arrangement. The other side is a more typical Lee performance of You Go To My Head, and although it'll be far less popular, it's my personal preference of the two sides.

JOHNNIE RAY—Album* (Columbia).
What can I say? So much has been said and written about the fabulous 25-year-old kid from Dallas, Oregon, that there's nothing left to add except that the best record he's made to date, Give Me Time, is in this album (or LP disc) as well as some other typically tearful tunes.

JAZZ

BERYL BOOKER—*A Handful Of Stars (Mercury).
A wonderful new piano star makes a very promising debut with her own quintet. On the other side she sings, too—You'd Better Go Now.

RALPH BURNS—*Free Forms Album (Mercury).
Woody Herman's arranger produces eight delightful original compositions here played by a group featuring woodwinds and strings. Gentle music with agreeable touches of jazz.

THE SLUGGING SINATRAS ARE THE FIGHTERS OF THE YEAR. AND HERE'S THE REASON WHY . . .

"We fight—but we love it!"

■ A few weeks ago when Frank and Ava Sinatra returned from their second honeymoon in Honolulu—their first consisted of a weekend in Havana—they found the mailbox jammed with bills and magazines.

They took care of the bills and then sat down of an evening for a little literary relaxation. They began to pore through the magazines and then suddenly broke into laughter. The periodicals were filled with stories of THE BATTLING SINATRAS, in big bold type. (Continued on next page)

THEY SAY SHE'S INSANELY JEALOUS . . . THEY SAY SHE CAN'T GET ALONG WITH FRANKIE'S KIDS—BUT AVA

Most rumors don't bother me

Certainly, they don't affect Frank

They say I'm insanely jealous

It's pure baloney

THEY SAY HE'S A HOTHEAD . . . THEY SAY HE SCREAMS AT AVA ALL THE TIME—BUT FRANKIE JUST SITS

f we get along—that isn't news

If we quarrel—that's a scoop!

We do quarrel

So does every other married coup

"We fight—but we love it!" continued

You must have read some of them yourself if you read film magazines; and if you did, you probably came off with the impression that Ava spends most of her spare time banging Frankie over the head with a rolling pin and that he retaliates by battering her lovely body to a bloody pulp.

According to the stories, Ava is insanely jealous about her crooner-boy. Let him so much as even look at another girl, and she pulls his heart out by the roots, at least three times a night, which means, of course, that he has a very elastic heart.

These same self-appointed Gardner-Sinatra authorities also say that Ava doesn't get along particularly well with Frank's children, that when their mother went to New York with Barbara Stanwyck some time back, and the children visited Ava and Frank, they witnessed a battle royal. They say that the young Sinatras are embarrassed, uneasy, and nervous in Ava's presence, and she in theirs. But these statements have no basis in fact.

As for Frank, supposedly his jealousy takes form in frenzied rages. When Ava says "Good morning" to the mailman, Frank races out of the house with a set of swords and a set of dueling pistols. "Mr. Mailman," he shouts, "you have your choice."

It's ludicrous, but that's what the wisenheimers would have you believe.

As Ava used to say back in dear old Smithfield, N. C., "all of that, honey-chile, is pure, pure baloney."

Ava has never been happier in her life than since her marriage to Frank. She thinks he's adorable and everything she has ever wanted in a man. That's why she married him in the first place. "I never judged him," she says, "by a sheaf of newspaper clippings. I judged him by his actions. They say he's a hothead with a very low boiling point. Not true. You really have to rile him before he blows his top. Frank has a wonderful sense of tolerance. He gets furious at people who denounce others for being Negroes or Jews or Catholics, and so do I."

The Monday-morning quarterbacks insist that Frank screams at Ava all the time, that it makes no difference where they are, at home or in public. They like to exercise their vocal chords. That's a slice from that same hunk of baloney.

Ava and Frank believe in acting naturally. If they're out in public and they disagree, they speak their minds.

A few weeks ago, for example, when Frank was singing at the Cocoanut Grove of the Hotel Ambassador in Los Angeles, one of his old acquaintances came over after the show and put the bite on Ava's boy for a hundred bucks.

Ava grew furious. "You've already loaned him more than $2500," she complained. "He has no intention of returning that. Why do you keep pouring good dough after bad?"

"Well . . . he happens to be a little hard up," Frank said.

"He's been a moocher for the past 20 years," Ava pointed out, and she launched into a real wifely tirade. Ava is pretty practical when it comes to money. Frank is not. Any sort of sob story and he'll get softhearted and come across with his last twenty dollar bill.

Folks who overheard Ava arguing with Frank that night undoubtedly misinterpreted their quarrel for the fight of the century, because the next day Ava picked up a newspaper and a local columnist said, "the Sinatra marriage will blow sky-high any evening now."

The truth of the matter is that Frank and Ava fight vocally all the time. They are two people with decided opinions who believe in getting to the point—no beating about the bush with this pair.

If Frank doesn't like a particular dress of Ava's, he'll say, "Not that one, sweetie"—they both (Continued on page 86)

the fifth passenger

(Continued from page 39) thing could I do than share their discomforts and danger for a few hours, and what sort of creature was I to pretend I wanted to do it but not really mean it?

It was no slight feeling of guilt that bothered me now, but a strong one, and there was only one way to square it. "Please take me along," I told the chaplain. "I must go."

He said he couldn't do that. He was traveling alone in an open jeep (open so you can jump out and take to a ditch in a hurry in case of a plane or sniper attack) without lights and over a route that was more of an icy, rocky trail than a road. I stood a good chance of being frozen, bumped out, hurt in a crash, shot, or, as he put it, "all four, maybe."

But by now I had to go.

I PUT on six suits of long, woolen underwear, tops and bottoms. Over this I wore two pairs of GI trousers, two sweaters, a shirt, two jackets and over all a fur-lined parka that reached to the knees. I pulled on four pairs of socks and stuck them along with my trouser bottoms into shu-packs—big, army overshoes. I wrapped two woolen bandannas around my head and after I'd pulled up the hood of the parka I wrapped another woolen scarf around my face, almost to the eyes, so that I could see only through a narrow slit between bandanna and scarf. In each of my woolen gloves was a chemical handwarmer which I held in my fingers.

When I was ready I went out and found two other figures similarly bundled up. They turned out to be Mala Powers and Johnny Grant who were members of our troupe. They'd heard part of my conversation with Lt. Bondurant and had decided to go along.

A moment later the chaplain got into the car and asked a question which made me gulp. Did we have our identification cards? They would be needed, I knew, if we were captured by the enemy, to prove we were non-combatants and also (which was hardly a comfort) to earn us officers' treatment as prisoners of war. We all nodded soberly and the chaplain started off.

I turned my head to look back. Headquarters was disappearing behind us and with it I lost whatever feeling of safety I'd had up to then. I was scared . . . so scared I called myself crazy for ever getting the idea of going. I began to count the minutes; each one that went by made me think, "well, just another one like that, and another one after that, and before I know it we'll be there."

In the back of my mind a phrase began to put itself together, a phrase I had heard often about the war. And then I knew what it was—"loose front." GI's would tell us that there was no exact fighting line, especially at night. Soldiers from both sides were slipping through, raiding, making surprise attacks, ambushing cars on the road. That's why we didn't use our lights; not so we could sneak by undetected but so as not to give them an easy, illuminated target.

I tried not to think of this and a phrase came to my mind, one my mother was always saying . . . "God is with you." Crouched deep in my seat, my head pulled down as far as it would go between my shoulders as we jounced along, I kept wondering, "Was He. . .?" I tried to prove to myself that He was, that He always had been. But there was no proof for me out there in the freezing darkness.

"God is with you," my mother would cry out when I fell as a toddler and I would pick myself up unhurt and believe He had been. "But God will be with you," my mother had said when she told me my tonsil operation would hurt, and I had believed her with the faith of a six-year-old. When I was 14 and frightened about taking my first plane ride, when the pilot of a speeding motorboat I was in, seemed to go crazy and was missing the dockside by inches as he roared by, the first time I stood, dry-mouthed and heart pounding, in front of a camera—"God is with you," had been enough. But was He with me now?

Greer Garson opened a new theater in New York. The manager asked if she would say a few words and gave her a small slip of paper on which a suggested speech had been written. "Only this, to open a theater," replied Miss Garson. "I use more words than that to open a can of tomatoes."

Leonard Lyons in The New York Post

I found myself feeling sorry for myself, and then, I recognized this feeling as one I'd had before in my life . . . for another person, a girl riding in a car with my older sister and me. They had been talking without my taking special notice of their words until this girl had said, "As far as I am concerned I am an atheist. I can't be a believer. I just can't believe."

I had been shocked and had felt sorry for her . . . and in exactly the same way I was sorry for myself now! Was I, too, being a skeptic with the little faith I was showing? It wasn't a pleasant thought out there in the menacing freeze.

I sat up straight in my seat and stopped cowering. For most of my life I had always felt that if a thing was right it should be done. Whether it seemed risky or unwise did not matter. This, which I was now doing, was the right thing to do and from this point on I must stop worrying. It was out of my hands.

THERE is no way of judging the time but perhaps it was an hour later when we were challenged by an American sentry, then by another some distance further on, and after that we pulled up at a big tent hidden in a clump of trees. Several GI's showed up and we were helped out of the jeep . . . and we needed help, we were so stiff.

Inside we found almost 50 more men, some standing around a little stove trying to get warm and others bunched into little conversational groups. Mala and I pulled our hoods down and took the bandannas off our hair. Everything grew quiet, awfully quiet, and they just stood and stared at us. The chaplain entered quickly behind us and made a little introductory announcement.

"Miss Mala Powers, Miss Piper Laurie and Johnny Grant of Hollywood, men," he said. "They've just come up to join our get-together tonight."

Still no one said anything. I got a feeling that it was because they had lost touch with the outer world. It had been so long they were too surprised to get over it easily. A few of the boys came closer and tried to talk . . . but awkwardly, as if they couldn't think of what to say. A couple of the soldiers started to distribute song books and each man took his, but still stared silently. We were given books and then the chaplain led off.

For the first few seconds everybody sang. But, as if they had all rehearsed it beforehand, the voices of the men suddenly became almost inaudible and just Mala and I were singing. I sensed why immediately. They wanted to listen to us, not because it was Mala and me, but because to stand there and hear girls' voices brought back everything they had left behind. And you could tell. As we looked around now a smile broke out here and there, a smile, an appreciative grin, an understanding look between buddies. We sang on. We knew we were giving the best performance of our whole trip.

The second song was a hymn and now the boys started to join in a bit and it was more of a party. I was singing away when I felt something brushing me lightly from behind. I turned around and there, so close that his nose must have been touching my hair before, was a young GI, a dark-haired boy maybe 19 at the most. His eyes were closed and he was inhaling deeply. Something must have told him that I had moved and he opened his eyes. For a second he looked at me, the barest smile coming to his lips. Then he closed his eyes again, said "Girls!" and inhaled again, sighing.

The chaplain delivered his sermon and then led us all in a prayer. Another song and it was over. Now the boys started moving in, there was no more strangeness but an eager desire to talk on the part of almost every one of them.

"How long you been here?"

"How long you gonna stay?"

"You coming back up here?"

"When did you leave the States? How was it?"

Nobody wanted a show. Nobody wanted us to entertain in any way. They just wanted to talk. They wanted to be carried back, even if only conversationally, to what they had left behind. I looked around for my little inhaler and saw him sitting alone, his head to one side and a lost look in his eyes. I knew he was thinking of someone he had hated to leave and wondered if he would ever see again. I had to blink my eyes to keep them from watering and turned back quickly to the others. Open sentiment was not wanted here. There was a lot of it around but for each it was private.

Almost every night of my life since I have been five years old I have prayed. I just pray—I don't pray for anything. But this night I resolved to include thanks in my prayer, thanks that I had turned an idle idea into something valuable.

We were there almost two hours, most of which time Lt. Bondurant had individual sessions of prayer and talk with some of the boys. Then we started to bundle ourselves up—the fellows laughing at us openly—for the return trip. They escorted us—or I should say practically carried us—out to the jeep and stood in a half circle around us until we got under way. Mala turned to me immediately.

"I'm so glad we came," she said. "So awfully, awfully glad."

It was colder than before, if anything, but we were so exhilarated that I don't think we noticed it at first. Mala and I, as well as Johnny and Lt. Bondurant, would lean towards each other despite the biting wind to recall incidents about the visit. Eventually we huddled down into our seats silently as the jeep bounced along. It was then that I had a chance to realize that once more I should be frightened. We had 20 miles of night ahead of us, night that could well be filled with danger from enemy patrols. But I wasn't frightened. I felt wonderful.

I felt wonderful because I knew, somehow I just knew that there were not four of us, but five of us going back in that jeep. And the fifth passenger, I was certain, was God.

He was with me. END

a new love, a new life

(Continued from page 59) four hundred hogs through the streets of the city from the loading pens to the slaughter house. The pigs, not sure of their fate after a long train ride, generally resented the trek and gave the drivers considerable trouble. The porkies wanted to see the sights—or go some place else—for they would take the side roads at every opportunity. A boy had to be on his toes every minute and wide-awake or wind up spending the entire day hog-calling in the business section of Chicago.

"It was nothing like servicing a newspaper route," John said. "Some of those animals would weigh several hundred pounds and they didn't want to be shoved around. And we had a bit of traffic to contend with, too. We got up early for the drives but there was always that one motorist, in a hurry to get to work or something, who would turn into the herd and scatter the hogs in every direction but the right one. One day one of the pigs went berserk and charged us . . . and we all climbed phone poles. When we got down about half an hour later, darn near every home in that district had a pig or two in the back yard. If the family hadn't owned the plant, I'd still be paying a pork bill there for the ones we lost."

A summer or so later, when the family moved to its home at Lakeside, Michigan, for several months, young John found the type of work he wanted to do. He became a caddy. He didn't want to be a caddy all his life, of course, but he wanted to do something around a golf course. And he was a good, tireless caddy. He'd be the first one at the Lakeside Club in the morning, and he wouldn't go home to dinner until the last weary golfer had put away his clubs and given up for the day. From that time to this John Agar has been a fanatic golfer.

As a caddy he got his fill of walking around the course professionally, but as a player he never ever got enough. Once for four straight days he played 72 holes a day—something of a record even for a kid with youthful stamina. But on days that he worked, picking up a dollar and a quarter a trip around, he used to get out on the greens before the worms got back in their holes, play a round, and then top off the day with 18 holes before complete darkness set in.

Jack Agar loved golf so much that he refused to go into the pro shop, the place where the equipment is looked after. He had heard of a ruling that made anyone who worked in a pro shop a professional, and it was his ambition to become a champion amateur.

NOBODY has ever called John Agar a lazy man, but once, as a youngster, he fell asleep on the job, right in the middle of the day. It was while he was going to school. He had taken a job as a sort of handy lad with a pharmaceutical manufacturing company. One day he was asked to go into a huge cavernous room and assist in a chore he had not been introduced to before. There were huge mills grinding chemicals into a fine powder. Jack's job was to keep the mills full of material. He noticed that the other workers were wearing special nose and mouth masks, but he paid no attention—and nobody apparently was aware that he wasn't wearing one of the masks. After about 20 minutes of work, with the fine powder filling the air, he began to feel strangely drowsy and then faint. Finally somebody did notice him, and two husky fellows ran to his side, grabbed his arms and rushed him out of the room to the emergency hospital, where he lay down a very sick boy. He found out the next day that the powder he had been breathing was from a chemical used to manufacture sleeping pills, and that by rights he should be sleeping yet.

Not every kid gets to go to a private prep school, but a good many do. John Agar was one of them. When he finished grammar school he was shipped off to the Harvard School for Boys at Pawling, New York. He had no idea at the time, of course, but he was to join the ranks of a number of other screen stars who were educated at Pawling. Frank and Ralph Morgan went there, as well as George Montgomery and George Murphy. Jack was a pretty good pupil, although no whiz. He held his own in the classrooms and did a little better than that on the playing fields. He was a fair end and blocking back in football and a dinger of a center in basketball. As a matter of fact, he is held in higher esteem at the school even now for his record of baskets tossed than for his fame on the screen.

It has been said a good many times that John Agar is a spoiled product of a wealthy family. That is not true. At no time did his family cater particularly to any of his whims—work and earn was the motto as far as the boy was concerned. There never was a summer that he did not earn enough money, generally by the generous sweat of his brow, to go on to school at his own expense if he had found it necessary. And he learned thrift. He didn't squander his money then any more than he does now.

If it hadn't been for World War II, young Agar might have gone on to college and become a professional man and settled down in some city distant from Hollywood and never had his picture taken again in his life. But there was a war and along with millions of other fellows Jack was plucked from his plotted pattern and stuffed into an Air Forces uniform. He wore it for three years, with distinction and honor, the record books say.

HIS mother and grandfather had moved to Beverly Hills, California, so it was there that Jack headed on his leaves and furloughs. Beverly Hills and not Hollywood itself is the center of the social life of the film industry, so it was to be expected that Jack would get to know and get mixed up with the film set. It was soon after that that you and I both first heard of him. He was the handsome lad who was dating Shirley Temple—the one who, against a backdrop of hoopla so foreign to him, eventually married her.

Having been Shirley Temple's husband is now so far in the past in John Agar's life that if it were not for the never-ending fame of that young lady it would be irrelevant. But Shirley, in a sense, is responsible for his getting into pictures. Actually John had no ambitions theatrically. As a matter of fact, he had rather definite aversions to a screen career. He had no grease paint in his blood, thought it was a bit silly for a grown man to get paid for making faces, and above all shivered at the thought of capitalizing on his relationship to further any kind of a career. For that reason he rejected all suggestions that he take up movie-making in any department, rejected them flatly.

But a man must make a living, especially if he is married to a woman who must be in the public eye, one who needs pretty things oftener than most wives. And a baby was well on the way. So, merely as a means of turning a few fast bucks, Jack listened to David Selznick, who had been after him for a long time to take a screen test, and was shortly afterwards signed to a long term contract. Those who knew the details of the negotiations will recall for you that it took quite a bit of coaxing to get the boy in front of a camera —and quite a bit of intestinal stamina on John's part to take the step.

If you saw him in his first films, Fort Apache, She Wore A Yellow Ribbon and others, you must agree that David Selznick knew what he was doing when he signed Agar. He was a fresh, clean personality, an unspoiled, handsome new face. The record of his credits show that all of his pictures were made on loan-out, not produced by the man who had Shirley under contract, which means that he got the parts on his own merit and that outside producers were willing to pay handsomely to get him.

No matter how low an opinion a person has of acting as a talent or craft, they'll lose it for keeps if they ever work for John Ford. Ford is a perfectionist, a slave driver and a man who can drill respect for what he is doing into the most amateur of amateur actors. John Agar fell into Ford's hands in his first and third pictures. By the time the first one was over, he was no longer of the opinion that acting was a form of kidding. He knew it was a profession and that few are chosen for it—and fewer yet capable of it. He became really enthusiastic. He wanted to learn, not entirely to make money now, but because it was a challenge to improve himself in an artistic endeavor. The fact that Ford called him back for a second movie is proof that his effort was not wasted—and that he had a genuine talent for acting. Ford has no room on his sets for dullards or laggards.

It is unfortunate that divorce came into his life at the time it did, for John Agar was not prepared to handle tragedy at that period. But it did—and then came an interlude of morbidity. It is to Agar's eternal credit that he whipped that and emerged a better man and artist.

No picture you have ever seen of Loretta Agar has ever done her justice. Possibly she doesn't care very much about having her picture taken, because no cameraman has been able to truly capture the loveliness and wholesomeness of the girl.

John and Loretta met at a mutual friend's house, a chap named Larry Springer with whom John played golf. Their first interest in each other was because of golf—and they'd sit at the tables in the club house after a game and hold a post-mortem, and Loretta was generally more accurate in her analysis of the contest just finished than either of the men. That was a strong link between John and Loretta.

Somehow I can't quite believe that one way to save the theater is to get Shelley Winters to appear on the stage.

Richard Watts Jr. in The New York Post

And their marriage was no hasty affair, as has been said in the press. It was a sensible, well discussed mating that was important to both of them from the very moment they discovered they were in love. Like most fellows, John was a bit lazy about some of his ambitions. For instance, he had always wanted to be a good singer, but never having given much thought to becoming a professional performer, he hadn't done anything about it. Loretta made him go to a coach and study—and if you think it didn't pay off, talk to the managers of some of the places John has worked as a singer, like the Oriental Theatre in Chicago, the Olympic Theatre in Miami, the Earle in Philadelphia or the Copa Club in Pittsburgh.

John has another talent that Loretta is working on right now that might very well keep the family sugar bowl filled with lettuce. He writes songs. He used to just kid about it—but now he is in earnest, thanks to Loretta. One, "I Wonder If You Know," is said to be a standout by many professional tunesmiths.

The John Agars are members of the congregation of the All Saints Episcopal Church in Beverly Hills and attend services regularly. They play cards at home a lot and go to movies with the college kids of Westwood. Their real enjoyments are found in their home.

The day MODERN SCREEN called on them they were sprawled in the middle of the living room floor surrounded with dictionaries and encyclopedias, working several cross word puzzles simultaneously. Music, popular and a bit of long hair, was pouring from a record player that is never turned off. A huge pot of coffee was bubbling on the kitchen stove, for the Agars have a cup of coffee every time they think of it. It was a truly domestic scene.

And after a while, when it began to rain —and the pictures we had come for had been taken—a feeling of peace and security seemed to permeate the apartment, and the world beyond the steamy windows seemed very far away. The apartment with its comfortable rooms and warm colors became truly a home—a place where Mister and Missus Nice Ordinary would live. And the conversation was warm and the coffee hot and the laughter easy and genuine.

It was a shame to go away. But we did. Me and the photog. And when we had been seen to the door and had stepped into the street for the short walk to the car, we wanted to hurry back. So we looked well at the street and the newness of it all and the juvenile trees, so we'd remember the place. And we were both happy we'd called. Dropping in on the Agars was a pleasure—a real pleasure. END not take my word for it that Joan Taylor is a future star of exceptional talent. (MODERN SCREEN photographers call her "their pet.") You can see her in The Savage, with Charlton Heston, and in many more Paramount pictures to come!

BARBARA RUICK: SHOW BUSINESS IN HER BLOOD
By Jane Powell

I was delighted to be Barbara Ruick's sponsor at MODERN SCREEN's First Annual Golden Key Awards. Like me, she began her career in radio. Unlike me, however, she has a fine acting heritage. Barbara, born in Pasadena, California, is the daughter of Melville Ruick and Lurene Tuttle, both outstanding radio stars. At 14, Barbara began singing with the high school band and during her senior year she sang twice weekly on radio.

Many thousands of service men, I am sure, will champion Barbara for stardom as much as I do, for she has made seven trips to Travis Airfield and recently returned from a 21,000-mile trip helping to entertain troops in Europe and North Africa.

Barbara's Golden Key now has a place of honor in her Beverly Hills apartment, and if you have seen her in the MGM's Invitation and Scaramouche, I know that she'll have a place of honor on your list of new favorites.

DOROTHY HART: HER NAME MEANS WHAT IT SAYS
By Howard Duff

The night of the Golden Key Awards, I paced the floor at the party, waiting for Dorothy Hart to show up. She was the last to arrive, and I almost had to leave because I was waiting for that any-second call that Ida's baby had appeared. And why was Dorothy so late? Because she was working at the Mobile Blood Bank, and considered what she was doing more important than anything concerning her career.

Dorothy has been one of our most prominent magazine cover girls, Queen of the Cleveland Air Races, and has won so many beauty contests she's forgotten the number. Yet she never trades on her beauty and in my opinion, is the Sweetheart of All the Golden Key Girls, just to give her one more title. Her first film role was opposite Randolph Scott in Gunfighters, and you may have seen her since in Raton Pass or Loan Shark, with George Raft. Lippert productions have every reason to be really proud of their entry in the Golden Key derby!

URSULA THIESS: MOST IMPORTANT SINCE DIETRICH
By Jane Russell

Everyone at RKO-Radio Pictures is cheering MODERN SCREEN's selection of Ursula Thiess (rhymes with niece) as a Golden Key winner. Born in Hamburg, Germany, she is the first important screen discovery from that country since Marlene Dietrich, 20 years ago. Ursula's home was bombed out during the war, and she was forced to flee the country. After the war was over she became a photographer's model, and wrote and sold film stories for short subjects. When her picture appeared on the cover of Life Magazine, studio officials cabled her a screen test offer, which she couldn't at first believe.

When Ursula arrived in Hollywood, she couldn't speak a word of English, but she mastered the rudiments of the language in four months and was cast as the leading lady for the Technicolor film, Monsoon, which was filmed in India.

The British press has heralded her as the "most beautiful girl in the world," and I personally believe that she is potentially one of the greatest stars ever to be brought to the RKO-Radio lot.

SUZAN BALL: SHE BAKED A CAKE
By Tony Curtis

You want to get into a hot argument over at Universal-International, ask anybody who they think Suzan Ball looks like. Some say Elizabeth Taylor or Jane Russell. Maybe Lana Turner, but unlike Lana, Suzan didn't get her start by being discovered on a soda fountain stool. No, Suzan did it the hard way, by baking a chocolate cake for a charity bazaar in Santa Maria and getting it seen by talent scouts. (Her face, not the cake.) Suzan is from my home state, New York, and she landed in Hollywood because her father happened to be a travel agency manager.

She didn't fool herself that she could make good in movies; she went to North Hollywood, and every time she looked around she thought she saw a thousand girls who looked better. So she did a little modeling, sang with a dance band and hoped the right guy would come along. He did, and signed her to a movie contract. I won't say she's going places—in my opinion, she's already there. So go take a look at her in The Untamed with Jeff Chandler and Yankee Buccaneer with Scott Brady. And remember, a couple of years from now, I told you!

GLORIA GREENWOOD: SHE WAS "TOP SECRET"
By John Derek

For a long time, Gloria Greenwood was a "hush-hush" girl at our studio, Columbia. The former Queen of the Portland, Oregon, Rose Festival had been signed to star in her first picture, playing the late Grace Moore's role in One Night Of Love.

A few days before winning her Golden Key, Gloria still had her original name, Gloria Krieger. Of her singing in concerts and on the radio, critics had already said such things as "the most exciting voice I have ever heard" and "the best voice in a hundred years." To date, her greatest achievement has been as the soloist for the Denver Symphony orchestra, but she would already be a movie favorite if the studio had not kept her a "top secret" while grooming her for her all important screen debut in One Night Of Love.

I am proud to be Gloria's sponsor and anxious to appear opposite her in pictures, but I am certain that, even without this modest endorsement, she will be successful and famous in Hollywood for a long time to come.

Joan Taylor was ill, so sponsor Ronald Reagan and wife Nancy sent Key to the hospital.

EILEEN CHRISTY: THE BANK CLERK BEAUTY
By John Russell

I think that few Hollywood Cinderella stories can match that of Eileen Christy, for whom Ella Raines and I are the sponsors. (The only Golden Key girl with two sponsors, by the way.) Eileen was only 14 and a native of Baldur, Manitoba, Canada, when she grabbed off a job as clerk in a San Francisco bank, and she might still be headed for a vice-presidency if so many people hadn't commented on her beautiful voice.

She auditioned at the Civic Light Opera Association, and abruptly veered to a new career. In 1949 she entered the Atwater Kent Auditions, placing second, but she was so determined that she tried again the second year and captured top honors. This led to television and her own NBC musical program known as the Eileen Christie Show. Today she has been signed to a Republic starring contract and you will see her first in I Dream Of Jeanie.

Keep an eye on this girl, and I will too, at Republic studios, where I hope to appear opposite her in many pictures.

PENNY EDWARDS: NOW SHE'S IN THE BIG LEAGUE
By Bill Lundigan

Even my best friends didn't tell me that I'd be the loneliest guy at MODERN SCREEN's Golden Key party until I arrived and was told that Penny Edwards, for whom I was named sponsor, was held over on location at Sedona, Arizona, and couldn't be present to receive her award. So, with a fine disregard for other people's money, I called her long distance, got Ty Power on the phone and told him that his leading lady in Pony Soldier was getting famous overnight.

Penny's career really began one night outside a theater in Jackson Heights, New York, when at the age of four she told her parents she was going to become an actress. Thereupon, she rustled up a gang of neighborhood kids and began to produce plays. She stuck to show business like a leech, wound up as a specialty dancer in the last Ziegfeld Follies at the tender age of 12.

Penny was Roy Rogers' girl in a half dozen movies and an equal number for Rex Allen. Then this dancing and acting whiz, who is prettier than a Petty girl, signed with 20th, where everyone is delighted at the great strides she is making as an actress. Check on her in Pony Soldier and see if I'm not right!

VIRGINIA GIBSON: CHORUS GIRL MAKES GOOD
By Virginia Mayo

Yes, it still can be done—Virginia Gibson has danced her way through the chorus line of several Broadway shows, straight into a Hollywood contract, and I was proud to be present the night she accepted her Golden Key Award from MODERN SCREEN.

The sprightly little red-haired Virginia comes from St. Louis, Mo., where as the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Gorski she was educated at St. Alfonse's School for Girls and was sent to dancing school almost as soon as she could walk. And at 17, she took off on a shoestring to win her place in the hearts of New York theater-goers, as she certainly will throughout the whole country, now that she has the much wider audience of movies.

I urge you to watch for Virginia in About Face, if you have not already seen her in Tea For Two or Painting The Clouds With Sunshine. Write and tell me how you like her; for as her sponsor I'd like to know how the Golden Key Girl who bears the same first name I do is getting along.

LUCY KNOCH: "STRAIGHT GIRL" MAKES GOOD
By Red Skelton

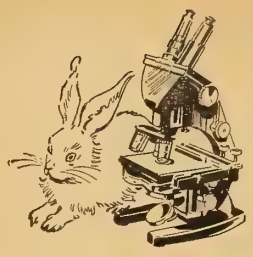
I want to step out of comedy character long enough to summon Lucy Knoch to the stage for a long deep bow as she accepts her Golden Key. This girl from Nashville, Tennessee, has brought a lot of pure fun and pleasure to millions of people watching my NBC-TV show, and I'm a little more than proud that she has won this honor, after spending four years on a studio lot where her talents were never properly used.

It was just a bit of luck that my business manager, Bo Roos, and I happened to spot her in a restaurant at the time when we were badly in need of a girl for the show, and Lucy said to me later, "I thought that Hollywood had become a blind alley for me, and I was all ready to take off for New York."

I feel that Lucy Knoch is one of the greatest natural comediennes of our time, and I am humbly proud that I have had a small part in furthering her career.

KAREN SHARPE: TINIEST OF THEM ALL
By Maureen O'Sullivan

I know that Karen Sharpe is headed for a fine future in the entertainment world, because I have appeared with her in television shows and know just how talented she is. Karen, who has a featured and continuing role in The Children's Hour series, a full hour program, came from San Antonio, Texas, graduated from the Hollywood Professional School, and originally planned to become a professional ice skater. Just five feet two inches tall, and weighing a hundred and three pounds, Karen is the type of girl I like to see succeed.



Karen is the first girl to be placed under contract by Hal Roach studios for their television productions, and other studios have been anxious to borrow her for movies ever since.

I hope you will continue to follow her career with as much interest as I do.

MARY SINCLAIR: TV HITS HOLLYWOOD
By Bill Holden

It is seldom that a player scores a solid success at any studio at which he or she has once been dropped from the contract list, but that is just what happened to Golden Key winner, Mary Sinclair. From San Diego, Mary was hailed to Paramount, just out of high school. Her tests failed, so she went on to New York, and after working in small stage roles, she landed a role in the television show, Studio One. She became the first lady of TV. That did it. All the studios bid for her services, but Mary preferred Paramount, where she once had failed to make good.

Oddly enough, Mary once modeled with Esther Williams, and gained most of her early drama experience by attending Hollywood High School evening drama school. Work and persistence have paid off for Mary Sinclair, who is scheduled for important roles at Paramount. I sincerely believe that before long she will have other

Rabbit eye tests prove ZONITE's absolute safety to body tissues in hygiene

The membranes of a rabbit's eye are far more delicate than those in the vaginal tract. ZONITE was put directly into rabbits' eyes twice daily for three months. Not the slightest irritation appeared at any time. No other type liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues!

Young wives should not experiment with this vital problem

In this modern age, most women realize how important complete feminine hygiene (including internal cleanliness) is to health, married happiness, after their periods and to prevent offensive odors.

Young wives are no longer forced to experiment or rely on 'guesswork' about what to use in their douche. Gone forever are the days of poisonous and caustic antiseptics! A foolproof rule to follow is to use a germicide in your douche which can be accidentally SWALLOWED WITH SAFETY. A perfect solution is ZONITE. It is a powerful germicide yet positively non-poisonous, non-irritating.

ZONITE should forever clear away any doubts and confusion of what to use in your douche because: no other type liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SO SAFE to body tissues!

In ZONITE women have an antiseptic that completely solves their most pressing and intimate problem.

Warns Against Use of Vinegar

The modern well-informed woman would never think of resorting to weak homemade solutions of vinegar for her douche. Would you use vinegar as a deodorant? Of course not! Would you pour vinegar over a cut and expect germicidal protection? Of course not! Vinegar and many other preparations have their use for the household. But certainly no intelligent woman should use such homemade makeshift solutions for the most intimate concern of her life.

The modern woman deserves a special, scientifically correct product for her douche. And she has it in ZONITE.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE completely deodorizes. It cleanses and flushes away odor-causing waste substances and deposits. ZONITE helps prevent infection and kills every germ it reaches. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but you can BE SURE ZONITE instantly kills every reachable germ. ZONITE can be used as directed as often as needed without the slightest risk of injury!

PEGGY KING:
THE SECRETARY HEADS FOR FAME
By Howard Keel

The most sensible way to success is to work at what you can do while waiting for an opportunity to try what you hope to do. That is exactly the procedure followed by Peggy King, who worked for two years as a secretary after her training in business college. Meantime, she patiently sought an opportunity with radio stations in Akron and Cleveland, Ohio, until she clicked. The parts were small at first, but she turned to singing and was signed with Charlie Spivak's band. Eventually, she auditioned for Decca records, at a time when MGM's producer, Arthur Freed, was present. "If I'd known who he was," Peggy says, "I wouldn't have been able to sing a note." But that audition won her an MGM contract.

Now she is considered "another Judy Garland," and I am only one of many who predict that this particular Golden Key girl has a golden future.

KATHY PHILLIPS:
THE MIRACLE FROM WOOLWORTH'S
By Dennis Day

Yes, it's true. Woolworth 5 and 10c store's loss was the entertainment world's gain. Kathy doesn't remember, exactly, whether she quit Woolworth's or whether they quit her, but one thing she does know—she was borrowing money to eat on when she heard that we were auditioning for my TV show. She had nothing to lose, so she decided to try out, and at the last minute she was so afraid, she wanted to back out. I think it was her nervousness in part that brought out her charm and made us decide to sign her for my NBC-TV show, after she sang "Getting To Know You" in competition with three skilled professionals.

There's something sort of wonderful about discovering a girl who once ran an elevator, shook towels in a laundry and stuffed bags in a potato chip factory, and then being able to watch her develop into a fine actress. Kathy is what we in show business call a "natural." She just "had to sing" all through her schooling at Mission High School in San Francisco, and the longer she is with us, the more convinced we all are that she'll one day be one of the most famous stars in the business, but that, in achieving that goal, she'll never lose an ounce of her delightful sweetness. END

what women have done to bill lundigan

Bill took the actress in his arms. He mashed his lips against hers. After a minute, Hedy came up for air. "A little better this time," she announced. "But you still need some instruction."

Women have been instructing Bill Lundigan all his adult life, largely because he gives them the feeling that he is a lost but talented soul, a frank actor who believes in speaking his mind honestly and bluntly, a practice frequently at odds with the high-powered diplomacy necessary to achieve Hollywood stardom.

Not too long ago, Bill was on location with Susan Hayward down in Georgia. The two of them were rehearsing a scene in which Bill drives a team of horses. A lot of townsfolk were watching the rehearsal, and Bill was taking a fearful verbal lashing from some third assistant director.

After the tenth bawling out, Bill was ready to blow his top. "I'm going down and tell that guy what I think of him," he muttered.

Susan Hayward grabbed Lundigan by the sleeve. "Just because he's a jerk," she whispered softly, "there's no point in your joining him. Let that Irish temper of yours cool down."

Bill looked at Susan, and she smiled. Then he broke into a grin, too. "Thanks," he said. "You probably saved my job."

LUNDIGAN has been extremely lucky in having a woman at his side during most of the critical moments of his life, and fortunately, women who have had more than their share of common sense.

The first was a beautiful young coed named Dorothy James with whom Bill attended Syracuse University. Dorothy's old man was the Lieutenant Governor of Pennsylvania. She was a girl with a quick and ready wit, an attractive personality, and a Venus de Milo figure.

Bill fell for her the way coal shuttles into a cellar basement, and she in turn, fell for him, because well, let's face it, Lundigan is a handsome hunk of man.

Bill, carried away by it all, proposed marriage to Dorothy. Romantically, he even suggested elopement. But Dorothy, despite her youth, knew the difference between real, lasting love and a tempestuous infatuation; and she told Bill very frankly that, while she cared for him a great deal, they were much too young to plunge into matrimony.

"My heart was broken at the time," Bill says. "But she certainly was right. She had a much deeper understanding of human nature than I. She saved us from a marriage that would never have worked. And I learned from her that marriage is nothing you enter into lightly, that it's the most important move in a man's life. When you finally take the step, you've got to be 99% sure. When I married my Rena, I was even more than 99% sure."

WHEN Bill Lundigan first hit Hollywood in 1937, however, he was about as sure of himself as a young girl attending her first dance. He was under contract to Universal, a studio majestically ruled over by young Queen Deanna Durbin. One night, after having seen this charming, neophyte actor in Dodge City, Queen Deanna expressed the desire of emoting with the lad in a movie entitled, Three Smart Girls Grow Up.

Midway during the production of this film, Deanna called Bill into her dressing room. She must have been all of 16 at the time. "What's the matter with you?" she demanded. "Don't you like this business?"

"Sure," said Bill. "I'm crazy about it."

"You certainly don't act that way," Deanna countered. "You spend all your time gabbing with the extras and the electricians, and your mind seems to be a million miles off. I know you're easy-going and all of that, but honestly, Bill, you'll never get anywhere in Hollywood unless you concentrate."

Bill says now that Deanna was right. "She made me see," he admits, "that you couldn't play a scene cold, that the lines had to get inside of you, that you had to make the character you were playing part of your life. As young as she was, Deanna taught me an awful lot about acting.

"I've been out in Hollywood quite a while now, and I still hear all those stories about how catty actresses are. But that hasn't been my experience at all. Actresses have been the most wonderful persons in my life. They've taught me things. They've gotten me jobs. They've stopped me lots of times from making a fool of myself.

"I remember some time back when I was playing with Bette Davis in The Old Maid. I was so nervous I couldn't stop my knees from knocking together. I blew line after line. When Miriam Hopkins came into the scene, I was even worse. Finally, Bette took me over to one side. 'Look, Bill,' she said, 'Miriam and I both know how hard you're trying. Take it easy. Relax. We know you're okay.' After that, I was fine.

"After the war was over and I was married and in need of a job, who do you think came up with one? Hedy Lamarr. She put me in one of her own productions.

"In 1949 when Zanuck was looking for a male lead opposite Jeanne Crain in Pinky, they were testing every actor and his grandfather. There was talk of Gregory Peck, Tyrone Power, Dana Andrews. I was sure I didn't have a chance, but Jeanne put in a good word for me, and Zanuck gave me a contract.

"I'm not kidding. Without women—without actresses in particular—I don't know where I'd be. Probably back in Syracuse working in my old man's shoe store."

Gloria De Haven and Mitzi Gaynor, who star with Bill in Down Among The Sheltering Palms, say that Bill was pretty nervous about his timing because this was the first musical he's ever been in.

"We talked to him," Gloria admits, "gave him a few pointers about music and dancing, and he came across like a million bucks. I've been asked lots of times why girls like to help Lundigan, why we go out of our way for him. It's a pleasure because he's so darn sweet and appreciative. He's been in the business a long time, but he has a wonderful sense of humility. Most men resent a woman's help and show it. Not Bill. He appreciates it, and he shows his appreciation. Women find that irresistible. I guess all of us by nature have something of the schoolteacher in us. Bill brings it out."

THIS handsome heart throb who brings out the best in women first saw the light of this world in Syracuse, N. Y., as the son of Martha and Michael Lundigan, who had Ireland in their blood and Killarney in their souls.

As a boy he wanted to become a lawyer. But his father's shoe store was in the same building that housed radio station WFBL, and Bill spent most of his spare time hanging around the radio studios.

By the time he was ten, he was a regular on the Children's Hour, and by the time he was 16, he'd developed into a full-fledged producer. One of his discoveries was an 11-year-old master of ceremonies named Gordon MacRae.

When he entered Syracuse University, Lundigan was torn between radio and law. Radio won, and Bill left college to take over the station.

One afternoon, not long after Bill and his coed sweetheart had decided that marriage was not for them, a press agent, exploiting the virtues of a Tarzan movie, strode into Bill's office.

"Just interview me over your station," the press agent explained, "so that I can plug the picture. That's my job."

Lundigan is the world's most agreeable soul and so he said, "Sure."

When the interview was over, the exploitation man thanked Bill and told him to look him up if he ever got to New York.

A few weeks later Lundigan was in the Big City, and the executives of Universal, thanks to the press agent, agreed to screen test him in their Long Island studio. A month later, the blue-eyed Irishman landed in Hollywood!

His first two years were spent at Universal, his second two at Warners, and his third two at MGM.

DURING these six years there were many women in his life, but only two had a major lease on his heart. They were Martha O'Driscoll and Marguerite Chapman.

There was also a high school girl who, unknown to him, had a terrific crush on Lundigan. Her name was Rena Morgan, and her mother was Helen, the famous torch singer. Rena used to sit in Schwab's drug store on Sunset Boulevard and whenever Bill walked in, she'd just look and sigh.

Their paths never crossed—at least, not until 1943, when Lundigan was a Marine at Quantico, Va.

Rena Morgan came down one weekend from Washington, D. C, to visit friends. She was introduced to Lundigan. Her heart started doing flip-flops. Bill reacted the same way. He kept staring into Rena's big brown eyes, and for a man who ordinarily spoke with careful deliberation, Lundigan suddenly became very glib.

"I don't know what it was," he says. "We began to talk about life and philosophy and very serious things. I began to see that my life had been without aim or direction. That is, I began to see under Rena's tutelage. She told me that if acting was going to be my life's work, then I owed it to myself to become the best actor I possibly could. You know how it is. You drift along from day to day, and suddenly you meet a girl and she asks you where you're going in life and you're stumped."

BILL fell in love with Rena Morgan, and, all the time he was fighting overseas, taking part in the actions on Peleiu and Okinawa, his thoughts were concentrated on her. They corresponded prolifically, these two, and the first night he was Stateside, Bill took Rena dancing at the Mocambo.

Emil Coleman and his orchestra were playing "Night And Day," the floor was very crowded, and Bill and Rena were dancing very close together, so close in fact that you couldn't have gotten a blade of grass between them. Quite suddenly Bill spoke into Rena's ear. "Would you mind very much," he asked, "if we got married?"

The light in her eyes gave him the answer, and he kissed her hair, and then her lips, right then and there and a few weeks later they became man and wife.

When you consider how many actresses genuinely like Bill Lundigan and how quickly in Hollywood the liking of an actor will develop into something stronger, it is quite remarkable that not one whiff of scandal has ever wafted over the Lundigan marriage.

After seven years, this is still one of the movie colony rock-firm marriages.

Friends of the Lundigans attribute its stability, in part, to the fact that both Rena and Bill are blessed with a well-rounded sense of humor.

WHEN Bill was making Pinky, Rena used to meet him at the door and say, "I bet you're all worn out from kissing Jeanne Crain today."

Bill would grin. "You've got no idea, Rena, what Jeanne and I go through in a love scene. It's the same thing over and over, and under those hot lights, too."

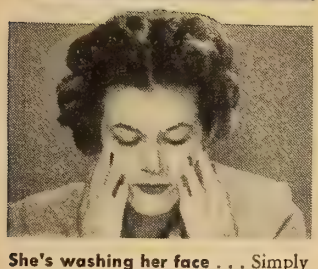
Then they'd both laugh and kiss and sit down to dinner.

The other night while dining with the Lundigans I asked Bill to sum up what the various women in his life had done for him.

"That's a great thing to ask in front of my wife," he said.

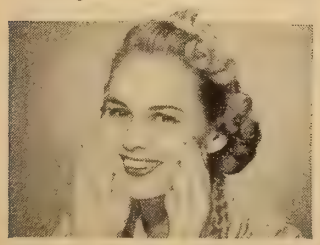
"Go ahead," Rena urged. "Tell us. I'd like to hear."

Lundigan gulped. All the women in his life, he explained, had been simply wonderful. Dorothy James had made him think about marriage like a man, not a boy. Deanna Durbin had taught him how to concentrate, Bette Davis how to relax. Hedy Lamarr had shown him that kindness was the one virtue fellow-workers in Hollywood valued the most. Susan Hayward had taught him how to control his temper, and June Haver had proven to him the purifying power of religion.



"How about your wife?" I asked.

Bill thought for a moment. "Rena's responsible for all our happiness," he said, "only I'm not going into details or she'll want me to increase her allowance." He leaned across the table and taking Rena's right hand, pressed it to his lips. Then smiling, "You know, other husbands come home from work and their wives offer to take off their shoes and get the footstool. My wife—well, I came home the other day worn to a frazzle—and she said, 'What's the matter, honey? Does Mitzi Gaynor hug too hard?"



Mrs. Lundigan laughed and looked at her handsome husband with her heart in her eyes—and it wasn't hard to see that this woman's love is the best of all the good things that women have given to Bill Lundigan.

(Continued from page 57) breaking her reverie. "Look down." They were scudding in close now and a dark green mountain was rising up to meet them. "Diamond Head," he smiled, "just like the postcards."

Seconds later Ann was wreathed with flowers. The orchestra was playing "Aloha." Then a young man from the Royal Hawaiian Hotel came and whisked her off to that most luxurious of all resorts, where she was deposited in a lanai fronted room that looked right over Waikiki Beach.

Hawaii! It was the end of March but already the Islands were bursting with spring. A soft shower fell regularly every day, soon chased away by the sun, and each day it made the green foliage greener, the tropical perfumes more intoxicating and the air more like champagne. "It's heaven," Ann thought.

Heaven lasted five wonderful weeks for Ann Blyth. By now, of course, she is back in Hollywood, with the hectic life of a Hollywood star again sweeping her busily along. But she's not the same Ann Blyth who climbed aboard the Clipper last spring. She was taut as a fiddle string then, and underweight, with little lines of tiredness etched around her eyes. Then she had made three pictures in a row—The World In His Arms, One Minute To Zero and Sally And Saint Anne—boom, boom, boom, like that. And, on the side, she had been engaged in so many personal appearances, benefits, camp shows and rallies—usually averaging two a week—that she never quite caught up with herself. She's at it again, now. And she's making The Student Prince with Mario Lanza, but there's a new zest and freshness about her, a new wellspring of energy to draw on. And she glows with a million memories of everything nice that can happen to a girl who makes a trip to a special paradise, where a dream she had dreamed all her young life finally came true. How it finally did, Ann doesn't exactly know to this day. Nobody's told her. So maybe it's time she knew that the whole thing was a deep, dark plot.

The conspirators weren't masked men in black capes, although their mission was to spirit Annie away. They were all very nice guys who are crazy about her, although they're all respectably hitched themselves. One was Al Rockett, a grandfather, who's made stars and guided their careers as a producer, and now, as an agent, in Hollywood for 38 years. He's handled Ann Blyth's fortunes ever since Watch On The Rhine, and he's been like a dad to her since she was 13. Another was Frank MacFadden, her publicity pop at Universal-International, who's had Ann under his wing ever since she's been on that lot. And the third plotter was her own genial, Celtic Uncle Pat, who with Aunt Cis, has handled the care and comfort of orphan Annie off and on throughout her girlhood, and with whom she's lived ever since her own mother died. They put their heads together because all were nursing the same worry. Annie was going on sheer will power, they agreed, having too many colds, working herself to a shadow. She needed a rest, a big change and a long vacation. She needed to relax and unwind and the place for that, Al advised, was Hawaii.

"They do say there's hibiscus as tall as trees over there," mused Aunt Cis.

"Everything's in Hawaii," confirmed Al, "including the Navy. Leave it to me. I'll tell her."

He had an ace up his sleeve, a very practical ace. When he had set Ann to make One Minute To Zero at RKO, Howard Hughes offered her a bonus—a vacation trip, all expenses paid, for Ann, Pat and Cis, wherever and whenever she'd like to go. Ann knew about this of course, but she hadn't gotten around to thinking about when or where, and probably never would. Al called her. "How'd you like to go to Hawaii?"

"Is there something there for me to do?" she asked innocently.

"Nothing at all," explained Al, "that's the point. I'm not making any deals for you. You're all through with Sally And Saint Anne, and Great Companions (she was lined up for that then) doesn't start for seven long weeks. Now's the time, or never."

"But I wanted to go to Korea," Ann objected.

"Korea later. But Hawaii now. I've made reservations. You leave next week, and Dolly and I leave with you—just to set things up and see that you meet people and have fun."

"But I can't possibly get ready in a week. I've got to shop. I've got. . ."

"I'll change the reservations, then," fibbed Al. "Make it two weeks from now." He didn't have to change them, of course. They were already made that way. Al knows Ann. But he had to set an iron-clad date, or he knew he'd never tear her away.

IT HAPPENED TO ME

I attended a rehearsal of "The Big Show" in London starring Tallulah Bankhead and while there was very surprised to see and hear George Sanders singing.

After the broadcast I asked him how long he'd been singing.

"Oh," he said, "I was singing in films 20 years ago and the reason I gave it up was because I'm really a bass and we always have to sing about fishes or ships or something like that . . . so I said 'I want love and kisses'!"

The two weeks flew by before she knew it. At last they were aboard the plane and winging away. Nine and a half hours—and they were there, just half a night on the big stratocruiser.

Busy as Ann was that first day, getting settled, there was plenty of time to slip into her new lavender bathing suit and run down to Waikiki's strand for a dip and a tingling ride on the outriggers. And time after that to primp luxuriously in her blue net evening gown while sun and sea were still reflected in her mirror. They would have dinner—Ann, Pat, Cis, Al and Dolly—out on the terrace, right over the waves. But "dinner" is entirely too stingy a word. This first dinner, like every meal to follow, was a feast.

First there was a fruit surprise, a bowl as big as the Davis Cup, it seemed to Ann, with every exotic fruit that grows, its heart a half-pineapple in a nest of spun sugar. Then came soup—a blend of every kind of seafood in the South Seas, artfully brewed with native herbs. Next Mahi-mahi, a native fish of sweetness and delicacy. The entree was plump squabs baked in fragrant leaves and wild rice. I won't go through all the rest of the courses until the baked Alaska topped with meringue birds and ringed by flowers. But Ann went through them, and what's more she cleaned her plate. How she could rise after that, light as a feather, to dance past midnight under the moon and stars with the salt spray kissing her cheeks, was a wonder .But that's what happened, and you can credit that to the U. S. Navy.

Because she'd hardly stepped on the floor with Al Rockett when a dark, handsome lieutenant in his tropical whites steered straight for Pat. "I wonder, Sir," he saluted, "if your daughter might dance with me?"

"Well, now," replied Pat expansively. "I'm not one for knowing that. But why don't you ask the girl when she gets back?" Which he did, and—lucky guy—the Navy is one of Ann's weaknesses. She joined the fleet pronto, or rather two fleets, because, besides Uncle Sam's gallants, there was an Australian cruiser in port on the way to Canada. Who won the battle for Blyth that night no one could say; possibly Annie herself, because she was whirled from uniform to uniform under the soft Hawaiian sky with guitars strumming, and two sweetheart-starved navies standing in line.

Ann went shopping, too, naturally. She bought flowered holomus and kimonos and a filmy evening dress, which Japanese girls sewed of tissue taffeta with gold figures, so gossamer sheer that the Waikiki breezes swirled it mischievously up to her waist when she danced on the terrace. She collected and wore sarongs of bright cotton prints. She stocked up on little hand-carved ivory jewelry and brilliantly patterned Hawaiian shirts for her friends back in Hollywood.

She took the trip around Oahu, of course, and flew over the gaping, volcanic craters on Big Hawaii, where the pilot dipped so close she had to shut her eyes from dizziness. She played golf at the Oahu Country Club and won four malted milks from two Catholic fathers who challenged her. She picnicked on the beach under Diamond Head and climbed to the Pali where King Kamehameha once shoved his enemies over an awesome cliff. She learned to hula "Little Brown Gal" and started on the intricate "Loving Hula Hands" under her patient teacher, Puanani.

The phone had started ringing the minute Ann and her party checked in at the Royal Hawaiian. Everyone wanted to give Ann parties, show her the sights, feast and fiesta her.

Then there were Pat and Barbara White, whose father is president of the Hawaiian Pineapple Company. Pat and Barbara run a gift shop right in the Royal Hawaiian and nothing would do but for Ann to come right out to the house for a party and later a tour of the pineapple and sugar cane plantations. And Wade Knapp, a young pal of Al's, took her, sarong and all, to the Ishii Gardens for a sukiyaki feast with chopsticks and shrimp tempura—a feast for the gods, as was the pit-roasted pig at the luau that Don the Beachcomber tossed one Sunday night. If you've never tasted roast pig, pineapple and papaya at Don's luaus, then you haven't lived. Whatever Ann did she revelled in—whatever she ate she loved madly, even poi and a sip of the fiery okolehau. If you can down these, they say, you're a real Kanaka.

Of course, all her vacation days weren't an unbroken round of festivity, although Ann, contrary to some Hollywood experts, can kick up her (Continued on page 86)

(Continued from page 84) heels when she's a mind to. But there's another side to her, a better known side, and she can't be anywhere long before that quality comes out. Vacationing or not, Ann truly likes to sing, and vacationing or not, too, her heart's always stretching out to spread its sunshine around. There were a lot of places she wanted to visit that weren't vacation spots by a long shot. Hawaii isn't all a tourist's dream. It's a big, bustling territory, almost a state by now, and it has historic shrines of deep import for every American.

Wade Knapp, an ex-FBI man, arranged to show her Pearl Harbor, and Commander Goode guided them around the giant naval installations, the docks, the gray guardian fleet, the historic landmarks of December 7, 1941. She walked aboard the U.S.S. Arizona, now a monument to the thousands of Pearl dead, with a plaque on its deck. As Ann saw these things, she felt, as any sensitive American girl would feel, the true meaning of the Hawaiian outpost.

But all things come to an end sometime, and finally came that sad-sweet Aloha day—a day you celebrate in Hawaii just as much as you do the day you arrive. The goodbyes were said, the thank-you's made, last minute errands done when Ann suddenly cried in dismay, "Why, I can't leave like this. I haven't sung for the hotel help!" She called Tommy Chambers and had a piano and a lot of food sent up. Ann sang for two hours, everybody got autographed pictures, and some got hugs and kisses. But when the party was over, Ann suffered another horrible thought: "We forgot the chambermaids, and the girls in the laundry." So they did it all over again!

Finally she was aboard the Lurline. Whistles blew, confetti snowed and streamers snapped as the big luxury liner edged away from the wharf. Half of Honolulu, it seemed, was down to wave goodbye.

For almost a week then there was nothing for Ann to do on the Lurline but rest up from her rest, sun on deck, play ping pong and keno, bet quarters on the "races," practice her hula steps and swim in the pool. But finally the familiar California Coast loomed up, and at last she was home.

Inside, the phone was already ringing insistently. Dick Clayton wanted to see Annie soonest. Jane Withers, June Haver, Betty Lynn, Ann's good pals, wanted to hear everything about her trip. And then Frank MacFadden saying, "Want to work? Got news for you. You're going into The Student Prince with Mario Lanza. What do you think about that?" Ann thought it was wonderful. "And then," announced Frank, "there's a trip to Alaska for the premiere of The World In His Arms, and of course you'll want to make all the Air Force and Army bases. Got six lined up so far. . . ." Of course. She was back home, all right.

So things haven't changed in Hollywood for Ann Blyth since her Hawaiian idyll. Nor has Annie herself changed, outside, so you'd notice it. But, within, it's a different story. Locked in her heart is a new love for a place where some lucky men live. She learned a song on the Islands—It's called "Heaven Is In Blue Hawaii," and that's just about how Ann feels. If you're hunting a paradise on earth, she'll tell you, Hawaii's the place. At least, that's where one girl, who dreamed of paradise years ago, finally looked and found hers. END

we fight, but we love it!

This sort of good-natured banter goes on all the time. It is carried off in an air of mock seriousness, but actually the Sinatras are teasing. It may come as a surprise to the gossip mongers, "but, honestly," Ava says, "we have a pretty good sense of humor between the two of us."

Ava and Frank know when their quarrels are petty and ridiculous. They know in their hearts what is important and what is not, and they have a realistic sense of values.

When Ava was playing in The Snows Of Kilimanjaro a few weeks back, she had a six o'clock call. In order to look half awake at 6:00 A.M., any actress needs a good night's rest. It so happened that the Sinatras had a date to eat out at Romanoff's that night. Before they left the house, Ava announced that she would leave the table at 9:30 P.M.

When 9:30 rolled around, Ava took off. Next day, the rumor was bandied all over town. Ava had walked out on her Frankie for the last time.

Ava has lived in Hollywood for more than a decade, and most rumors don't bother her, particularly such stuff as the above.

The one rumor that has annoyed her consistently, however, concerns Frank's children. Her face grows beet red and her eyes kindle with fire whenever anyone says, "I understand you and Frank's kids don't get along."

FRANK'S children visit the Sinatras periodically. They came down to Palm Springs to spend the weekend with Ava and Frank before the newlyweds took off for Honolulu. They played and swam and ate and picnicked and had a delightful time. The children are beautifully behaved. Nancy Sinatra has done a superb job in raising them. They're so well-mannered and polite, in fact, that even if they didn't like Ava, which doesn't happen to be the case, they'd never let her know.

Ava has said time and time again, "I only hope when it comes to raising my own children that I can do as good a job as Nancy Sinatra has."

When Ava and Frank have Frank's children with them, there's no strain, no big show, no anxiety. Sinatra has always been a wonderful father. His kids regard Ava as a friend who loves and respects them, and the last thing in the world Ava would do would be to destroy that impression.

Another thing. It's been said that Frank is and has been responsible for Ava's present relationship with her studio.

As you probably know, Ava was suspended for turning down a role in the film, Sombrero. "I'm sure it's going to be a great picture," Ava says, "only I just didn't happen to like the part that was offered me. My refusal to accept it was made on my own initiative. I've been suspended before for the same reason, and on each of these occasions my refusal had been motivated by my own judgment. Frank has nothing to do with scripts sent to me."

As regards their careers, the Sinatras travel separate paths. Stories to the effect that Frank exercises a Svengali-like effect on Ava are at variance with the truth.

The only time Frank will ever give his opinion of a script is when his wife asks him to. He never volunteers his opinion, which is a pretty shrewd one.

As Ava looks back on her months of marriage, she can honestly say that she and Frank haven't had one serious fight. All the spats have been minor and unimportant. Frank wanted to take a vacation in Mexico. Ava wanted to go to Spain, so they compromised and went to Hawaii where they had a wonderful time.

WHEN they returned to Los Angeles, the lease on their house had expired. Frank, a beach-lover from way back, suggested renting a house in Malibu. Ava voted for one away from the ocean and up in the hills. The words flew hot and heavy for a while, but the Sinatras now live in the hills.

Frank and Ava both have volatile natures. They don't believe in repression. If they get angry, they let off verbal steam. They never harbor long-term grudges.

At Mocambo a couple of weeks back a friend of theirs, June Hutton, was breaking in her act. Ava thought that one of June's songs was out of place.

Frank told Ava very nicely that she was all wet. After all, what he's forgotten about songs and singing, Ava will never learn. But you know how stubborn women can be. "I'm sorry, sweetie," Ava persisted. "I still think the song is wrong for Junie. The number isn't for her." So they had a discussion, whereupon everyone suddenly turned around and stared.

When Ava and Frank get along harmoniously, that's nothing. If they quarrel, it's a big scoop.

Ava and Frank quarrel. Make no mistake about that, but so does every other married couple. Only the Sinatra quarrels are about nothing vital, and Ava never lets them get to the point where they matter or become irritating.

SOME newlyweds go around kissing and cooing every three minutes. Not Frank and Ava. In their own hearts they're convinced that their marriage is a lasting proposition. And the reason they like to fight about the little things is that it gives them a chance for reconciliations which are worth all the rest.

But about the really important things in their lives, Ava and Frank have no indecision. They want children, and they want to raise them in California. Given the choice of motherhood or a career, Ava would prefer motherhood. Frank is the family breadwinner, but the big decisions are made together.

In the months to come there will be many more stories on the battling Sinatras, because Ava and Frank relish a good argument, whether they happen to be in a night club or the Yankee Stadium. Neither of them has ever studied for the Diplomatic Service, but that doesn't mean their marriage is headed for the rocks. It isn't. Right now it's invigorating, provocative, and stimulating.

Life with Frank can never be dull. He's a very desirable man, and Ava isn't exactly a wall-flower type. These two make an interesting, sparkling combination, perhaps even a unique one, because in a business which is basically neurotic, these two believe in giving vent to their feelings.

"It's true that we fight," Ava says, "but what those writers don't tell you in their stories is that we fight about nothing at all, and that we love it." END

smile when you say that

(Continued from page 29) is a minor perfectionist who has kidded himself into believing that he knows more about writing than writers, more about directing than directors, more about producing than producers.

"Let him come across a script sequence that makes no sense, and he yells his head off until it's changed. He fights with directors, and I know of one case where he even threatened to punch a producer in the nose.

"He's a handy man with his fists, and he doesn't mind throwing his weight around. He's about as diplomatic as a tornado, and he'll battle anyone if he thinks he's right."

HOLLYWOOD got its first inkling of the unique Granger character when MGM signed him to star in King Solomon's Mines, in 1949.

Granger read the script and immediately shocked all the executives by announcing in no uncertain terms that several scenes contained too many lines of dialogue for him. He wanted all his dialogue trimmed to the bone, preferring to be depicted as a man of action rather than a man of words.

For an actor to complain about having too many lines is unheard of in Hollywood, and almost overnight the word got out that Stewart Granger was cut from a different fabric than most British actors.

He certainly is.

When the studio portrait department doctored his photograph, taking all the wrinkles out of his face, Granger again hit the ceiling.

"You fellows have ruined me," he screamed. "You've made me look like a boy. It took me almost 40 years to get these lines in my face and no still retoucher is going to take them out!"

When King Solomon's Mines finally went into action in Africa, Granger, according to several members of the cast, was about as easy to direct as a boa constrictor.

"He played the part of a white hunter," one actor recalls, "and since he'd been big-game hunting before, he became the authority on practically everything. He griped because they wouldn't let him use real bullets. He wanted the elephants to drop dead right in front of the camera. When the directors told him that he'd have to fire blank cartridges, he was furious. On the level. He screamed that blank cartridges would make his part seem phony since there's no recoil from a gun when you shoot blanks.

"As you probably know, things became so hectic during the shooting of Mines that we had to change directors. Granger and Compton Bennett, the original director, got along like Franchot Tone and Barbara Payton. Granger was told not to go hunting, that he was too valuable a piece of property. But Granger, who is absolutely fearless, went stalking water buffalo. He came back with two broken ribs. Of course, if you give him his own way about everything, he's a wonderful guy."

When Granger was making The Light Touch, again in Africa, he suggested to the director that he be allowed to start a fight with a cameraman in order to divert a crowd of native Tunisians who were lousing up the scene. The director convinced Granger that other members of the crew, who weren't as valuable and necessary for the completion of the picture, should be permitted this hilarious diversion. Granger was crushed. He relishes rough physical contact.

During the filming of The Wild North, he refused to have doubles substitute for him in any of the fight scenes, and he simply hated to pull any of his punches.

Before this particular picture got underway, there was a good deal of discussion as to whether Granger should play the leading role with a French Canadian accent or his own. There was some doubt in the MGM command as to whether the Englishman could get away with a Canuck accent. The arguments waxed wild and woolly, with Granger accusing various executives of double-crossing him. The debate reached its climax one day when Granger offered to take an executive outside and bash his head in.

An Englishman who knows Granger well says, "I've always had the feeling that Jimmy behaves the way he does because secretly he's ashamed of being an actor. Here he is a big, burly fellow, and he makes his living reciting lines in front of a camera.

"When he was a boy he looked upon actors as sissies, and the only reason he went to work in a motion picture studio was to meet beautiful young women.

"During the War when he was with the Black Watch, he was invalided out with a stomach ulcer, so that he's never really found the occupation to fit his wonderful physique, except on the screen. In his American movies he always plays the strong man, King Solomon's Mines, The Wild North, Scaramouche, The Prisoner Of Zenda—these are all blood and thunder stories calling for a man with primarily physical attributes.

"Jimmy likes to show that he's nobody's fool, that he's more than just a photogenic body, that he's got a good mind, too. That's why he's quick to voice his opinion which he considers eminently reasonable. It frequently is, but it also frequently hurts and antagonizes many people."

Not too long ago, one director became irritated at Granger's constant suggestions on how to direct his picture. "I'll tell you what, Jimmy," he said. "Let me direct this one. You can direct the sequel."

Granger himself says that he possesses a really "filthy bad temper. I'm no good," he adds, "sitting in a corner, sucking my thumb when people are trying to do me in. I believe in speaking out." As for his working habits, he says, "It just kills me when I see something obviously wrong in a scene. It doesn't make any difference whether I'm in the scene or not. I've got to tell the director about it. It's just that I hate to see anything spoiled by stupidity and bad taste."

Acquaintances of Granger say he sees no point in being well-liked if he has to adopt traits at variance with his basic character.

On one occasion, for example, he walked up to Deborah Kerr and said, "Everybody likes you. But tell me, why do you want to be liked?"

The actress was momentarily flabbergasted. "Because," she said, "it's better than being disliked. Isn't it, Jimmy?" Granger shrugged.

Naturally, his attitude isn't conducive to making many friends. He has relatively few, his closest being Elizabeth Taylor's husband, Michael Wilding, whom he met 19 years ago at the British International Studios in Elstree, England.

Wilding says, "My meeting with Jimmy was quite by accident. I'd just come back from studying art in Brussels, and I had in mind a job of painting scenery at the studio. There was one hitch. I had no architectural training, so I took a job as an extra, hoping that I'd learn exactly how they built sets. I was handed a powder puff and some makeup and left standing, feeling awfully silly.

"Just then I saw a big guy standing next to me, patting his face with a powder puff and looking even more incongruous than I. Six-feet-three, rugged, with a powder puff! It turned out his name was Jimmy Stewart."

The two young extras became close friends. They played poker together, dated together, and when they earned some money, bought a yacht. Granger taught Wilding how to sail and hunt, and Wilding became god-father to Granger's first-born, Jamie, who is now eight. Wilding flew to America when Granger and Jean Simmons both agreed that he would make a fine best man at their wedding.

Wilding is of the opinion that Granger has calmed down a bit since his youth. "He's a little quieter now," he says, "but he still has the courage to say what he means. He has a stubborn streak, but he's every inch a man."

GRANGER'S forthright manner, his lack of diplomacy, has given rise to the rumor that his marriage to Jean Simmons is foundering. The gossips insist that Jean can't stand up under his constant barrage of instruction and biting criticism.

This is ridiculous. Jean is not an American girl, with an American girl's outlook on marriage.

She has always worshipped and respected Jimmy, and the simple truth is that, despite his brusqueness, he is at heart a kind and generous husband. Jean expects to play second fiddle to her Jimmy because he is wiser, older, more experienced than she. Realizing this, she accepts him with all his faults.

They are passionately in love, and stories to the opposite send Granger into bursts of unprintable adjectives.

He cannot understand, for example, why each time he goes fishing without Jean, who doesn't particularly like to fish, some columnist has to carry a report that the Stewart Grangers are separating. He also cannot understand all those stories which describe him and Jean as financially embarrassed, or "in too deep." Their combined salary is $7,000 a week, about ten times what they earned in England.

"It is just stupid, outright nonsense," he declares. "These ridiculous gossip items."

Don't think for a minute that Granger is without his army of supporters in Hollywood. Even a director can be found who will say nice words about him. Andrew Marton, the man behind The Wild North, says, "Many people are convinced that Granger is a big, outspoken ham. I don't think so. My opinion is that he's an intelligent actor who constantly strives for perfection. In the striving, he sometimes rubs people the wrong way.

"He does things that most actors would never think of doing. In King Solomon's Mines, for example, he learned some esoteric native dialect because he didn't want to be accused of inaccuracy. He's a stickler for minor flaws, but at least he's wholeheartedly interested in every picture he makes. Many actors don't give a darn. Not Granger."

Sam Zimbalist is another Granger supporter. "Maybe he won't win any popularity contests in the industry," the famous MGM producer concedes, "but Granger is a man of intelligence and integrity, and that's a pretty rare combination these days. A man who stands up and speaks his piece is to be admired."

One of the reasons Granger is referred to as a "ham" is that he likes to posture and romanticize himself. After returning from a safari in Africa last year, he was interviewed by a reporter whom he told of his narrow escape from death when a wounded water buffalo charged him. "I guess," he said fatalistically, "I'm destined to die in Africa." And a far away look came into his eyes as if he were dreaming of those unforgettable days in Kenya.

The reporter was duly impressed until a director said, "Don't take him seriously. He's been destined to die in every country he's visited."

Recently, a newsman asked a top MGM executive if at this point in his life there was any possibility of Stewart Granger mellowing into a more tractable, sweet-natured character.

The executive shook his head. "Why should he change?" he asked. "By behaving in his own way, he's managed to wind up with stardom, a mansion, a yacht, $4,000 a week, and Jean Simmons."

Under the circumstances, would anyone change?

"sometimes I'm happy . . ."

(Continued from page 35) think about the scene I'm doing. And after a 'take' I think about the way I should have done it and get sore at myself. That's why, I guess, people have called me moody."

Now this all sounds like an actor with a ruthless driving ambition. This sounds like a Shelley Winters. Shelley was determined she was going to do the role in A Place In The Sun. When it was suggested to the powers in charge, their unanimous attitude was, "Shelley Winters? That hot-cha, sex boat playing that drab factory girl? Are you kidding?" But Shelley kept after that part. And she got it and she was great. But this is not Farley's way.

So what is more important to an actor than a career? Marriage? Well, ask Farley if he plans to marry. Ask him if he sees marriage as part of his future. He hesitates. He thinks for a moment. Then he says, "Yes, I think about getting married. Settling down. Having a house and children, but what people seem to forget when they ask if your future plans include marriage is that the desire for marriage has to have the impetus of someone who can propel you into feeling that way. If you're not interested in anyone that way then it's all just supposition, isn't it?"

BEFORE THE BREAK-UP

As I was wandering through Macy's furniture display one day, I noticed a very attractive blonde sitting on one of the sofas, leafing through a magazine. She looked vaguely familiar, and I was almost on the point of speaking to her when a handsome suntanned man came striding up to her, pitched imaginary water over her from a display pitcher, and called out in a rich, teasing voice: "Come on, Shell—let's go to lunch." As he pulled her to her feet and they started away, suddenly the identity of the striking pair dawned on me—they were no less than Shelley Winters and Farley Granger!

But insist that he tell you what he wants from this in-the-future, this sometime marriage. And listen to him. He says, "I want all the old cornball stuff. The little cottage with the fence around it. I want 'the little woman.' Not the big career woman. I don't believe I could adjust my life to a woman with the big drive toward the career. But I'd want my marriage to be the most important thing in my life, and I'd want the person I married to think so, too."

Now all this may change, for Farley is a boy who goes through many phases. He will feel very social for a time and go to a lot of parties. Then, suddenly, he'll say to himself, "I've had it," and he won't accept an invitation for weeks.

Introspectively he says, "I think I have a knowledge of myself, of my capacities as well as of my weaknesses. I used to feel so insecure and inadequate. When I was younger I was in a constant state of wanting to be successful and wanting to learn about everything. Why, I wanted to know and to learn so much that I'd be reading three books at one time. That was until a friend told me, 'Relax a little, boy. You're young enough to have time to learn so there's no hurry and you're too old to be a child prodigy.'"

But, during this phase the most important thing he learned was, "I can't please everybody as a person or as a performer. Some people think I'm wonderful. Some people think I'm a stuck-up jerk. Some people think I can act. Some people think I can't. But I refuse to submerge my personality into being a sweet goody-goody just to have people like me."

And Farley is annoyed—and so rightly—when he hears that people have said, "Farley isn't the same nice kid he was when he got his first break in pictures." He says, "I was 17, then. Naturally I've changed. Nothing stands still. You have to change and develop. It's like marriage. A man and a woman are madly in love. They marry. They start to make a life together and their relationship changes. It may be for the better. It may be for the worse. But it changes. The good marriage becomes richer. The man and wife change attitudes toward each other. And this is right. And if I were the same 'nice kid' I was when I was 17, now that I'm 26, I'd be an idiot. And I don't believe I'm an idiot."

Ask him how he feels about success and what he has learned from it. He'll tell you, "Success depends on what you do with it, and I think it is basically more interesting to make a career out of being a human being than out of being an actor. I've watched the people who drive hard for material success. They're always waiting for the day when they're acclaimed. They think success is like a movie when it says 'The End.' That success is the end-all, be-all. They think success is like the marriage story where the couple lives 'happily ever after.' Then these people become successful. They are acclaimed and they're just as mixed up and confused as they were before."

When Farley came to this realization he was determined that he was not going to be mixed up and confused after success had come to him. And he wondered what he needed to make himself a success as a human being.

He had always been interested in painting—he can sketch and draw quite well, as a matter of fact—so the discovery of art—and later of music—were not big steps but were exciting ones.

Books had always been a part of his life, but as he matured he found new meaning in what he read. The world of literature was a big and beautiful world, too. But still there was something lacking. He decided to go to Europe.

He had always wanted to travel. Although he had done a stretch in the Navy in World War II, he didn't exactly see the world. Besides, the Navy had caught him at a bad time psychologically. It was just after he had made his first film, North Star. He had thought, like so many young men, that here he was on his way, heading up with a good contract, great potentials. And what happens? There's a war. But now the war was over. He had become a great movie idol. He could afford to see the world.

There was a big hue and cry about Farley's spending so much time in Europe. It was said he hated Hollywood. "I don't hate Hollywood," he says. "I love it. But I know that in order to keep your values straight you have to get away from it to discover that other people are working and doing important things, that other people are thinking, and that making movies is not the only thing that is important."

Farley's parents are typical middle class Americans. They are older than most parents of a 26-year-old offspring, but that's the only way they differ from the average. Farley's mother is a big, good-hearted woman who loves to cook. Farley's father helps his son with his work. In this case it means helping Farley open and answer his fan mail. So what is the pull toward Europe for this boy who comes from such typical American stock?

Farley finds it "exciting to be in a foreign place where the culture and the attitudes are different." Farley believes that relationships should be kept straight—that some people can be your friends, some people nice acquaintances and some people more important on the romantic side. "You don't want to marry every girl you meet," he says. And he hates being made to feel that he is an eligible bachelor. "Europeans," he has found, "are mature about romance. Because theirs is an older culture, they know how to keep relationships straight."

One of the phases that Farley went through was his constantly moving from apartment to apartment. This was partly a practical measure. If he knew he was going to be in Europe for a certain length of time, he did not want to pay rent on a place. So he would give it up and find another apartment upon his return. But, since some of his apartments were less than perfect, he was, as he says, "Always at someone's place, because I wasn't comfortable at my own. But now I want to build a house. I've accumulated lots of records and some good paintings. I'd like to have a place for them. I never thought I'd want the responsibility of a house but now I do."

Farley likes to argue. Just out of sheer perversity he will take the opposite side from the one in which he believes, and he will support it until he discovers that he is, actually, saying exactly what his opponent is saying.

To understand what has made Farley as he is, as of this minute, let's go way back to his earliest memory—when his family was living in San Jose. He was riding his tricycle on the pavement and he fell off and scraped his knees. All he remembers is the falling off, the bleeding knees. He has been told that five minutes later he was back on his tricycle, happy as a bird. He only remembers the tragedy.

Ask him if he is happy now and he will tell you yes, he is happy. He will mean it, too. But, partly because he is older now and partly because he knows that success is not "The End," he will never again know the sublime happiness he knew when Samuel Goldwyn gave him a contract and his first role in North Star. That was when he thought that to be a movie actor was to be a king.

Then he was the eager beaver. Then he was the kid who had to make good. Then he wanted to be the greatest actor in the world.

Joan Evans has an unforgettable memory of him when they were together on a personal appearance tour. For publicity purposes the two young people rode a fire engine through the streets of New Orleans. The wail of the sirens drowned out their voices, but if you happened to see them and wondered why Joan was doubled over with laughter, here's the reason. Farley, atop the roaring truck, exhorted the crowds, who could not hear him, like a phony evangelist. "I was a miserable sinner like you once myself," he shouted to the swooning bobby soxers who waved happily to their idol.

His imitations of famous movie personalities are very funny. But he only goes into this act with people he knows well and, as he says, "I have many acquaintances, many people I like but only a few real friends." His imitations are not malicious, but they are very accurate and indicate that he would make a fine light comedian. Yet his screen comedy is not perfected. He is much better when he plays intense, dramatic roles.

When he discovered that just being a movie star was not enough, when the desire for culture overtook him as it does so many eager young people, he sought and found a group who put music and art and literature and travel above movie stardom. And that, goodness knows, was healthy. But these people tried to teach Farley something that was not in in his original character. They tried to teach him scorn—scorn for the typical, scorn for the average. And scorn is something that Farley should not learn or even try to learn.

Anybody can be a movie star; even Lassie.

Robert Mitchum

No matter what he says to the contrary, he is moody. And this is because he is always at war with himself. For example, he will say, "I don't understand publicity people. They're always asking me, 'What's new? What's exciting?' And I'll tell them, 'Well, I left the set. I went home. I took off my makeup. I had dinner. I went to bed. I woke up. I am here on the set of Hans Christian Andersen. So what?'" But explain to him that in order to publicize the films in which he stars they must have their "new" and "exciting" stories, and his eyes become warm and sympathetic. "I know," he says. "I'm wrong. It's their job."

He can be deeply touched when he allows himself to be. He can also be most charming. But when he tries to be cagey and secretive—well, on him it doesn't look good. For Farley started out to be all emotion. He has learned to be intelligent. And that's what I mean when I say he is at war with himself. His natural feelings are often at odds with his acquired intelligence. And that's why it's hard to believe him when he says he is happy.

Farley thinks he knows himself. He thinks he knows what he wants. It is difficult to know what you really want when you're only 26 years old.

And you know what I believe? I think Farley could become not just "a good actor"—he is that already—but a great actor. I think he could become a fine artist, but before that happens he must have a kind of emotional security which he does not have now. He thinks he is being realistic when he says, "I believe I'm right to turn down pictures that seem wrong to me and go on suspension instead of making bad films. I'd rather make a couple of good pictures a year than to appear in every movie that's offered me just to see myself on the screen." That, indeed, is realistic, provided his judgment of the films he accepts is sound. But his idea of marriage—the little woman and the vine-covered cottage—well, that is far from being realistic.

When Farley matures, then he will not only be a completely realistic human being, he will be a great artist. Talent he has—enormous talent—and he can be great if he will let himself. END

On the set, she exhausts the crew, clowning about, giving imitations of everyone, alternately twitching one eyebrow, then the other, talking with excitable gestures. But she can turn this off like the click of a light switch, as she looks you full in the eyes, and talks about "My Richard," to whom she is "engaged to be engaged." The change is so startling you can almost see the moonlight, smell the magnolias, hear the dreamy music.

NAIVE, artless as a country schoolgirl, Mitzi tells of that June night in 1947 when she first saw Richard Coyle. She was almost 17, dancing in Naughty Marietta at the Los Angles Civic Light Opera. All at once, on her way to her dressing room, she looked up and there he was—a tall, distinguished, black-eyed young man, talking with comedian Edward Everett Horton, star of the show. "My heart stood still," Mitzi exclaims as though she were the first woman to fall in love in all the world. "I didn't know who he was; I didn't even know if he were married; I only knew I just had to meet that man."

It took a bit of doing. Horton, as a gag, refused to introduce her. But Mitzi ferreted out the information that Richard was a fraternity brother of Horton's, had just graduated from Northwestern University's Law School and was on vacation. The next night he was there again. "He looked at me and looked at me," Mitzi remembers soulfully, "but I guess he was just too well-mannered to start talking without an introduction. Show people are so casual and so cynical; this was a man with real dignity and poise and the impression he made on me was terrific. I was holding a chocolate mint, and on impulse asked him if he'd like one. Then I wished the floor would open and swallow me, because I saw that I'd already taken a bite out of it and the remains were smeared with lipstick."

Disregarding his close brush with lipstick poisoning, Richard wangled her phone number from Horton, called Mitzi the next day and asked: "Do you remember me?"

"Do I remember you?" shrilled Mitzi. She decided then and there that they were going "steady." Later Richard confessed that on their first date he knew she was the girl he'd marry. "It's corny, isn't it, to believe in love at first sight?" asks Mitzi, a bit breathlessly. "But with me it's true, anyway."

From an orchestra seat Richard watched Mitzi pirouetting in her ballet numbers every night. On one of those nights another man watched her with just as much interest but of another kind. He was producer George Jessel. "Most exciting girl to hit filmtown since California discovered the orange—dances like a dream, sparkles like champagne," said Jessel. He asked her to come out to 20th Century-Fox for a test.

Her eyelashes fluttering over her exotically slanted hazel eyes, Mitzi twinkles, "I picked 'I'm In Love With A Wonderful Guy' for my test song. How could I lose?"

And when on her seventeenth birthday Richard drove her to the beach and gave her a friendship ring—a wide gold band beautifully engraved in arrow points inside and out—Mitzie rushed to her mother to blurt out the news: "We want to get married right away."

Yet, Mitzi and Richard haven't married, though five Junes have come and gone. Who could have dissuaded this small-size tornado and the "so-in-love" Richard to wait a while. It was Mitzi's mother. When you first meet her you are instantly aware of the great contrast between blonde, feminine, retiring Mrs. Pauline Gerber and her only child.

"I'm Viennese and I write poetry," explained Mrs. Gerber, "and so I'm naturally romantic. When Mitzi, at 17, came in, overflowing with love's young dream, it was hard to be coldly practical. Particularly when I was so impressed with Richard. But I did what any mother in the same circumstances would do—suggested, but did not insist, that she wait until she was 21 before marrying. Mitzi has been a professional since she was eight. She didn't have time for many dates; didn't fall in and out of love like most adolescents though she met lots of boys. So I knew that she was really serious about her romance. She stormed about the room—but only for a little while."

Quietly, Mrs. Gerber marshalled her facts. Shirley Temple's marriage was breaking up at the time, and Mitzi was told that she had made a hasty marriage at 17. Both Mitzi and Richard were just embarking on very difficult careers that would require all their energies. Would it be fair to add marriage to that, even though they were so radiantly in love?

"You've spent years studying for the stage," Mrs. Gerber continued, "and if you marry now you'll give it up. And be frustrated after the first excitement of marriage wears off. I gave up my dancing career when I married but I lived it again in your talent. What if you have children who aren't talented and your hopes and dreams die before you get a chance to realize them? You'll live in some little suburban house, washing dishes, gossiping with the neighbors, playing bridge—"

"That does it," said Mitzi, who can't sit still and had been pacing up and down like a tiger. "I hate bridge. Richard and I will wait. He's got his law; I've got pictures to concentrate on. One thing at a time."

ONCE Mitzi's decision about postponing marriage was out of the way, everything was perfect: even the long hours of rehearsal, the earlybird rising, the time-consuming wardrobe fittings, because she knew, come evening, Richard would be waiting.

And then the blow fell. Richard, working in an insurance office during the day, was attempting to study for the California State bar exams. But with the distracting Mitzi about, it was hard to concentrate on dry "whereas's" and "parties of the third part." Richard decided to return to Chicago, where a better-paying job was awaiting him and to study for his exams at night. He'd only come to Hollywood for a vacation and most of his law books were still at home.

Mitzi, like any love-struck Juliet, was aghast. She began to pace the living room floor. "If you really loved me, you'd send for your law books and study here." But Richard knew better, and he went back to Chicago.

"You know," admits Mitzi, "that decision of Richard's was a tough one to make, and it showed me how really mature he was. I loved him more than ever. And I didn't have a date all the months he was gone. In fact, I've never had a date with another man since I gave Richard that lipsticky mint."

In this respect Mitzi is unique in the charmed circle of Filmville glamor dolls. In fact, having only one beau for any length of time is really something in Hollywood where most glitter queens of Mitzi's age go from beau to beau so fast that they pass up last week's date with a dumb stare.

But this unique trait is not the least bit amazing to Mitzi's mother. She says, "Mitzi as a little girl was a squirmer. She couldn't sit still in school or at the movies. When she was seven the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo came to Detroit, and I took her to see it. She sat through the whole performance watching in wonder the greatest names in ballet—Slavenska, Danilov, Markova. She never forgot it nor the costume she wore, a darling flared camel's hair coat with beaver collar and a brown sailor hat with long streamers. She thought she was the most elegant person in the theatre.

"When we came to Los Angeles high in hope but low in money it was hard to find a place to live and Mitzi's reception, like that of thousands of young dancers, was discouraging. But she herself was never discouraged and never stopped the daily practice and lessons. And when someone suggested the USO shows, Mitzi jumped into them with her usual energy. She started at 12, mostly at children's shows where the other little ballerinas, like not-too-interested kids, would scatter and play around. Mitzi, ever the manager, would round them up, loudly call out the beat, and generally take charge. It made the other mothers furious, but Mitzi never could understand why, because dancing was her life.

FOR Mitzi, beneath the clowning, the sassiness and the bounce is a one-career gal in the same way that she's a one-man gal. She leaves the Sunset Strip night club circuit to the lovelies who confuse publicity with talent. "Richard and I," she explains, "don't drink and we don't find it fun to sit watching others who don't wear their Martinis too well. Besides, we can't afford it. Richard is junior partner in his law firm. His aim is to be a lawyer in the best sense of the term—one learned in law."

To the $64 question—"Will you be married on your birthday?" Mitzi answers with a deep and dreamy sigh: "It would be wonderful to marry on my birthday, September 4th, but it just won't be possible."

If you point out to Miss Gaynor that she said she'd marry when she reached her twenty-first birthday, she has an answer ready. "I never said Richard and I would be married at 12:01 A.M. on the moment I became 21. I said sometime after that date. While no actual time has been set, we think it will be in the spring. Unfortunately, though, I start rehearsals July 14th for the Los Angeles Civic Light Opera's production of Jollyanna. Three weeks later we open in San Francisco and on September 8th we have our local premiere. Then there's talk of a three months' road show with a New York opening. So it looks like early next spring before we hear the strains of Lohengrin."

WHILE it's true that Dan Cupid is notoriously unreliable about his future predictions, it's pretty safe to say that guests can hold off buying wedding gifts for Mitzi Gaynor and Richard Coyle until after Christmas.

Since Mitzi said at 17, "We want to get married right away," she's learned that in show business no one is a free agent and that the serious performer puts career demands first. For instance, Mitzi finished her final scene in The I Don't Care Girl at 7:30 one night, had a luxurious vacation until 10:30 the following morning when she started Bloodhounds Of Broadway, her newest picture. And the same frantic schedule will be followed between it and rehearsals for Jollyanna.

The longed-for marriage which Mitzi has planned and dreamed of for so many years is just too important for her to chance any stumbling blocks now. With the exhaustion, frayed nerves, first-night stomach that comes with opening in a new stage play, with no time for the romantic dalliance of a honeymoon, with too many hours spent away from Richard, Mitzi knows that she'd endanger this most important undertaking of her life. And so does Richard. Perfectionists in their feeling about wedded life, they've waited this long. They hope to save up more money so that Richard can provide for his mother and Mitzi for her mother. For they plan to start life alone in the honeymoon house they're still searching for.

And after all, Mitzi will only be 21 and a half when they play "Here Comes The Bride" next spring. Hardly an old maid!

Mitzi doesn't think an engagement as long as hers is the best idea for most girls—but then most girls don't make six films in a few years and most fiances are not starting legal careers from scratch. But she is definitely against elopements. For herself she insists on a properly planned wedding in church, with white satin, champagne toasts, towering cake and a honeymoon. Preferably in Paris. Richard votes for Bermuda. Having spent four years in the Navy, he's been everywhere and they argue—gently—about the honeymoon locale.

They argue about little else. For the brilliant, scholarly, conservatively-dressed lawyer has a steadying effect on the impatient, unpredictable, but never impractical Mitzi. Though she isn't a student or a reader, she has enormous respect for one who is. And for his part, Richard is charmed by her electric excitement, her genius for friendship (everyone Mitzi meets is soon either an uncle, an aunt or at least a cousin) and her very real dedication to her career.

"Richard," laughs Mitzi, "tries to hold me down a little, but he doesn't succeed. When he heard that the studio was giving me a coach to study with so that I could learn to 'project my personality,' he was flabbergasted. 'Ye Gods,' he said, 'a girl who'd consider going to see Darryl Zanuck barefooted when she's trying out for a South Seas role doesn't need that. Instead you should have a coach to teach you to put your personality under wraps by tying your hands behind your back or taping your eyebrows.' Maybe I am a little too energetic. It's the Hungarian in me. From my father's side. I'm always raising such a ruckus. But Richard is so quiet that sometimes I call him 'Poor Richard.'"

When Mitzi isn't raising a ruckus, she and Richard spend endless dreamy hours discussing the home they're saving for—an English house with fine mahogany, gay with chintz. Mitzi has her silver—but the trousseau which she has visualized so often and so vividly—will have to wait.

Fun for them is hours of talking about his work, her days at the studio, long drives, canasta sessions (at which he doles out three nougats a week to the candy-loving but figure-conscious Mitzi). She cajoles Richard into attending every ballet performance and they double date with a lawyer friend and his wife. Also, they both passionately adore the movies and so do Richard's mother and Mrs. Gerber.

"Two or three times a week," says Mitzi, "Mother will say she's been in the house cleaning all day and she'd like to see something beside the four walls. Richard's mother tells him the same thing, so we all go to a movie. They won't sit with us because we like the loges at the back. They're afraid they'll miss something on the screen unless they sit way down front."

Planting flower seeds in her hillside garden is another of Mitzi's excitements. Like a Biblical character Mitzi strides about, tossing seeds over her shoulder. Richard, shaking his head at her seed-sowing, methodically prepares the soil, measures each row with a ruler, carefully plants the seeds.

"And what do you know," grins Mitzi. "His seeds come up. Mine don't. He offered to teach me how to plant seeds next year. But I think it's more fun my way. Richard, though, is teaching me how to swim and to play tennis. I've never had time for sports before."

She has taken time, though—five lovely long years of it—to be a one-man gal and her "Poor Richard" is mighty happy she took it.

Since her marriage to Tony a year ago, for example, Janet has gone from one picture into another—from Angels In The Outfield to Just This Once to Fearless Fagan to Scaramouche to Naked Spur, and the simple truth is that she and Tony have spent more time away from than with each other.

Tony's studio believes in sending its stars out to make personal appearances as part of the film's publicity. In order to promote Flesh And Fury and No Room For The Groom, his last two pictures, Tony, in the past six months, has winged to New Orleans, Dallas, St. Louis, Chicago, and most of the major cities throughout the country.

Tony got so lonely for Janet a few months ago when he was in Milwaukee that he grabbed the phone, long-distanced her in Los Angeles, and told her that he just couldn't go on without her. She flew to his side in Milwaukee, where she stayed for all of two days.

When she returned to Hollywood, the studio told her that she would have to leave immediately for Durango, Colorado, to star opposite Jimmy Stewart in Naked Spur. When Tony heard about that, he blew his top.

"What's the point in being married," he asked, "if we're always separated?"

Tony felt so strongly about this that he was willing to take a suspension from his studio in order to join Janet in Durango.

The demands of stardom have prevented Tony and Janet from leading the normal life of newlyweds, and Janet is thinking very strongly these days of temporarily relinquishing her stardom and settling down to being just plain Mrs. Tony Curts.

Janet wants a baby very much and feels that if she's going to raise a family, she'll have to take life easier, even though it may mean sacrificing her career.

"Don't get me wrong," she says. "I think being a motion picture actress is the most wonderful thing that can ever happen to any girl. It's exciting, rewarding, stimulating; it's everything a girl can want in the way of a career, only a career isn't a girl's whole life. At least, it isn't mine. I'm a normal girl with normal instincts, and I want a family and home life and all that goes with it. Believe me, love on the run isn't much fun at all."

THERE'S a great streak of domesticity in Janet's makeup. She loves to cook and putter around the house and re-arrange Tony's clothes, but ever since their marriage, domesticity has been conspicuous by its absence.

When Janet is working, which is all the time, she's up by seven. She dresses quickly, gulps down a quick cup of coffee, tiptoes into the bedroom where Tony is fast asleep, kisses him on the cheek, and tiptoes out.

When both of them have an early morning call, there's a mad dash for the coffee and then a sprint to the garage for the cars.

"It sounds strange," Tony says, "but Janet and I have had more time together away from home than at home. Howard Duff loaned us his beach house, you know, after our wedding. Then we took a trip to Europe; then there was this junket to Durango. The only time we seem to get together for more than a few days is when we're out of town."

A Hollywood playboy is a guy who acts like a young colt but looks like an old 45.

Janet loves making motion pictures, and she has never once been known to complain about anything, but it is an undeniable fact that for years now she has been MGM's hardest-working actress. She never balks about parts. She always turns in a competent performance; everyone likes to work with her, and directors are always requesting her. As a result, the poor kid gets less time off between movies than any other actress on the lot.

"One thing can save me," Janet says humorously, "and that's a baby."

Having a baby is the one sure way of being given time off by the studio. Esther Williams, Jane Powell, Cyd Charisse, June Allyson and Deborah Kerr all managed to pull the trick at MGM, and Janet feels she should be able to manage the same way to get a vacation.

She wants a vacation the same time Tony gets one, but no one knows when Tony will be given time off. He's very hot with the fans these days, and since his salary is $650 a week, a relatively low stipend for a star with his box office power, the studio is throwing him into as many films as possible.

ODDLY enough, Tony isn't nearly as impatient as Janet about raising a family.

"It'll come in time," he says. "I love kids and want a flock of them, but what's the point in rushing? Right now I'm feeling my way. My father's been ill and he can't work. This means I've gotta contribute a few bucks to the family.

"If Janet becomes pregnant, we'll have to move out of the apartment and probably find a house. More dough. Like I said, I'm just feeling my way. Janet, she's a full-fledged star. You know she's made about 20 pictures in five years. She's tired, really worn out. I guess she figures that compared to acting, housework would be a cinch.

Although one year of marriage hasn't provided Janet and Tony with an heir, it certainly has worked wonders on their respective personalities.

When they both arrived in Hollywood they were two scared kids. They wanted desperately to be liked, desperately to succeed.

I remember when Janet was signed by MGM for $43.70 a week to play in The Romance Of Rosy Ridge.

She was beside herself with happiness until the studio told her that she would have to go away on location for three months. When Janet heard that, her eyes grew watery, and tears started to dribble down her cheeks. "I'm terribly grateful for the wonderful break," she whimpered. "But golly! I can't afford to live at a hotel for three months."

Her agent was struck dumb. "You're kidding?" he said in bewilderment.

"I'm serious," Janet said.

The agent shook his head. "Now," he asserted, "I've heard everything. Don't you know that when a studio sends you anywhere they pay all the expenses?"

That will give you some small idea of how unknowing, how innocent and naive Janet used to be. Like all small-town girls who have had very little of the material comforts of life, she used to live in a state of childlike wonder, much to the amazement of jaded Hollywood veterans.

Each time Janet fluffed a line while she was making a picture, she'd turn to the entire cast and say over and over again, "Golly, I'm sorry. Golly! I'm sorry."

These apologies so embarrassed the rest of the cast that they made Janet deposit a penny in a tin can each time she said, "Golly, I'm sorry." By the end of the week, the can was full.

TODAY, after five years in Hollywood, Janet manifests none of the insecurity which characterized her behavior pattern and motivated her actions for four years.

By having a husband who loves her completely not as an actress but as a woman, she now feels the equal of all women.

Let her career go up in smoke, let MGM fire her tomorrow, let television triumph over cinema, there never again will be for her the anxiety, the loneliness and the fear. She will always have Tony. "And having Tony," she says sublimely, "is really the fulfillment of all my love."

When Janet has a few minutes off between "takes," she usually phones Tony at home or at Universal, and always the conversation winds up with "I love you, I love you, I love you."

As for Tony, Janet's love has transformed him from boy to man.

When he first hit Hollywood, he, too, was bedeviled by an overwhelming inferiority complex. He hadn't spoken English until the age of eight, and the tone of his speech was a lilting wail. Many of the sophisticates regarded him as nothing more than another Dead-End kid, and while he was visibly without polish and the butt of many studio jokes, he took them all like a man with a sense of humor that was really admirable.

Farley Granger was the bobby-soxers' delight when Tony first arrived in filmland, and when these two met at parties, it was always Farley who had the air of a world traveler. The teen-agers thought he was simply adorable and, given the choice between him and Tony, always chose him.

Tony was uncomfortable with girls and showed it. He didn't know what to do; he had absolutely no line. He said the things he felt in his heart; and the first girl who had sense enough to recognize his sincerity was Janet Leigh.

She made Tony realize that his acting potential was as bright as anyone's in the business. He realized, too, that Janet's strength complemented all his weaknesses.

It is a strange fact but Tony, who used to shine shoes for five cents a pair in front of Bloomingdale's Department Store in New York and work for $12 a week in a broom factory, is probably the most generous actor in Hollywood.

By the time he gets through supporting his mother, father, and brother, giving 10% to his agent, paying his dues to the Screen Actors' Guild and the Motion Picture Relief Fund, and handing over sizable chunks of his salary for Federal and State taxes, he has just about enough left to pay the rent and the installments on his car.

It is incredible, but his contempt for money is Gargantuan. With a philosophy that belies his years, he knows that money is no guarantee of happiness. His parents were penniless and yet he has never witnessed a greater or more loyal love between two people.

Janet, who has a practical bent, has explained to Tony that money must be put aside for medical bills and other emergencies, that installment payments are bad economically and that it's best to pay cash for everything.

"I'm careful about money," she confesses, "because I never had any."

Tony is careless for the very same reason.

Between these two, Janet has managed to evolve a modus operandi which satisfies them both.

Neither has expensive hobbies. Tony paints and Janet buys classical records. They own no furniture, and their wardrobes are limited.

Before they were married, both Tony and Janet were overly anxious to please. Tony was so determined not to hurt anyone who had remotely helped him that at every interview he'd launch into a detailed explanation of his success. He would attribute it to his parents, to Jerry Lewis, to George Rosenberg, to Bill Goetz and Al Horwitz of Universal, to everyone he could think of. He'd ask you to write a few lines about his not going Hollywood. He wanted everyone to realize that his hat-size had remained the same.

He was still Bernie to the boys back on New York's East Side, he still loved Mama, Papa, and his kid brother; he was still amazed by the wonder of it all. There was never a dearth of conversation when Tony was being interviewed. Words flowed like a pent-up river bursting its dam, and they always made good copy.

Of late, however, both Tony and Janet are sticking to the question. When you ask them if there's any truth to the rumor that they've both been quarreling a lot lately, Tony says simply and succinctly, "No truth to that," and Janet says, "Don't believe it."

Both kids are no longer afraid of hurting interviewers or of appearing inconsiderate.

After 12 months of matrimony, they are standing on surer ground, and the only thing they both want that they haven't got is a little Tony Curtis. END

letter from london

(Continued from page 53) "It's good for Michael to feel he's got someone to take care of," Anna said. "He's a gentle, understanding person, who would be very upset if he felt he was hurting someone."

While the Wilcoxes have seen the bride and groom socially since their marriage, hardly anyone else has, and for a good reason. Mike has been hard at work in Wilcox's production, Trent's Last Case, and Liz' time has been taken up with housewifely duties.

They're living in Mike's former bachelor quarters in Bruton Street, London. Mike arises at 6:00 A.M. Liz gets up at the same time he does, makes his breakfast, and speeds him on his way with a wifely kiss. She frequently drives over to the studio to have lunch with him but is very careful to stay in the background and not call attention to herself.

According to the Wilcoxes, Liz is enjoying, for the first time, a life of her own. In Europe, autograph fans don't besiege the famous as they do in America, and Liz likes this semi-anonymity.

"Michael and Elizabeth came to our flat for dinner the other night," Mrs. Wilcox said. "Elizabeth looked charming in a black velvet off-the-shoulder dress, with a tight bodice and full skirt—the sort of dress that she wears so particularly well." She was thrilled that night, because she was also wearing a wedding gift of diamond ear-rings from Michael that she could hardly wait to show us. They had pendants of baguette diamonds that were detachable so that they could be worn for formal or informal dress."

After dinner that evening Mike related a cherished story about his wife. It seemed that Liz had been looking through the English morning papers and had seen a picture of a forlorn, sad-eyed Dachshund puppy that had somehow been stranded.

"Mike," she said, "I'd love him."

He promised to get it for her, and, busy as he was on his picture, he took time out to track the dog down. He finally traced it to the local pound.

Liz has it now and loves it just as tenderly as she does anything that captures her heart.

"When Michael talks, Elizabeth listens most attentively," Anna said. "I think she teases him, more so than he teases her. Then she has the gift of quick repartee that many Americans have."

THE Wildings also regaled the Wilcoxes with the story of their latest dramatic episode. A small fire broke out recently in the brownstone house where they live. The fire department promptly arrived at the scene and cautioned the Wildings that they would have to get out in a half-hour as the fire might get out of control. "We'll wait and see," they told the worried firemen, and sat down calmly to finish the game of canasta while the blaze was put out.

Producer Herbert Wilcox, who has approved many a love script, was very much touched and impressed by Elizabeth's comments when she arrived in England.

"We saw her when she stepped off the plane," he said. "She struck me as being such a courageous young thing. She's tiny, and with 40 policemen around to guard her, she looked even smaller, more helpless. Yet she was completely and utterly self-controlled.

"I thought she was wonderful when the press asked her what her design for married life was, and she answered, without a moment's hesitation, 'How can you tell that until you've tried it. There's no blueprint for marriage.'"

But perhaps what is even more wonderful was Herbert Wilcox's answer when I asked him what the English thought about their top male star marrying an American movie star.

"All they knew," he answered, "was that a nice guy was marrying a nice girl."

Yours sincerely,

JOAN KING FLYNN

they want him bad

(Continued from page 43) there with her own chin stuck out and her eyes closed waiting for the blow she felt just had to come. And when it didn't, she broke into tears, told Dick he wasn't even half a man and ran tearfully from the building.

The time has come—now that Richard Widmark is to be given to the public again as the toothy lout of his first fame—to re-examine the man and his career. Is he really anything like the maniacal murderer his staunchest supporters claim he is, or is he made of sugar and spice and everything nice?

Richard Widmark was born the day after Christmas, in Sunrise, Minnesota. He was educated along classical lines and became Professor Widmark, a teacher of drama and kindred gentle arts at Lake Forest University near Chicago.

WHEN he decided it might be more fun and more profitable to act rather than teach acting, Dick invaded New York and in a short time became a top radio actor. To be a successful radio actor a man must be quite a craftsman, able to play a tottering soap opera grandpa at one o'clock and Young Doctor O'Brien saving the life of a kid at two. He must be a leading man and a supporting player all in the same day. And, upon occasion, he must play a bad man. Dick Widmark played bad men, but it was never his forte, nor was it considered his specialty.

In plays (he appeared in a number of them on Broadway) Dick Widmark didn't run to fierce roles. He was the juvenile in Kiss And Tell, the lead in poet William Saroyan's Get Away Old Man. He played young lovers and various types of dramatic roles, but nothing violent.

All in all, life in Gotham theatrical and radio circles was pretty sterile for Dick Widmark and his wife. He was making a lot of money and Hollywood meant nothing to him except possibly a place to sit in the sun between jobs. His first firm bid from Hollywood came when he was asked to test for a role at MGM, in competition with the late Robert Walker. Walker got the job and MGM didn't buy Widmark, an error they've been sorry for in Culver City ever since.

Dick Widmark, of course, will never forget his first meeting with Henry Hathaway, the man who directed Kiss Of Death. He had been taken by his agent to see the director as a possible Tom Udo, but after a very few minutes Hathaway rejected him as "too well bred, too intellectual, altogether too upper-class." He did, however, agree to listen to Dick read for the part—and he was so taken with the original interpretation offered that he agreed to go along with some makeup tests, and see if something could be done to make this mild-appearing lad look like a killer.

You saw the results. With a hair-piece almost to his eyebrows and other disfigurements, plus as evil a laugh as was ever uttered, plus a maniacal gleam in the eye, plus the know-how he'd gathered in radio and on the stage, Richard Widmark became a star.

Fan mail poured in after the release of Kiss Of Death and the studio was beside itself as to what to do with the star. Would people buy him without the wig? Would they like him as a slender, soft-spoken, sturdy citizen? They decided to spring Widmark on the public as himself gently, so after a couple of films as a bit of a beast, they plunged him into Down To The Sea In Ships, a movie in which he was the idol of all red-blooded American boys. That a segment of his die-hard violence fans resented this can not be denied, but Widmark gained new fans and established himself as a well-rounded actor, capable of playing a variety of roles.

As far as Richard Widmark is concerned, the part of Tom Udo, which launched him in films, was an accident of fate. He considered Udo slimey and would not like to be remembered best for that part. But he is well aware that he is not going to escape Tom Udo in the foreseeable future. He is not sure why, but he knows that kids like Udo.

When he appeared at the Roxy Theater in New York on the opening day of Down To The Sea In Ships he was shocked when a tremendous clamor arose from the juvenile audience right after he began a nice speech, and the air was filled with cries of: "Laugh for us, Richard, laugh!" He laughed the Udo laugh a few times and the fans nearly rocked the theater's foundations. It was bigger than Sinatra at the Paramount! The prospect of going through life as a noted murderer terrified Widmark and shortly after the Roxy episode he became somewhat a recluse, appearing in public only when it was necessary.

Paul Douglas noted the blue denims that Marilyn Monroe wore to fill her role in Clash By Night, and Paul piped up with "the end justifies the jeans."

Irving Hoffman in
The Hollywood Reporter

THERE are other questions Richard Widmark has trouble answering, but they are predominant in his fan mail. "One of them is 'how did I get that laugh?'" Dick said. "Another is 'are the neighbors afraid of you?' And another: 'How did you ever get a girl to marry you?'"

And all of these questions do not arise from Tom Udo alone. Once Dick had to whip Linda Darnell with a bicycle chain and the mail flowed in for weeks after that complimenting him on the discovery of a new sadistic refinement. The reaction of the public to Dick after his first few pictures was not too surprising to him, but certainly not gratifying. Once when he stalled his car and started for a house to use the phone an irate lady chased him out of her driveway. Upon another occasion, when he tried to be his nice mild self on a trip a group of irate fans made for him and pushed him under a taxi cab. Dick has long ago given up going to cafes and night clubs not patronized almost exclusively by film folk because there is always one chap around who wants to challenge him to a fist fight so he can show his girl he can whip Tom Udo.

In his private life, Richard Widmark has always lived like the leading character in a nice clean novel. His wife, Jean, was his college sweetheart and they were married according to the strictest Babbit formula. She is not a mouse he shoves around but an intellectual girl who writes well enough to have had at least the start of a good career in radio—and she is currently writing a play which her friends believe is better than average. Dick thinks she was attracted to him at the beginning primarily because of his talent as a drummer in a college band.

If Widmark has any bad habits they are unknown to his wife and closest friends. His idea of a well-spent day around the house is to trot about with a kit of tools and fix things. His favorite pastime is washing his car, which he has been known to do between shots in the studio. He considers an evening of energetic conversation with pals on any worthwhile subject a far superior entertainment than saloon crawling or chi-chi parties.

Dick Widmark is conscious of his place in the Hollywood scheme and perfectly willing to do his share to sell the films he is so highly paid to make. He is fully aware of the power of his fan clubs—and eager to cooperate with them in most projects. He figures he's being paid because these fans support his work. But he has no use for delinquents and remembers as one of his most terrifying experiences his first joust with a New York contingent of roughhouse kids.

The trip was a breeze until Dick and his wife arrived at Grand Central Station. At this point three huge 20th Century-Fox publicity men barged into his compartment and told Dick to look out the window. He did and saw what appeared to be the entire younger population of New York City assembled on the platform. One young lady held a massive valentine and a young man a model ship. Dick turned green with panic.

Taken in hand by the press agents, Dick was escorted to the main body of fans and presented with the valentine and the ship. Pictures were taken, but they couldn't be used because in each one Dick wore an expression of shock. Then Dick was pulled through the station to the drug store and as the flock followed it grew. People who didn't know exactly what was going on got in line. Then, at the behest of the head press agent, Dick was forced to down an ice cream soda with the fans. An ice cream soda at nine-thirty in the morning!

There is a group of youngsters in New York who can handle and terrify any movie star, even the toughest. They are the "professionals," the kids who carry their own cameras, make an issue out of autographs, quarrel with doormen and theater ushers, all for the purpose of selling the autographs and photos they take to other kids. They plague a star almost to distraction. Mrs. Widmark, a pretty sharp girl, had her hands full keeping them off the telephone line. They would call and have themselves announced as the head of NBC, or the secretary to the manager of the Roxy Theater. One of them tried to get through to Dick's room, but the operator said: "This one says he's Walter Winchell but he sounds like a small boy."

But the trip was saved by a group of high school kids having a party at the Persian Room, a supper club Dick and Jean liked to go to for dancing. They were not crowded or molested that night, but some of the youngsters sent over their menus and dancing programs and asked Dick to sign them. He considered that a nice tribute and was happy to do it.

As for future plans, Dick Widmark has some definite ideas. He feels that one day he will fade as a picture star, just when he isn't sure. And then he wants to become a stage director. Not a movie director—a stage director. He feels that he has a talent for this and that the stage doesn't require the knowledge of the hundred allied crafts the films do, so he could have a quiet life and maybe live in Connecticut, which he really likes much better than California.

Dick is a great admirer of Arthur Miller, the man who wrote Death Of A Salesman. He likes a particular line in that play which states that Willie Loman, the salesman, after a lifetime of working at his trade, left nothing on the road. All he left was a stoop he built on the front of his house, something he had made with his own hands and which was still there.

Widmark feels the same way about his accomplishments. According to Jean Widmark, the happiest she has ever seen Dick was the first time they went up to Connecticut after he became a star. They drove past their former home in White Plains and Dick stopped the car and sat for a long time looking at a fence he had built several years before. It was strong and secure. Dick grinned like a small boy.

"I thought that was a good fence," he said, and they drove on without further comment. But Jean knew he was very happy.

And when they got to Jean's sister's house in Connecticut, Dick headed right for the corner of the living room that contained the bookshelves he had made one time and which had been given to his sister-in-law when he went to the coast.

He looked at them a long time, then commented: "I see you still have the shelves." And he felt them and they were good and sturdy. "You know I could improve on them now," he said. "I could build them so they'd hold records, too."

No, no matter how you take him apart. Richard Widmark is not like Tom Udo in any respect. He is not a bad man—and never could be, except on the screen. But that's acting.

When you see The Full House you'll see Tom Udo again with the low brow and the maniacal laugh. Not as nasty as in the original presentation of the character, but still Tom Udo. And after you've been chilled by the menace of the man, forget him for it will probably be the last time he'll appear on the screen. Dick Widmark is an actor who aspires to other things. Because the public has been clamoring for him, you'll see the return of the bad man once more, but that's the end. Ask Dick Widmark. END

(Continued from page 49) featuring tall senoritas with long eyelashes and tortoise shell combs in their hair. These were the movie stars of Leslie Caron's childhood, and they were not to be envied or emulated.

However, if you follow Leslie Caron through the MGM studio streets now, and watch her begin a day's work, you will no doubt get the impression that this has been her business all her life, for she is a regular movie star herself today, even to the oddities that separate stars from common folk, even to the intense ambition to be greater than the greatest.

Leslie looks like anything but an actress. As she strolls to the stage on which she is to work, she will be wearing a tam pulled down over her ears, and a long, flowing coat and silly shoes. She walks with her head down thinking about the day's work. She looks like a gamin.

On the stage the coat comes off and, if she's in costume, Leslie Caron is a sight to behold. Her tiny figure is full but trim and her legs appear to have been copied from a Petty sketch. She walks with the peculiar duck-like strut of the ballerina, toes out and heels close together, hitting the ground with a firm step. There is little grace in her walk, because the ballerina doesn't achieve grace until she gets on her toes. But there is grace in the rest of her carriage. The shoulders are back and the tummy in and the bust is high—and there is a beautiful coordination in her movements.

Her face is pert. Her lips are full and wide. Her eyes are luminous, as they show on the screen, and soft and quick to change expression. Her nose is small, not at all Gallic. You couldn't call the face beautiful, but it has something that compels you to take a second look.

These are the things that got Leslie Caron into pictures; the face, and the grace of her. She is a beautiful dancer, a talented, natural actress, but it was the gamin quality that sold her to MGM.

It happened in Paris, just about two years ago. Gene Kelly, functioning as a director and MGM ambassador, was looking for a girl to co-star with him in An American In Paris. He had been in the French capital a couple of weeks haunting the places where dancers worked and congregated. He knew what he wanted, but he hadn't seen it yet. The girl had to be French, because of the story line, and she had to be an excellent dancer to be able to keep up with the Kelly brand of terpsichore.

Gene was staying at the George V Hotel and most of the Paris agents had been bringing their charges to his suite to be interviewed and auditioned, for this was a great opportunity. A young American, making his home in Paris, had a wife who was in the singing chorus of a troupe playing at the Ballet des Champs Elysées. His name was Eddie Constantine and he knew Kelly slightly. He visited him one day and mentioned that a youngster by the name of Leslie Caron was working with his wife and that Kelly should go and see her. Gene remembered that he had caught her a couple of years previously, but, although he had been enchanted by her pixie quality on stage, she had seemed rather young and a bit skinny for pictures.

That night Kelly showed up at the theater and before Leslie had been on the stage ten minutes he had made up his mind that this was the girl. Of course MGM had to feel the same way. The next day Constantine brought Leslie around to the George V and after a short talk it was decided she would be tested for the role.

As Leslie Caron tells it herself: "I was excited when I had the screen test. Then I went back to work in the ballet and for two weeks I heard no word. I felt they didn't want me, and although I was a little disappointed I decided to forget all about it. So I just began making plans for future performances at the theater. Then I got a phone call from Gene Kelly who told me I was to leave for America in three days. There I was to make more tests and come back to Paris in a week or so to make the movie there—if they liked me."

Within 48 hours Leslie Caron and her mother were aboard an airliner for Hollywood, and 36 hours later, they were on the MGM lot. Just like that. But there was quite a tale back of that journey.

MARGARET Petit Caron, Leslie's mother, was an American woman of French descent who had been on the stage in New York in her youth. Failing in health, she had gone to Europe hoping to get well and come back to America. She met, however, a young pharmacist and married him. His name was Claude Caron.

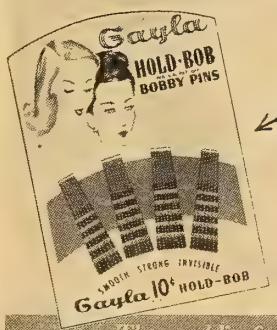
Leslie was born a couple of years later. She was a small child with large, inquisitive eyes. She was not sickly, but none too sturdy. The Carons were not wealthy people, but were well enough off to manage a life of middle class plenty and respectability. Leslie's parental grandfather, a career politician, who had at one time been president of the Paris City Council, was a stickler for respectability and he was determined the Carons should carry on in the tradition of a proud public service family. Being in politics in France is something more of an honor than it is on this side of the Atlantic.

The childhood of Leslie Caron was far different from the easy-raising a kid gets in America. All she remembers is the preparation for war, the occupation and the frantic post-war Paris. A child's days and nights were filled with want and danger. But kids can adjust themselves, and the boys and girls of Leslie Caron's childhood found strange excitement in the regular bombings. Parisian cellars, for safety purposes, were cut through to link with one another, and Leslie remembers the way the kids looked forward to the sirens signalling a raid so they could take the candle stumps they held ready and explore the catacombs that were beneath the city. And, as the cellars were infested with rats, they engaged in mad rat hunts.

Leslie's education, according to the French middle class tradition, was gained in private schools, mostly convents, for only the very poor attended public institutions. Leslie remembers the shifts in educational precepts as the fortunes of war changed. At first, the school books related exact French history, but one day they were taken away and new books, extolling the Nazi ideology, took their places.

"We could tell by our prayers," Leslie says today, "how things were going. For a long time it was required of us to end our daily prayers with the plea: 'Lord, take care of our good Petain.' Then came the Allied invasion and the next day we were saying: 'Lord, take care of our good De Gaulle.'"

Toward the end of the occupation Father Caron expanded his drug business and began manufacturing vitamin capsules, Leslie thinks because he wanted to keep his family healthy. At any rate, the Caron fortunes improved slightly.



AT the age of 11, Leslie became interested in dancing. This was unusual in ballerinas who, if they plan the ballet as a career, begin studying almost as soon as they begin to walk. Although her mother had been a dancer, Leslie had never seen a professional dancer at work. A girl friend was taking lessons and Leslie went along a couple of times for a lark. She liked it and asked her mother and father if she, too, could attend the classes. It was all right with ma and pa, but Grandfather Caron hit the ceiling. His memory of the dancing girls of his youth was still clear in his mind, and he didn't recall their being real ladies. It was over his violent objections that Leslie was allowed to buy her first pair of ballet shoes.

It was to be two full years after she first began working at the practice bar that Leslie was to see her first ballet. She went with her mother, and when she left the theater, her head was swimming with the beauty she had seen that night. She made up her mind then that she would never do anything else for a living but dance. There began something of a game of deceit, with Leslie studying much harder than Grandpa Caron realized, assisted, of course, by her mother. During the summer vacations from school Leslie devoted her full time to studying. Once when things got a bit hot around the house, her mother took her to Monte Carlo, ostensibly to rest, but actually to work under a very famous dancing teacher.

When she returned to Paris, Leslie was advanced enough to enter the French Conservatory of Music, a state-operated school, and from there she drifted into the ballet companies that are as common in Europe as our little theater groups are here.

The picture people came after Leslie when she was about 15, with an offer to go to Africa and make a movie called The Black Rose, with Tyrone Power. But another young dancer, Cecile Aubry, got the role.

The day Gene Kelly interviewed Leslie in the George V Hotel in Paris he had one and only one objection to her for the role in An American In Paris. "We'll have to fatten her up," he said.

The trip to America, for further tests, was a fantastic adventure for Leslie. MGM was paying and she and her mother traveled first class. Leslie was scared. They boarded an airliner in Paris and headed for New York. An hour or so after taking off, the gentleman in the next seat leaned toward the tiny French girl and asked if she was enjoying the flight. She looked straight ahead and didn't answer. A little later, he spoke again, and Leslie, paying no heed to the fact that he was a clergyman, got out of her seat and marched back to where her mother was sitting.

"That man," she said indignantly, "is trying to speak to me."

"You will have to get used to that," her mother said. "In America everyone will speak to you, my dear."

When they arrived in Culver City, with one small suitcase, Leslie and her mother took a small apartment within walking distance of the studio. Then they discovered another odd habit we have here—changing our minds. It was decided right away that Leslie was to have the part, but the studio heads had made up their minds to shoot the picture in America. Leslie had no wardrobe, didn't have the money to splurge on a new one, and found herself very short on clothes. The studio solved that by loaning her clothing from the wardrobe department, and, for the first few months in Hollywood, Leslie wore the costumes of June Allyson, Liz Taylor and other stars as street garb.

SETTLING down in this strange land had never entered Leslie's mind until she met her husband, George Hormel.

Her first date with George, or Geordie, as she calls him, was a difficult one. He was stationed with the Coast Guard in San Francisco. He got into town and discovered that his brother and a party of friends, which included Leslie, were just going out the door on their way to dinner and the ballet. He begged them to wait so he could join them. They said they didn't have time, so Geordie swore if they let him catch up with them he would pay the bills for everyone for the evening. They agreed, and young Hormel, who was living on a reserve Coast Guardsman's pay, and the few dollars he earned making phonograph records as a one man band, had to foot the bills all night. He didn't get a bite of food himself because the others were in too much of a hurry.

Later in the evening they dropped in at Ella Logan's home. George had become fascinated with Leslie and was unable to keep his eyes off her. Leslie admits she was equally attracted to George, though she'd hardly spoken to him all evening. When Ella asked her for her phone number, she gave it in a loud clear voice, hoping he would hear. He did and phoned her the next day.

After their first date together, Geordie dropped her off at her door with a curt good night. The following evening he took her to the beach and, as Leslie tells it, said: "Do you think we can get married?" Her answer, she admits, was: "Are you crazy?"

The next move on the part of Mr. Hormel was to suggest that they both fly back to Minnesota and let her have a look at his family. Because she thought he was "crazy," Leslie agreed, and they all got along famously. However, the minute they got back to Hollywood, Geordie informed his girl that they had better take care of this marriage business immediately, because he was due for sea duty and he wanted everything shipshape ashore before he took off. Leslie explained that this was impossible because she was about to go on a personal appearance tour, was going to devote her life to the movies.

"In that event," said Geordie, "we'd better get married tomorrow."

All Leslie could manage after that kind of reasoning was a tiny "Okay," and the next day they packed their respective families in a plane, took off for Las Vegas, and were married at the chapel of The Last Frontier Hotel.

The George Hormels live simply in a town where most movie stars live like movie stars. They have a small house in Laurel Canyon and live within their incomes, which, at this moment, is not great. They are true newlyweds, preferring to be alone rather than to attend parties and gay events. At the present time George is making his unique recordings, but the time may come when he has to go back east and take charge of the family business. When that day comes Leslie will go with him. It's been a long and exciting journey for her from the war cellars of Paris and it's not finished yet. END

come dance with me

Those dreamy adolescent dates between Marge and Gower were rudely interrupted, however, the day when Gower at age 15 asked another girl, Jeanne Tyler, also 15, to enter a dancing contest with him. The contest was being staged by Veloz and Yolanda at the Cocoanut Grove, and as luck would have it, Gower and Jeanne won.

After that, little Marge Belcher was out of the picture. No more dates for her with Gower Champion. He was too busy dancing with Jeanne Tyler, so busy and so good, in fact, that a booking agency, the Music Corporation of America, signed both him and Jeanne to tour the country. The youngsters were told that they would be back in Los Angeles in time for the opening fall session of high school.

The tour lasted four years! When it was over, Gower had danced in most of the country's large cities, Marge Belcher was a fond and pleasant memory, and Pearl Harbor had been bombed.

Gower entered the Coast Guard and was recruited for a role in the big Coast Guard musical, Tars And Spars. He kept requesting more active duty, however, so they made him a petty officer third class, and he spent most of the war transporting troops to the various battle sectors of the globe.

Once the war was over, Gower returned to Hollywood. He ran into Marge Belcher occasionally, but their puppy love affair was a thing of the past, at least to him, and the meetings were casual and fleeting. They always asked each other what was cooking. When Marge told Gower she had landed a role in a New York play, Dark Of The Moon, he thought that was simply terrific. He himself was being tested by 20th Century-Fox.

"I was terrible in that test," he honestly recalls, "and I never heard from Fox again. I did manage, however, to get a dancing job over at MGM. I danced with Cyd Charisse for all of 30 seconds in Till The Clouds Roll By. Then, when that was over, I flew to New York to take in the shows."

Naturally enough, the first show Gower attended was Dark Of The Moon. "Knowing he was out front," Marge says, "made me so nervous that I gave the worst performance of the year."

ROMANCE and reunion usually go together. And that was the case when Gower and Marge met again in New York. Only Gower was afraid, afraid that he might fall in love with this cute, brown-eyed girl he'd begun so lovingly to call "Midget."

"Look," he said one night as they were strolling along East 45th Street in New York. "I like going around with you, Marge, but let's not get involved. You understand, don't you?"

"Sure," said Marge. She understood all right, but she had a problem, too. The Waldorf-Astoria had asked a young man she knew named Paul Godkin to work up a dance act for the hotel. In fact, Paul had called her that very evening to try to persuade her to work with him.

Gower blew his top. "Look," he said. "If you're going to dance with anyone, you're going to dance with me."

Marge couldn't conceal a happy smile as she nodded assent. That night when she got to her room, her heart was dancing.

Gower changed his name to Christopher Gower. He rented a small studio, and the pair began intensive rehearsals. They decided to bill themselves as "Gower and Bell."

Gower also came up with a new approach to exhibition dancing. "All of our dances," he explained, "must tell a story that the audience can follow. We'll specialize in dance stories." Marge was enthusiastic, too, about the idea.

Their first booking was in Montreal. In order to get there, they had to borrow $30. It was worth it, though, as they became a smash success.

They came back to New York flushed with happiness and a good-size bankroll and were immediately booked by some top night clubs. Richard Rodgers, the famous musical comedy composer, caught their act one night and sent word to their agent that he wanted Marge to play the lead in a new Rodgers & Hammerstein extravaganza, Allegro.

This was a real-life situation the movies had played to death: producer wants only one half of a team. The boy says to the girl with great self-sacrifice, "Go ahead, honey. I'll find something. Matter of fact, they want me as a single in Honolulu."

What Gower actually said was pretty similar, "Look, Midget," he began. "This is the break you've been waiting for. Take the job. I'll find another partner, and we'll be married later on."

That was the first time Gower had mentioned the word marriage. That was all Marge had to hear. She kissed Allegro goodbye and went on tour with her fiance. They interrupted a dancing engagement at the Palmer House in Chicago to fly to Los Angeles and get married.

They became Marge and Gower Champion on a Sunday, flew to New York on Monday, appeared with Milton Berle on his TV show Tuesday, and were booked at the Hotel Plaza on Wednesday. For five months they were featured regularly with Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca on TV's Admiral Review.

The reviews they received in New York were so unanimously excellent that the Mocambo wired an offer which they considered too good to turn down.

At this Hollywood night club, the Champions packed the house night after night. They were viewed by all the great motion picture producers of the movie colony. They received four different screen offers and finally signed with MGM.

AS soon as their future seemed to be firmly rooted in Hollywood, the Champions started home-hunting. They took to the hills with fixed determination.

"We had in mind a modern house of California redwood and glass," Gower explains. "Weekends and evenings we looked at just about every redwood job in Los Angeles county. All of a sudden we couldn't stand the sight of anything severely modern or made of natural woods. Then, one Sunday we read an ad in the L.A. Times for a Connecticut brick and frame in a location we liked. We drove up, had a look at the place and just loved it. When we heard the owner's asking price, we drove away like mad."

Despite the fact that the Champions' financial affairs are carefully supervised by a business manager, they convinced him that they would practically be saving money if they bought the two-story house.

Actually their house is smaller than it looks. Perched on a terraced hillside, it has only six rooms. The two small bedrooms, the living room, the dining room and the kitchen are all on the upper floor, while downstairs consists of one large room which the Champions converted into a combination dance studio and projection room. "Every professional dancer dreams of someday having a home complete with rehearsal hall," Gower says. "With Marge and me the dream went double. When we saw this house with its large unfinished basement room, we both knew we'd found our perfect home."

Brains are no handicap to a girl if she keeps them well hidden behind a low neckline.

Vanessa Brown

That a pool, dozens of trees and a sensational view goes with their house is often left unmentioned by the Champions. In fact, they're rather embarrassed by the swimming pool. They never intended to have one, at least not for years. To them it seems like a sign of "going Hollywood."

Up until the time they moved into their own home, two chairs, one piano, two barrels of books, and some nondescript bric-a-brac were all the household possessions Marge and Gower had in the world. Buying a house suddenly gave them a reason for indulgence, and they went quite mad. With the help of a professional cabinet designer named Steve Thompson they furnished their place in what, for lack of a better term, they now jokingly call American Baroque.

Gower, for example, didn't like the fireplace wall in the living room, so he asked Steve Thompson to design an enormous cabinet to be placed in front of it. In this one functional cabinet, Thompson included a television set, a record player, a bar and book shelves. To offset the simplicity of this large piece, Marge then ordered a richly carved coffee table with a travertine marble top.

Marge's small bedroom is also a blend of the functional and fanciful. In a practical manner she pushed the twin beds against the two walls to leave as much open floor space as possible. A large mirror helps to give the illusion of

The DANGER in waiting for your child to OUTGROW PIMPLES

PSYCHOLOGISTS warn that pimples undermine children's self-confidence . . . may even cause permanent damage to their personalities. Skin specialists warn that neglect of pimples can result in permanent scars. CLEARASIL, the sensational, new, scientific medication made especially for pimples may save your boy or girl from these double dangers.

NEW! Amazing Medication
'STARVES' PIMPLES
SKIN-COLORED...HIDES PIMPLES WHILE IT WORKS

DOCTORS AMAZED AT RESULTS. Yes, in skin specialists' tests on 200 patients, CLEARASIL brought amazing relief to 8 out of every 10. CLEARASIL is greaseless and fast-drying in contact with pimples. Actually starves pimples because it helps remove the oils* that pimples "feed" on. CLEARASIL ends embarrassment immediately because its skin-color hides pimples amazingly while it helps dry them up. Greaseless, fast-drying, stainless . . . can be left on day and night for uninterrupted medication.

Reported in Reader's Digest

CLEARASIL is the same type medication used in clinical tests reported recently in Reader's Digest. Thousands (adults as well as teenagers) have found that CLEARASIL is one medication that really worked for them. So even if other treatment has failed, you owe it to your child to try CLEARASIL. Satisfaction guaranteed or money back. 59¢. Economy size 98¢. Get CLEARASIL at druggists.

greater size, and the dressing-room-that-used-to-be-a-porch is crowded with built-in storage. On the more baroque side there are two Victorian gilt chairs, a pair of sconces that came from New York's old Murray Hill Hotel and an elaborate oval mirror that Gower found in an antique shop.

The Gower Champions finished furnishing their hillside house last November. They celebrated by throwing a big shindig in their downstairs studio. When Hollywood's younger set had a look at their American baroque decorating, it started a whole new trend in the movie colony.

MARGE admits that she handled the basic decorating such as choosing the fabrics, dishes and linens. It was Gower, however, who selected the paintings and the unique objects that makes their house so full of surprises.

Gower, it seems, is an inveterate browser and collector. "When I was touring the country and dancing in night clubs," he says, "we used to hit a new town every few weeks. I got in the habit of browsing through old book shops and art galleries during the day. It's hard to browse without buying so I collected old playbills, etchings, books—anything antique that appealed to me. I never had a place to keep my collections, and I used to give the stuff away or leave it in some hotel room. Now things are different."

Gower's browsing has led him to become a small-scale art collector. He owns several original Goya etchings, a lithograph by Picasso, some Degas prints and a pastel by Paul Clemens. He also bought the amusing wicker furniture they use in the kitchen because he has an aversion to chrome breakfast sets. An apothecary chest in the hall holds his extra medical supplies, and, only recently, he started collecting pewter plates with the idea of finding enough to make a dinner service.

No reference to the Champions or their home can be complete without a mention of their cats. They have a passion for anything feline, and the house is dotted with china cats, drawings of kittens, and four live animals.

"What we love about cats," Marge says, "is their complete independence."

Gower is a bit more frank. "They're just substitutes," he admits, "until we start raising our own group of little Champions." END brother can you spare a date?

(Continued from page 33) are the casting directors and talent scouts. These men have the notorious reputation of Taking Advantage of Innocent Girls who want to be in pictures. But nine times out of ten the girls come into the office prepared to Give Their All for a contract. As one casting director put it, "I'm a normal guy. I like women but I like to pick 'em for myself. If one more eager kid comes into my office prepared for anything if she can just get a contract, I swear I'm going to give up women."

All of which sounds as if the women of Hollywood are pretty terrible. But that isn't true. They are women, that's all, and they are living in a manless town. They fall into three categories. First, there are the girls who are trying to break into pictures. Then, there are the girls who already have contracts and who want, besides their work, fun and beaux and dancing dates. And lastly, we find the older women—rich, glamorous, famous, but desperately lonely and anxious to get married.

Let's examine the young stars first. Here are just a handful of the successful young girls who want their share of fun and good times—Ann Blyth, Pier Angeli, Piper Laurie, Debbie Reynolds, Joan Evans, Jean Peters, Janice Rule, Mitzi Gaynor, Peggie Castle, Vera-Ellen, Virginia Gibson, Mala Powers. If I took time to think, to go over studio contract lists, I could name dozens more.

But who are the available boys? Well, there's Farley Granger, Scott Brady, Rock Hudson, Carleton Carpenter, Dick Anderson, Bob Arthur, John Barrymore Jr. It took me some time to think of these. There are more, of course. But the point is that there are so many more girls.

YOU may ask why girls in pictures have to go out only with boys in pictures. It's a good question. But there is a good answer. These girls rather frighten other boys their age. The girls make a lot of money and boys outside the industry think they are too expensive to take out on casual dates. And if it's a dress-up evening, or a college prom, there are other problems. The girl is stared at. The other girls become jealous of her, and catty about her when she's asked for her autograph. And other boys shy away from asking her to dance for fear they'll be kidded by their friends or snubbed by the star. So the girls feel safer, more at home when they go out with boys in their own profession. The trouble is there are not enough of them.

Ann Blyth will not stoop to chase boys. As a result, she is often dateless when there is a premiere or a night club opening that she should attend, until her studio steps in and arranges a date for her. Isn't this incredible that a girl as attractive, as nice, as companionable, and as famous as Ann should need an intermediary to get a date?

On the other hand, there is a group of young men in Hollywood who are always happy to take the stars out. I'm referring to the young opportunists, the hangers on, the publicity seekers.

Here's a typical stunt: The boy will call a girl whom he may have met when he played a bit in one of her pictures. He'll ask her to go with him to a forthcoming premiere. If she remembers him at all and thinks he's nice, she'll probably accept. What she won't know is that he has no tickets to the premiere. But now that she has accepted his invitation he'll call her studio and say, "I'm taking So and So to the premiere, will you please send her tickets to me?"

Or he will show off to her by getting a grand, ringside table at Ciro's or Mocambo. She'll be pretty impressed until she learns that he has used her name to get it!

One of these opportunists told a friend that he wasn't going to take a certain girl out any more. "Why, the photographers don't even know her," he said indignantly. "They didn't take our pictures once. When I went out with So and So they were snapping all over the place."

Should Hollywood's young stars go out with boys like this? Of course not! But, since there aren't enough decent boys to go around, who else can they date?

A Tony Curtis comes along. He gets snapped up real fast. By whom? By a girl he selects. And it's a safe bet that one of the reasons Tony fell in love with Janet Leigh was because she didn't chase him.

Liz Taylor, after marrying a very rich young man outside the industry, found her second husband Michael Wilding in far-off England. And Shelley Winters found her man in Italy. And now that she is married to Vittorio Gassman an untold story can be revealed.

All the time Shelley was going with Farley they were just very good friends. During this time she fell in love with a writer. But he was a Hollywood product—bitter and cynical. He had seen a lot of actresses. He had known a lot of wacky dames. He refused to take her seriously. So it wasn't till she went to Italy that Shelley met a man who respected her not only as an actress but as a human being.

Janie Powell is one of Hollywood's luckier young stars. Her marriage outside the movie industry (Jane's husband Geary Steffen is in the insurance business) has given her a private life of quiet domesticity much envied by the movie colony's unattached young women.

Of the older women Greer Garson is just as lucky. After an unsuccessful marital try with Richard Ney, a young man who played the role of her son in Mrs. Miniver, she married Buddy Fogelson, a substantial Texas rancher, a millionaire and a man older than herself. She is extremely happy now. But how many Buddy Fogelsons are there? And where do the first ladies of Hollywood find them?

Look at Ginger Rogers, Joan Crawford, Jane Wyman, Barbara Stanwyck—all lonely women. So one of their favorite beaux is Greg Bautzer, an eligible Hollywood lawyer. He has dated dozens of big stars. He had not married one of them. Why should he settle down when he can have just as good a time as a bachelor?

BECAUSE Hollywood is so short on manpower, Joan Crawford was delighted when a young man started writing charming notes to her, sending her endearing telegrams. He told her that eventually he would find a mutual friend who would properly introduce them. This delighted Joan who is, essentially, most conventional. He did find someone to introduce them. He told Joan of his admiration for her and said that all he wanted from her was the privilege of her society. Then came the pay-off. What he really wanted was a role—and a big role, too—not in her private life but in one of her pictures!

Many other stars have had the same bad luck with love. Jane Wyman announced her engagement to Travis Kleefield, a building contractor, and then broke it. She says "it just didn't work out." What her friends say is that she couldn't stand the gaff—being married to someone younger than she.

And look at Betty Hutton. Married and unmarried. Engaged and unengaged. Why, even her Christmas card was decorated with a heart and Betty's expressed wish that she would find a guy in 1952. She managed to find Charles O'Curran, dance director at Paramount, but it wasn't easy.

It is not a new Hollywood story—the woman chasing, the men running. Beautiful Carole Landis fell in love with Rex Harrison. She desperately wanted him to get a divorce. When he wouldn't, she killed herself.

The love of Jean Harlow's life was William Powell, but she died without getting him to marry her.

And, more recently, there was Lana Turner who chased Tyrone Power to Europe before his marriage to Linda Christian. Ty said that he and Lana were never engaged. She said she thought that they were.

A chased man is always wary. Take the case of Jimmy Stewart. For years he was Hollywood's prize bachelor. And for years he avoided the huntresses and remained a bachelor. Whom did he finally marry? A society widow whom he pursued.

Who, then, is left to supply the demand for men among the older girls?

Spencer Tracy is married and will remain so, as a good many glamour girls have discovered. Walter Pidgeon ditto. John Wayne's marriage has been shaky but, as of this writing, he is back with his wife. Clark Gable, although he is available, swears he will never marry again.

There was a time when Clark and Joan Crawford were in love. This was when her marriage to Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. was on the rocks and Clark was still married to his second wife, Rhea. After Carole Lombard's death, Joan and Clark saw each other several times. But the timing was wrong. They were just good friends, they discovered, and she married Philip Terry instead.

It's true that divorce happens too easily and too often in Hollywood. But if these older stars could have looked into the future when they were younger, and tasted the loneliness that was to come to them, they would have made a greater effort to piece the broken bits of marriage back together again.

BECAUSE so many of the older women are lonely and so many of the younger girls are dateless, the boys grow spoiled.

A few years ago one of the nicest boys you would hope to meet came from the New York stage to work in pictures. He was charming and eager to please. A new and nice young man in Hollywood. A prize. But, as usual, the girls gave him the big rush and today he is an egocentric who can only talk about himself because he has found that the girls will listen to whatever he says as long as he continues to date them. He never thinks to send a corsage to his date, and although he has plenty of money he never bothers to take his date to dinner before they go to a premiere.

A boy of good background was recently signed by a big studio. So many girls asked him for dates that he came to the conclusion he would be sought after no matter what his behavior was. A girl asked him to one of the local awards parties—one of the many functions given before the Academy passes out the Oscars. He sat with her for a few moments and then noticed a table where the people seemed to be having more fun. He left the girl, joined the people at the other table and didn't go back to his date until the party was over.

The entire situation is bad for both the boys and the girls. Is it any wonder that unstable marriages are so prevalent in Hollywood?

As we've seen, the girls are not blameless. The extra girl who longs for a speaking part makes a play for the assistant director. The bit player eager for a steady contract woos the executive in charge of talent.

Not too long ago Hollywood was surprised by the divorce of a sweet faced girl and her charming and seemingly devoted husband. Hollywood was surprised—but not too much. Divorce is all too common out here. A few gossips tried to dream up reasons for the separation. A few people who claim to be first with the latest made up some stories. The awful truth was that the new man in the girl's life is a producer. Her career was in the doldrums. She had sold her husband out for star billing!

And so it goes a large part of the time, an endless—and a vicious—cycle. Too many girls chase the boys for dates, too many stars chase the producers for roles, too many tragic older stars chase men to try and catch a husband.

And the men—what are they doing? They're running! They run from entanglements, they run from matrimony—they run every time they see a woman head in their direction. And the faster they run, the faster the women chase!

Where will it end? Who will win the race? Who knows. END

Yes, Camay takes your skin "out of the shadows"

AND INTO THE LIGHT OF NEW LOVELINESS!

Like this Camay bride, you'll win a fresher, brighter skin with your First Cake of Camay!

MRS. LOUIS AUER, lovely Camay bride, says: "Camay's a lamb of a beauty soap! After I changed to regular care and Camay, a clearer complexion was mine surprisingly soon!"

NO GIRL can expect eyes and hearts to turn her way—or hope for a ring for her third finger, left hand—if she lets dullness overshadow the natural beauty of her skin!

Are shadows keeping your beauty hidden from view? That needn't be! Camay can take your skin "out of the shadows" and into the light of romantic new loveliness. Change to regular care—use Camay and Camay alone—and your complexion will have a new freshness—a clearer look with your very first cake of Camay.

For complexion or bath, there's no finer beauty soap than Camay. How mild—how gentle Camay is! And Camay gives you such an abundance of rich, creamy, luxurious lather! What joy to see your skin come "out of the shadows" and into the light of romantic new loveliness with Camay, The Soap of Beautiful Women.

Head to toes—your beauty grows!

The daily Camay Beauty Bath wakes your sleeping beauty, head to toes! It brings your arms—your legs—your shoulders—that "beautifully cared-for" look. It touches you with Camay's flattering fragrance. Camay in the Beauty-Bath Size offers more lather—more economy!

INTIMATE FEMININE HYGIENE

GREASELESS SUPPOSITORY

Assures Hours of Continuous Action

Offers Many EXTRA Advantages

You can put your faith in Zonitors for internal feminine cleanliness which is so necessary for health, married happiness, after your periods and to protect against offensive odors.

Zonitors are dainty-to-use greaseless, stainless vaginal suppositories. A far more convenient method. They are not the greasy type which quickly melt away. When inserted, Zonitors release the same powerful type of germ-killing and deodorizing properties as famous ZONITE liquid. And they continue to do so for hours! Positively non-poisonous, non-irritating.

Zonitors completely deodorize and help prevent infection. They kill every germ they touch. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract, but you can RELY on Zonitors to instantly kill every reachable germ. Inexpensive! At any drugstore.

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Is it true that Tony Curtis and Piper Laurie really dislike each other?
—D. D., DANBURY, CONN.

A. Yes.

Q. I understand that Ingrid Bergman once admitted to her ex-husband, Dr. Lindstrom, that Roberto Rossellini at one time had a reputation of being a playboy. Is that on the level?
—B. J., CHICAGO, ILL.

A. According to Dr. Lindstrom's legal testimony, Ingrid told him, "I know that Rossellini has been running around a lot. He has told a lot about his life, and it is bad, but I feel I would like to stay here and suffer the consequences."

Q. Isn't producer Walter Wanger being treated with kid gloves at the Los Angeles County Jail Farm?
—C. D., NEW YORK, N. Y.

A. He is doing light chores.

Q. Why is Bing Crosby jealous of Johnny Ray? Why has he made disparaging remarks about that dreamboat?
—Y. R., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

A. Crosby has never made disparaging remarks about any singer. He merely admits that "I have no desire to imitate those fellas who sing like they're having a nervous breakdown."

Q. Will Jane Russell quit RKO when her contract expires next February?
—G. F., FRANKFORT, KY.

A. Not if she gets the good stories she's been clamoring for.

Q. Whom has Rita Hayworth been seeing the most of since her return to Hollywood? I mean in the way of men.
—A. L., WASHINGTON, D. C.

A. Actor Richard Greene.

Q. Isn't there a feud between the wives of Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin?

A. No feud. The families just don't mix socially.

Q. Haven't there been a lot of disputes between Jane Powell and Mario Lanza about the forthcoming movie, The Student Prince?
—C. L., PORTLAND, ME.

A. No disputes—just an understanding that each is to get equal billing.

Q. Hasn't Janie Powell asked Metro to give her a glamor buildup?
—C. Y., COLUMBUS, OHIO

A. She once wanted to be a glamor gal when she felt she didn't have enough boy friends. Ever since her marriage to Geary, however, Janie's been content.

Q. Yvonne de Carlo supposedly conquers so many men these days. Is she really such a great siren or what?
—D. H., SANTA FE, N. M.

A. Yvonne employs a very hard-working press agent.

Q. How come the stand-in for Piper Laurie is her own grandmother?
—P. L., DALLAS, TEX.

A. Piper's stand-in is Pat Bowers, a grandmother, but not Piper's.

Q. Audie Murphy looks disgruntled all the time. What's the matter with him?
—E. K., MINERAL WELLS, TEX.

A. By nature he is quiet, taciturn, inhibited.

Q. I've read that Gordon MacRae has antagonized every magazine photographer in Hollywood. Is that true?
—S. K., ATLANTA, GA.

A. According to the photographers, he will not be ranked number one in their popularity poll.

Q. I've had the impression for some time that Jane Wyman is one of the most unhappy successes in Hollywood. What is the lowdown on her?
—G. H., MOLINE, ILL.

A. At the moment there's no big love in her life.

Q. Why does Ann Blyth refuse to talk about her father?
—S. T., NEWARK, N. J.

A. Her folks separated when she was an infant. (Continued on page 28)

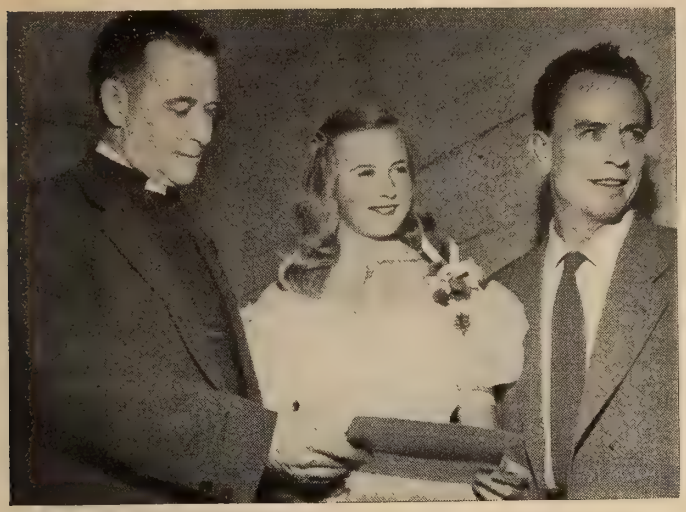
LOUELLA PARSONS'

GOOD NEWS

"ELIZABETH, you're going to have the most spoiled baby in the world!" I said to Elizabeth Taylor after she had just confirmed to me over the 'phone the happy news.

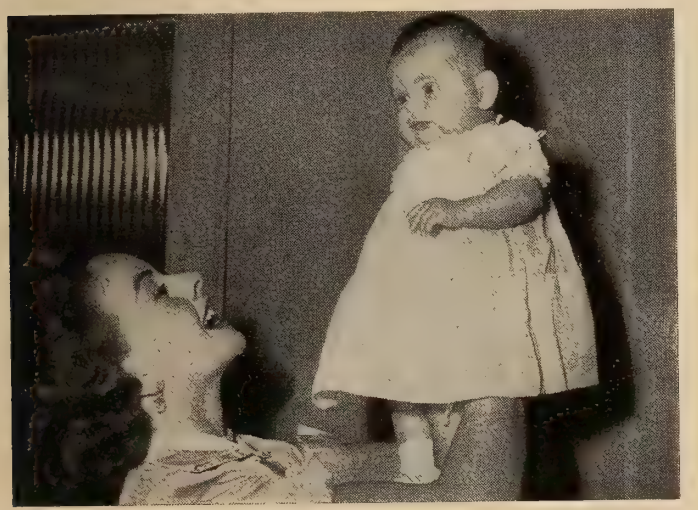


"Oh, I know it—I know it and I don't care," Liz laughingly replied, obviously at this moment the happiest expectant mother in the world.

"Why did your mother keep on denying it after I had checked her time after time to see if it were true?" I asked.

"Mother really didn't know, honestly," Liz said. "I was not sure when I was in England, and I wanted to wait until I came back home and went to my own doctor. Oh, it just isn't possible for two people to be happier than Mike and I." Elizabeth had broken the happy news to Michael Wilding via telephone to London, The pappy-to-be had been detained in his native England awaiting a quota number and was to follow Liz within a few weeks.

Let me let you in on something: Twins run in the Taylor family and nothing would thrill our girl more than to welcome a little Michael and Michele. Those names will stick no mat-



PARTY IS A WHAM-BAMMIE . . . ELEANOR POWELL AND GLENN FORD CLIMAX ALL OF THOSE RUMORS . . .

When Pia Lindstrom graduated from public school, her father, Dr. Peter Lindstrom, and the Rev. Kermit Castellanos were proud bystanders. The next day, Pia was in court (for the story, see page 40)

Liz Taylor was met at the airport by her mother, father, and an unidentified family friend when she flew home from England. It was her first reunion with her family since her marriage to actor Michael Wilding.

It was a girl this time for lovely Jeanne Crain, the mother of three boys. The new baby, Jeanine, was eagerly welcomed by Paul, Jr., Michael and Timothy who were overjoyed to have a sister at last!

ter what—Michael for a boy and Michele for a girl—that's how crazy Liz is about her Mike.

Can you imagine what Liz, who has always lavished affection on kittens, dogs, birds and other pets, will feel about a child of her own.

Yes, indeed—everybody is glowingly happy about Liz's baby-to-be—that is, all but MGM, which had enough pictures lined up for her to keep her busy the next two years.

So far, at least, those who predicted that happiness between 20-year-old Liz and 39-year-old Mike would be short-lived, may now hide their faces in shame while everybody croons lullabies!

I've never more enjoyed hostessing a party than the one I gave in the garden of my home honoring William Randolph Hearst, Jr., and his beautiful wife, Austine. I've known Bill since he was a little boy, and I am so proud of the way he is following, so brilliantly, in his father's journalistic path.

Everybody came to greet Bill and "Bootsie"—so many acceptances, in fact, that we put up a cellophane tent and set up white tables with vivid umbrellas in the garden.

Lana Turner, in a beige cocktail dress and coat that exactly matched her hair, came with Fernando Lamas—who else? These two, so much in love, held hands all the time they were here.

Jack Benny came "stag" because Mary had already left for London. I have to tell you something amusing Jack said to Ava Gardner, whose hair was surprisingly blonde, looking like a doll's wig.

"Honey," began Jack, tactfully, "I'm not your husband. But, if I were, I'd ask you to get rid of that damned blonde hair and be a beautiful brunette again!"

Frankie Sinatra died laughing, but he didn't say anything! Ava was a good scout and laughed, too.

I never realized how small Merle Oberon is until I saw her talking with Father Thomas English, the tallest priest in America—six feet eight inches. Merle's neck was absolutely bent backwards.

Gracie Allen had a wonderful time singing with the string band.

Jane Wyman said, "What do you mean, stealing my stuff? I'm the one who has gone crazy over singing in public." Jane wore a pearl gray cocktail dress and matching coat along the same line as Lana's. She really looked stunning.

Ginger Rogers wore black chiffon with beautiful blue earrings and necklace.

Cary Grant and Betsy had to leave early, reluctantly, because they have a new cook who gets violent migraine headaches.

Sylvia Ashley Gable sat with the David Nivens and said she was so glad to see so many of her "old pals" again. Sylvia has put on weight, but that is natural. She hasn't been able to move around much since she hurt her foot so badly. She has to use a crutch.

I was particularly proud that California's Governor Earl Warren and his charming wife were able to attend. The Governor always seems to enjoy himself so much.

Rosalind Russell wore a little yellow hat with a tiny yellow veil over her eyes—very flattering.

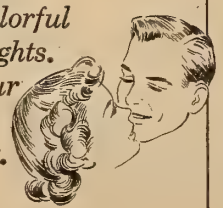
Norma Shearer Arrouge looked wonderful in a smart black suit and hat.

I'd just like to say—as maybe I shouldn't—

"Soaping" dulls hair— Halo glorifies it!

Not a soap, not an oily cream —Halo cannot leave dulling soap film!

Gives fragrant "soft-water" lather —needs no special rinse!



Wonderfully mild and gentle —does not dry or irritate!

Removes embarrassing dandruff from both hair and scalp!

Leaves hair soft, manageable— shining with colorful natural highlights. Halo glorifies your hair the very first time you use it.

Halo reveals the hidden beauty of your hair!

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

that I had an awfully good time, myself, at my own party.

INGRID BERGMAN wept as though her heart would break in a thousand pieces when she read Pia's statement, "I do not love my mother. I like her. I love my father."

Every effort had been made to keep the newspapers away from Ingrid, who was very ill in Rome just before the birth of her twin daughters. But she got hold of them anyway.

A very close friend—who had talked with her over Trans-Atlantic telephone—later told me, "She is crushed. Completely crushed."

It is very hard for me to believe that Pia wasn't coached in her testimony when she said, "I seldom saw my mother. She was usually working, or away, or tired."

I remember when Ingrid was making Joan Of Arc and I visited her on the set. It was a big production into which a fortune was being poured. But she was always the mother as well as the great actress carrying a heavy load.

The day I lunched with her, Pia was there, so gay, so devoted to her mother and so worshipful that she had her hair cut just like Ingrid!

I know, too, that the little girl came often to the studio and lunched with her mother. And time after time I saw them shopping in Beverly Hills with their arms around each other.

Whenever I ran into Ingrid, she never failed to tell me about Pia, some sweet thing she had said or done or about how proud she was of her good school cards.

As for Dr. Peter Lindstrom, I know what I am talking about when I say his private life is far from an open book. I know of a marriage into which he brought great unhappiness himself. And, this he will not dare to deny.

It is up to him to undo the terrible damage he wrought in permitting a 13-year-old girl to read everything printed in the papers and the actual transcript of the Bergman-Rossellini affair.

No mother in the world should live to hear her daughter say she does not love her.

RIGHT at the height of Jane Wyman's rug-cutting party at the Tiffany Club, Jerry Lewis said, "Man—this is a WHAM-BAMMIE!"

I'm not sure what a wham-bammie is, but I've never seen so many top stars letting down their hair and cutting up their feet!

It was a farewell for Jane's friends, the William Perlbergs, who were leaving for Europe where Bill will direct the Bing Crosby picture.

Jane had taken over the small nightclub, where so many hot jive bands play when they come to Los Angeles. How that Janie loves jive, and she looked so cute in a décolleté red-and-white checked gingham gown.

Believe it or not, but when I got there such "dignified" people as Greer Garson, Gary Cooper, Van Heflin, Barbara Stanwyck and some producers and agents were hot-footing it like crazy to Red Nichols and His Five Pennies band!

As for Betty Hutton and Charles O'Curran —they are such wonderful jive dancers they could turn professional.

Everyone took Janie at her word and came in ginghams and cottons—everyone but Evie Johnson (Van's wife) who was done to the teeth in full evening regalia. But she had fun.

Debbie Reynolds is dressed as a football for her latest picture I Love Melvin. She'll be passed from dancer to dancer in one number.

Tyrone Power took a turn at the drums!

The fun went on until five o'clock in the A.M. I'll never know how Janie got up the next day, packed her two children, and took off for the East.

ELEANOR POWELL was hysterical as she sobbed, "Let me get myself together—I've never been so unhappy. Yes, Glenn (Ford) and I are having trouble, but I'm too miserably confused to talk now."

This was the climax to a long series of rumors that Glenn and his dancer wife, Ellie, were on the verge of ending their nine-year marriage.

Last year when Glenn went to Europe to be gone a long time making Green Gloves and took his mother, the whispers of trouble were really shouts around Hollywood.

But Eleanor held fast to her story and to her hope that their marriage would survive. When Glenn returned from Europe after four months, he went home to Ellie and their six-year-old son, Peter, whom both adore. Apparently, all was well or, at least, calmed down.

Then, Glenn went off to Europe again—this time to make Time Bomb for MGM—another jaunt of three or four months.

Eleanor, at first, told me that she had no idea where Glenn was. Her mother, highly excited, called later and said that Glenn was in the house all the time these hysterics were going on.

Whether he was or he wasn't, I hope by the time you read this that things will be well between the Fords again.

THINKING OUT LOUD: Red Skelton must watch his health—all the fame and success in the world isn't worth what Red is pouring into his work. Too much work. . . . LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Rock Hudson gives Ann Blyth a lift as they step off the plane that brought them East for a number of personal appearances together.

Rooney's ex, Martha Vickers. . . . Rita Hayworth is really working very hard on Salome. None of the headaches and suspensions connected with her comeback movie, Affair In Trinidad. But she does find time to dine quietly now and then with Richard Greene. . . . Doris Day threw out her Early American furniture in favor of French Provincial—which is Early French to the French. . . . The "upsets" between Kathryn Grayson and Gordon MacRae making The Desert Song have not blazed out in the open as did her troubles with Mario Lanza. Kathie seems such an easy-going gal off screen. What happens with her and her singing co-stars?

TALKED with John Wayne right after he made up his mind that his marriage to Esperenza was definitely over. For weeks his Mexican wife, nicknamed Chata, had kept him dangling about their marital status and finally the worm turned. It was John who said, "I've had enough.

"I can't take any more—and still keep my dignity, Louella," the No. 1 star at the box office told me. "I was absolutely bewildered when I returned from Honolulu, expecting to join Chata, to find that she had taken off for Mexico.

"When we were both in Honolulu, she promised to join me there again after a short trip back home. She never returned. Never offered any explanation.

"Things were getting to the point where I didn't know whether I was married or not. It was an intolerable situation."

I asked John if it is true, as everyone said, that Chata was very jealous of his love for his four children by his first wife, Jo, and of the frequent visits he made to their home.

"That part of the gossip isn't true, and I can't say that against her. But I can no longer be kept dangling at her apron strings about whether she wants me or not. Not—and keep my self-respect."

John wouldn't discuss whether there is now a chance that he and Jo will re-marry. But their friends are keeping their fingers crossed hoping they do.

Well, Rock Hudson is back with Vera-Ellen, as of this writing.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

When her dog Squeaky had pups, Piper Laurie strung them up for a picture. (Read about Piper's feud with Tony Curtis on page 50.)

Even after these two broke their engagement and started dating others, they still didn't seem to forget.

He is supposed to be Marilyn Maxwell's big moment now—and Vera has been getting zee beeg rush from Ernie Byfield, Jr. So, frankly, I don't seem able to puzzle out just what will eventually happen between Rock and Vera.

HERE'S A TIP, gals. Jane Greer says that only relaxed women are glamorous.

"Can you imagine Marlene Dietrich, or Garbo, or Hedy Lamarr chattering like magpies at men, giggling on a dance floor, running here or there in breathless confusion?

"No—if a girl wants to go in for the glamor treatment, the first thing she has to learn is—take it easy. Not only that—it's a beautifier. The girl who crinkles her face up and goes into contortions when she laughs gets nothing but—wrinkles.

"I don't mean a girl should be spiritless and dull—but soft-pedal the voice, keep cool, be a little remote and mysterious if you want your husband or boyfriend to think you're glamorous."

Had to laugh over the way the rumor started that Doris Day and Marty Melcher are "expecting." Doris' seven-year-old son by a previous marriage, Terry, went to a kid's party.

One of the children asked Terry if he had any little brothers or sisters. "Nope," he said, "But we got one coming up!"

When I checked Doris, she died laughing. "I'm afraid that's just wishful thinking on Terry's part—right now, anyway."

THE LETTER BOX: Alma Totters, Huntington, Tenn., writes: "What has happened to June Haver? She is my very favorite. She seems to be slipping both on the screen and in magazine interviews." June isn't slipping, Alma. She has been ill, which has delayed her newest picture, and naturally she has not been available for interviews.

"Effie," Brooklyn, wants to know: "Don't you like Rory Calhoun?" Of course I do. He's one of the best-looking actors in town, and just as nice as he looks. He's very happy these days now that he and his lovely wife Lita are on the Stork's list.

- ☐ HARD-TO-SET-HAIR?
- ☐ TIGHT SCALP?

DON'T MISS A WORD of this special message! Learn how a simple hair conditioning treatment you can give your hair at home, GUARANTEES new beauty, new highlights, manageability, better health for your hair, or double your money back.

For soft, shining hair tomorrow . . . tonight —

CREAM-TONE your hair

with Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing

Is your scalp tight, dry, dandruffy? Is your hair dull, listless, hard to manage? Have permanents, hair dyes, today's high-tension living all taken their toll?

Then you're the girl who ought to know about the recent discovery in hair care that has excited the whole world of beauty.

It is called CREAM-TONING . . . and it is something you can do at home. You don't have to soak your head in hot, smelly oils! You don't have to fuss with wet towels!

CREAM-TONING is pleasant, relaxing, easy, simple, inexpensive. And, oh, what wonders it works for your hair!

NEW PRODUCT makes NEW TREATMENT POSSIBLE!

The product that makes cream-toning possible is brand new. It is smooth, creamy Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing. Flower-pink, flower-fragrant, it is a skillful blend of soothing, scalp-conditioning lanolin, costly cholesterol and other ingredients that contribute in rich measure to hair beauty.

How to CREAM-TONE your hair with LADY WILDROOT!

It's easy! First brush your hair. Then part it, section by section. Rub Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing gently but thoroughly into your scalp, along the line of every part. Don't be afraid to use plenty; it's good for your hair.

Continue rubbing until all the cream disappears — leaving your scalp glistening, relaxed, cream-washed, cream-toned. Now relax! Give the rich emollients in Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing time to soften and soothe. Let the luxurious lanolated oils work their magic all the way from your scalp to the very tip ends of your hair! Keep the cream on as long as you wish — a few minutes, a half hour, or even over-night.

After CREAM-TONING . . . Shampoo!

Now for a good shampoo! You'll like the active bubbly lather in Lady Wildroot Shampoo . . . the way it dissolves and floods away any remaining excess cream, taking with it dirt, grime, loose dandruff.

Give your hair a second quick-sudsing — with Lady Wildroot Shampoo! Then rinse, dry, and set.

Now, look at your hair! Your scalp is so pink and clean it glistens. Your hair is so fresh and clean it gleams. It's soft, radiant, beautifully manageable — easy to coax into deep, easy waves. Women troubled with dry hair, frizzyness, split ends, find this cream-tone conditioning a joyous discovery. Women with too-oily, sticky, gummy hair like the way it does away with excess oil.

TRY IT TONIGHT!

You'll never know, you couldn't begin to guess, your hair's own natural too-long-hidden beauty until you CREAM-TONE your scalp with new Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing!

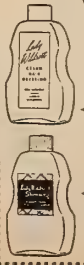
GUARANTEED! or double your money back!



If you have been hunting for a solution to dry hair, oily hair, frizzy hair; if you want to see how glamorously lovely your hair can be . . . then tonight, CREAM-TONE your hair. Your favorite store has Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing in the 50¢ and $1.00 sizes.

If you don't agree tomorrow morning that your scalp is cleaner, your hair more radiant, then return the bottle and Wildroot will gladly send you DOUBLE your money back.

Don't forget — BE glamorous, Be beautiful. Tonight . . . CREAM-TONE your hair . . . with Lady Wildroot Cream Hair Dressing.

Cut this out and put it in your purse

Back-to-School Beauty Hints

(Mothers please note, too)

Sweater Sweeties—

With a wardrobe of the new plain 'n fancy sweaters, you're well-dressed for dates or duty, any hour, any day. But sweaters can be irritating, if you use a deodorant that leaves the skin raw and sensitive. That's why it's smart to use YODORA, the "beauty cream" deodorant.

YODORA is gentle and pure as your face cream. A recent four-week test among more than a hundred women, supervised by a leading skin specialist, showed not one single case of underarm skin irritation from using YODORA, even when applied immediately after shaving!

Dancing Dolls—

Show-off shoulder dresses click at folk or formal dances. But be sure your underarm is "show-off" soft and lovely. YODORA, used daily, not only stops perspiration odor effectively, it also softens, smooths and beautifies the skin. Massage feet, too, with YODORA, to help keep them fresh and untired through the evening.

Tip for Teens—

Don't use too-heavy make-up on sensitive adolescent skin; nor a too-strong deodorant.

In a recent study among readers of a leading women's magazine, one out of two women reported they had suffered underarm skin irritation from using too-harsh deodorants. This need never happen to you if you use YODORA, the "beauty cream" deodorant. Tubes or jars 10¢, 35¢, 60¢

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

This is how feuds start. Olivia de Havilland told me she went backstage after a performance of Medea to congratulate Judith Anderson, the star. Olivia was accompanied by her agent, Kurt Frings. Judith grabbed Kurt's arm, pulled him into her dressing room, and slammed the door in Olivia's face! Hurt, Olivia went home, vowing never to speak to Judith again. But next day Kurt called her and explained: That afternoon, before the show, a thief broke into Judith's hotel room, cleaned it out and left an ace of spades on her dresser! Judith, accordingly, was barely able to stagger through her performance . . . Olivia understands now. But she still hasn't heard from Judith . . . Aldo Ray is under orders from Harry Cohn not to date till his divorce is straightened out . . . Virginia Mayo froze to her table at a party when another gal walked in wearing the same dress. Only on Mayo it looked better!

Ray

Lynn Bari was first to congratulate Sid Luft on his marriage to Judy Garland. But she also reminded him not to forget to pay ten percent of his earnings, as agreed upon in their divorce agreement—"or I'll sue again!" . . . Hollywood was horrified by the news from New York that John Garfield's funeral was turned into a shambles by screaming matrons who wanted autographs from the famous people who came to pay their last respects . . . Shelley Winters and her Vittorio got crates of congratulatory telegrams on their wedding but none from U-I, which suspended her about the same time . . . Hal LeSueur, Joan Crawford's brother, got a job selling fishing tackle in a Hollywood sporting goods store. He and Joan haven't spoken for several years, although he has joined Alcoholics Anonymous . . . Kathryn Grayson burned when Johnny Johnston filed for a quick Mexican divorce after she had filed for a California divorce. Hers isn't final until October, and she doesn't want any hitches such as an action like Johnny's might cause.

ODD'S BODKINS:

Tony Curtis took advantage of his suspension from U-I to go fishing at Durango, Colo., while Janet was making Naked Spur there for MGM. Bob Taylor got wind that the fishing was good and planed out to join them. Which makes two extra men, for the statistically minded . . . Natives of Samoa kept asking when Gary Cooper would arrive to shoot Return To Paradise. They see American movies, too, and this is their name for Gary: Big Coop, the Fierce, Great Indian Fighter . . . Mario Lanza's weight continues to give him trouble. He slipped to a dangerous 158 but got up to 163 fast via a pound of butter and a cup of olive oil every day . . . One reason Marlon Brando was so good in Streetcar Named Desire: He spent months beforehand studying the corner-of-the-mouth mannerisms of prizefighter Rocky Graziano at Rocky's training camp . . . Bing Crosby, who always has a pipe stuck in his kisser, actually smokes only four pipefuls a day.

Leslie Caron's spouse, Geordie Hormel, lined up that singing date at the Cafe Gala for himself just to prove there's still some ham in the Hormels . . . Dial Soap keeps complexions clearer by keeping skin cleaner!

Dial's AT-7 (Hexachlorophene) removes blemish-spreading bacteria that other soaps leave on skin.

The cleaner your skin, the better your complexion. And mild, fragrant Dial with AT-7 gets your skin cleaner and clearer than any other kind of soap. It's as simple as that. Of course Dial's bland beauty-cream lather gently removes dirt and make-up, giving you scrupulous cleanliness to overcome clogged pores and blackheads. But Dial does far more! Here's the important difference: when you use Dial every day, its AT-7 effectively clears skin of bacteria that often aggravate and spread surface pimples and blemishes. Skin doctors know this and recommend Dial for both adults and adolescents.

Protect your complexion with fine, fragrant Dial Soap.

FINANCIAL PAGE:

What makes a movie cost $4,000,000? Well, the ballet slippers for Jeanmaire, Farley Granger's dancing partner in Hans Christian Andersen, and for the other dancing cuties in the picture set Sam Goldwyn back $14,000. One small item! . . . Remember when MGM loaned Van Johnson $100,000 to buy a house? He has let it lapse back to the studio, which in turn re-sold it, but at a loss . . . Average hourly earnings of people working in the movies are now at a peak of $2.75, the highest of any industry. They compare with an average of $2.23 in coal mining; $2.21 in building; $2.10 in oil refining; $1.89 in steel. Lowest is for laundry workers: 92 cents . . . Paulette Goddard's person and jewelry are insured for close to $1,000,000, which makes her one of the country's top five holders of such policies . . . Dana Andrews signed to do Glass Menagerie in the summer theatres for $2,000 a week guarantee, plus a percentage of the boxoffice take. He also insisted that his wife play the part of the crippled girl.

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

The usually cagey little Debbie Reynolds admitted to me that Bob Wagner is her favorite—and that his absence from town is why she didn't attend her pal Leslie Caron's party . . . In jail for shooting Jennings Lang, Walter Wanger said, "It is like nothing that I thought it would be. I can tell you that the men in my tank at the jail are a more polite and interesting group than many I've met at Hollywood parties" . . . Gene Tierney paid her stand-in's way to Europe for her stint opposite Gable in Never Let Me Go . . . Incidentally, Gene's most recent beau, Ivan Mihanovich of the Argentine polo team, is a fast 22! . . . Mama Angeli no longer chaperones Pier's dates. Hmm . . . Sign on the Hollywood Baptist Church: "U Can't Spell Church Without U" . . . June Haver spent her birthday at her mother's bedside in St. John's Hospital . . . While bedded during her recent illness, Mala Powers kept up with the world by looking at TV. Howard Hughes sent her the set.

Wanger

This is what they were saying when Judy Garland got married: "So Sid Luft is what you find over the rainbow?" . . . Joe Pasternak wrote Pfc Vic Damone in Germany that he's lining up three pictures for Vic after his release—this in spite of Vic's having almost a year to go with Uncle Sam . . . That Brady guy told me: "Dorothy Malone has merely to say, 'Great, Scott!' and she'll be Scott's Dot!" It rhymes! . . . Cpl. James MacVicar, Martha Vickers' kid brother, won a medal for heroism in Korea . . . Irving Berlin was prouder of his daughter Linda getting a part in Pasadena Playhouse's Life With Mother than of any song he ever wrote . . . Coincidental with the announcement of her approaching motherhood, Myrna Loy said she's writing finis to her film career . . . Exciting new twosome: Rita Hayworth and Charles FitzSimons, Maureen O'Hara's brother and a fast man on his feet!

QUICK QUOTES:

When Margaret O'Brien waxed overdramatic on Bob Hope's television benefit for the Cerebral Palsy Fund, Jackie Coogan nudged a nearby actor and remarked, "Gee, I'm glad I never grew up!" . . . Starlet, speaking of a bore: "I spent eight months with him last night!" . . . Preston Sturges' recipe for keeping calm: "Talk a morgue into selling you the heart of a man who died in anger, put it in a jar of alcohol, keep it on your desk as a reminder" . . . Eavesdropped above the cry-&-hue at La-Rue: "But she doesn't LOOK 42! Unless you get real close to her—like 20 feet" . . . Monica Lewis unloosed this in my good ear: "MGM wants me to have a scrubbed, shiny look but I don't like it. What girl wants to look like she's been scouring her face with Kitchen Klenzer all morning?" . . . Swaggering starlet to her bosom pal: "I've had three offers from producers so far this week but they were all married" . . . At a party, I asked a star, "What's new?" She replied, "If I break up any homes I'll call you."

FUNNIES:

Red Skelton's sage advice for Debra Paget: "The girl who swears she has never been kissed has a right to swear" . . . Ray Bolger overheard it coming out of a movie: "I don't like those double features. I always eat too much" . . . Johnnie Ray sounds so much like a revivalist, the only way Fred Allen can enjoy his singing is on his knees . . . We spent hours trying to check if it were true Johnnie said of his wedding to Marilyn Morrison, "I'm so happy I could laugh!" . . . I got a card postmarked Durango from Janet. It said, "Tony caught his 26th fish today. We call him Huckleberry Schwartz" . . . At the end of the reissued bloodtinglers, Frankenstein and Dracula, there's a trailer called Help Your Blood Bank . . . Movie hero: "Not as far as I can see!" . . . Jean-Pierre Aumont, back in town after too long away, said the climate in Hollywood must be wonderful—because not one of the women he knew would admit to being a day older than when he was last here in 1949.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

John Wayne's wife, Chata, left him flat in Honolulu, where they had planned to spend time together while he was shooting Big Jim McClain. It was their second separation of the year. John, in a long-distance conversation from Honolulu, denied they were separated. Chata, who was here, denied it too, and then flew off to Mexico. And when John got back to the mainland he scratched his head, looked bewildered, and said, "You'd better ask Chata—I don't know if we are or not!" . . . Toni Carroll and Abigail Adams, both claiming to be Georgie Jessel protegées, fought over the title at Charley Foy's Supper Club. Afterwards, graying Georgie said, "It's highly complimentary to an old duffer like me" . . . Shock of the year: Pia Lindstrom's refusal to visit her mother in Italy. "I don't love her," she said of Ingrid. "I like her all right, but I love my father." What a price for Bergman to pay—the love of a daughter who once loved her above everything else!

Wayne

Stewart Granger's habit of yelling at his wife, Jean Simmons, in public is beginning to wear on various and sundry nerves hereabouts. He ordered her off his Prisoner Of Zenda set . . . It was a tug-of-war between Olivia de Havilland, Vivien Leigh and Greta Garbo as to who would get the starring role in My Cousin Rachel. Director George Cukor wanted Garbo most but Livvie got it. Later, George said he doesn't think Garbo will ever make another movie . . . The Piper Laurie-Tony Curtis feud is reminiscent of the fussin' and fightin' that Joyce Reynolds and Bob Hutton staged in Hollywood six years ago, and what's happened to them? . . . The Gassmanns' landlady evicted Shell and Gass because she wanted their apartment for her newly-wed daughter . . . MGM had an awful time deciding between Pete Lawford, Van Johnson, Farley Granger and Dean Miller for Janie Powell's leading man in Small Town Girl. Farley was the last-minute decision—and it was a hurried one. Picture had to be made fast because Jane's baby is due Dec. 10.

DANCING DOLLS:

Is it news to you too that Marge Champion got her start in pictures modeling Snow White for the Walt Disney cartoon film? . . . Warners rush-previewed Virginia Mayo's Working Her Way Through College, which as you know is about a burlesqutie in school, to tie in with the much-publicized panty raids taking place just before schools around the country let out for the summer . . . Columbia's Salome won't be as bloodthirsty as others you may have seen or read about. Princess Rita will not be called upon to dance with the head of John the Baptist on a platter . . . mond in her navel, a gift from hubby Shep King, when she opened at Ciro's. I looked, as did everybody else who was there, but no diamond. The gal gave Hollywood some real lessons in shaking, however.

SEX APPEAL:

That much-publicized nude statue of Mrs. Tyrone Power isn't new at all. Peter Lambda did it of Linda in England in 1950 when Ty was doing Mr. Roberts on the stage there . . . A CBS-TV censor explained television's new purity code to Marie Wilson: "A V-neck is okay but you can't get away with a U-neck any more" . . . Marilyn Monroe (incidentally, did you notice how RKO billed her as The Calendar Girl for Clash By Night?) autographed one of her nude calendar poses to a photographer as follows "Wish it could have been you" . . . The Breen Office returned one of sweet little Pier Angeli's still photos to MGM with the cleavage X'd out.

LONG HUNCH DEP'T:

Travis Kleefeld looks like Hollywood's new Greg Bautzer. He bounced from Jane Wyman to Beetsie Wynn to Ann Miller . . . You haven't heard the end of a new feud: Jane W.'s with John Carroll. Someone relayed to him that she had said she'd rather walk the 11 miles back to Los Angeles from the Pomona County Fair than stay and listen to him sing during her visit there! . . . Speaking of singing, Gary Crosby is really setting himself up for a vocalist's career. He joined the Glee Club at Stanford University . . . It looks like we'll soon learn the truth of another feud—that of another Jane W. (Withers, that is!) with Shirley Temple. Jane is writing her biography . . . Greer Garson isn't about to let MGM or anybody else cast her in any more of those "charming matron" roles.

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Bogart

Kirk Douglas rented a house for his kids, only to have them tell him they wanted to spend the summer in camp . . . Baby Bacall moved into the new house down off the hill the first night of moving. But Bogie, overcome by nostalgia, slept over in the old one! . . . In Jerry Lewis' new home movie, A Spot In The Shade, which is a take-off on—you guessed it—A Place In The Sun, Tony and Janet will play the parts originated by Monty Clift and Liz Taylor . . . Betty Grable is still queen at 20th. When she came back to work after her long "vacation," she still had the best table in the commissary and the studio had remodeled her dressing room . . . After quitting MGM because they assigned her "too many pregnant housewife roles," Nancy Davis Reagan expects the baby in December . . . When Vic Mature's pal, Bud Evans, got out of the Coast Guard, Vic gave him garage living quarters, then made him manager of his TV stores. Now Bud's well-to-do and is building his own home, complete with swimming pool. But Vic still doesn't have a pool!

At a gala ball, Gregory Peck meets and falls in love with Ann Blyth, a Russian noblewoman disguised as her own maid.

The henchman of a Russian prince, wh has abducted Ann, arrest Gregory. An agrees to marry prince if he frees Greg Ann and Gregory foil the Russians and sail away from Alaska in the nick of time.

THE WORLD IN HIS ARMS

Gregory Peck, Ann Blyth, a lot of beautiful Technicolor and the directorial talents of Raoul Walsh have been lavished by Universal on this adventure tale of the 1850's, most of which takes place in San Francisco and Alaska back in the days when the latter was owned by the Russian Czar. Peck, playing the part of "the Boston Man," an unscrupulous captain of a sealing boat, disposes of a fortune's worth of pelts in San Francisco and settles down in the swankiest hotel in town to take his ease for a while. At one of the liveliest grand balls in movie history, he meets Russian noblewoman Ann Blyth, who wants desperately to get to Alaska. Since he has a well-known aversion for Russians, she pretends to be her own lady-in-waiting. But before they can get married, she is abducted by a Russian prince and carried by gunboat to Alaska. There follows an exciting sea chase, between Peck and a rival sealer, climaxed when the crews of both ships fall into the hands of the Russians. How it all ends is a wonder, but it does and with the principals safe and sound and together again.

DON'T BOTHER TO KNOCK

When a white-faced, simply dressed and vacant-eyed Marilyn Monroe first appears in the drab New York hotel suite of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Jones to act as their baby-sitter for an evening, it is quite clear that the movie audience is in for a taut and unusual experience. Miss Monroe's movements are so persuasively tense, the camera changes so suggestive, the dialogue so simple yet full of so many unspoken overtones that the scene is set for some sort of real explosion. A story like this, for all its psychology, still depends on surprise, so let's just say that it concerns an airline pilot and his girl friend who sings in the hotel's somewhat crumby cocktail lounge; the young out-of-towner played by Miss Monroe; her uncle, a hotel elevator operator; and the Joneses, father, mother and child. Important as all these people are to the film as a whole, it is pilot Richard Widmark and Miss Monroe who get most of the footage, singly and together, and they make the most of their many moments. The pace at which a "shocker" moves determines to a large degree the tenseness it creates, and in this case the timing is a beautiful thing to watch. Director Roy Baker, with the help of a tightly written script and an imaginative camera, gradually works what seem to be separate stories into one shattering climax. The movie suggests, incidentally, that Widmark—at his tough and tender best in this one—deserves a chance at a wider range of parts and that Miss Monroe, under a fine director, can produce a real variety of screen portraits.

Cast: Richard Widmark, Marilyn Monroe, Ann Bancroft, Elisha Cook, Jr.—20th Century-Fox.

THE QUIET MAN

Seventeen years after making The Informer, a milestone in his own artistic career as well as motion-picture history, director John Ford has returned to Ireland for the scene of his new film. But he has returned in a different day and in a different mood, and the setting is hardly recognizable as the same. For the earlier picture was a somber one, a penetrating, pitying psychological study of a man who betrayed his comrades-in-arms. The Quiet Man, on the other hand, is a comparatively sunny picture, filled with the lilt of Irish laughter and side-remarks by Barry Fitzgerald. Prizefighter John Wayne returns to Inisfree, the Irish village of his birth. He buys his family's old farmhouse and tries to win the hand of Maureen O'Hara, a local lass with a temper like th' divil and a brother like the same. Finally he succeeds, with the combined conniving of the whole community, including the Catholic priest and the Protestant minister, but finds that his troubles with both his wife and her brother, Victor McLaglen, have just begun. The problem is: Why won't Wayne fight back? The script makes much of the fact that Wayne's final blow in his last ring battle in the U. S. was a fatal one for his opponent, and he doesn't want to use his fists again. No one except the audience and the minister knows this, but the possible drama in the incident is drained when his sole confidant urges him to get in training again and slug it out. Each picture-postcard scene, each person contributes a memorable bit, and none of the principals has ever been better, so that The Quiet Man ends up mellow, sentimental and entertaining.

Cast: John Wayne, Maureen O'Hara, Barry Fitzgerald, Victor McLaglen.—Republic.

JUMPING JACKS

The U. S. Army, and the paratroopers in particular, will probably never be the same again, for Jerry Lewis gives both of them a thorough going-over in Jumping Jacks, the latest and one of the wildest, zaniest and funniest of the Martin-Lewis films. Jerry gives himself a thorough work-out, too. This time, as a New York night-club entertainer on his way to big-time success with Mona Freeman, he receives an SOS from his former partner, Dean Martin. A paratrooper in training, the latter has promised his camp some top-flight entertainment. Naturally the show can't go on without Jerry, but just as naturally Jerry, a civilian turned down for service because of an ear condition, can't appear in an all-soldier show. So they rig up a uniform for him—on Jerry it could more properly be called a costume—and the fun begins, for everyone but Jerry anyway. Not only does Jerry get in the show and go over big, but he can't get out of the Army. His private war with that familiar institution, personified this time most by a regular Army sergeant (Robert Strauss), with his onetime pal Dean and with the military mind in general (and a couple of generals in particular) provides the rest of the plot as well as plenty of hilarity. Jerry, in his wacky way, has never been a more lovable comic, and for that reason Jumping Jacks is a signpost pointing to a possible picture future for the Martin-Lewis team. If the scripts-to-come can help intensify this comparatively sympathetic quality, if Jerry himself works at it, Lewis may eventually develop into a really fine film clown. Meanwhile he's a good deal funnier than almost any one else around.

Cast: Jerry Lewis, Dean Martin, Mona Freeman, Robert Strauss.—Paramount.

SALLY AND SAINT ANNE

Sally And Saint Anne is an unpretentious little Irish-American family comedy with an unusual twist: Saint Anne plays an important role as the protagonist's ally and protector, although she never appears on the scene. Every time Ann Blyth, as little Sally O'Moyne, one of a close-knit clan, wants something for one of her family or friends she notes it down in her diary and in good time prays to a statue of the good saint. Since everything she asks for comes true, naturally she credits the saint. When, for example, Sally hopes that Alderman McCarthy, with whom the O'Moynes have been feuding these many years, will get a black eye, lo! and if he doesn't appear in the parish church the next Sunday sporting a shiner. And that's nothing to what the heavenly hierarchy have in store for the black-souled city official in succeeding scenes. These follow Sally's family through a good many fights with the evil alderman and Sally herself through the solving of a number of teen-age troubles in which Saint Anne is usually an off-stage agent of the plot. The plot, though, is merely a number of old vaudeville acts, shaken out of moth balls, and that's not enough. Sally And Saint Anne turns out to be all twist and no new trimmings.

Cast: Ann Blyth, Edmund Gwenn, John McIntire.—Universal.

SUDDEN FEAR

It's seldom that things start happening as fast as they do in this Joan Crawford film. That's just as well, because after the immediate action there's a long stretch of almost relaxing romancing, and for a while Sudden Fear seems to be misnamed. It turns out, however, that the love sequence is just a movie trick to lull the audience, as it does Miss Crawford, into a false sense of security, for fright, flight and all sorts of melodramatic maneuvers are just around the corner. Playing a successful playwright helping to rehearse one of her shows before it opens on Broadway, she fires the leading man because he's "no Casanova" (he's Jack Palance), and —crack! bang!—there's the beginning of a plot any playwright could be proud of. Casanova or not, he does something to her. She changes her mind about the man, if not about his suitability for the part, marries him and settles down for a blissful existence high above the Marina in San Francisco. Always the audience realizes that her existence can be neither blissful nor settled for long, but Miss Crawford's playwright is a woman who has never tasted real happiness before, and she savors it to the full until suddenly, by sheer chance, something happens that brings her to with a rude shock. Fearful she now is, but a woman of character and determination she remains. How she reacts to what menaces her makes for a novel suspense story. The dialogue, camera work, over-all direction and especially the performances are so well keyed, the final scene in particular so scalp-tingling that one must forgive the slight shortcomings of the scenario.

Cast: Joan Crawford, Jack Palance, Gloria Grahame.—RKO.

WE'RE NOT MARRIED

The title tells the story of the gimmick behind this film, but it hardly hints at the hilarity that results when six marriages are suddenly dissolved. On Christmas Eve, Justice of the Peace Victor Moore makes his first mistake. He fails to read all the documents that permit him to marry people beginning January 1, so he unwittingly jumps the gun. The whole problem poses itself a few years later when one couple sue each other for a divorce. Then there are the complicated situations of five further couples: (1) Fred Allen and Ginger Rogers —This bickering pair, known professionally as the "Glad Gladwyns," married each other primarily to sell a radio network on an early-hour husband-and-wife breakfast show. (2) Paul Douglas and Eve Arden—A talkative Long Island couple before they married, they live a monosyllabic suburban existence, with one evening's big news the arrival of the new Book-of-the-Month. When Douglas opens his notification of the rhubarb, he begins considering the possibility of returning to the ways of his primrose past. (3) David Wayne and Marilyn Monroe—Wayne wears the apron in this family, for his wife has won the title of "Mrs. Mississippi" and seems bent on becoming "Mrs. America" while Wayne mothers their child. (4) Eddie Bracken and Mitzi Gaynor—A GI and his bride, they learn that they have been living in sin just as Uncle Sam sends Eddie overseas and the doctor directs Mitzi to an obstetrician. (5) Louis Calhern and Zza Zza Gabor—A Texas oil millionaire and his wife, they find themselves in a situation that literally floors one while it tickles the other's funnybone.

Cast: Fred Allen-Ginger Rogers, Paul Douglas-Eve Arden, David Wayne-Marilyn Monroe Louis Calhern-Zsa Zsa Gabor, Eddie Bracken-Mitzi Gaynor.—20th Century-Fox.

Through the eyes of an autograph collector

by nancy streebeck

Photos by author

Vivien Leigh signs willingly.

Cary Grant doesn't believe in it.

Susan Hayward—collector's favorite.

Jeff Chandler's "real George."

■ Wherever there are stars, there the autograph collectors congregate. They can tell you the dispositions of the stars, their home addresses, their telephone numbers, and the makes and license numbers of their cars.

The collectors classify the stars as the "real George" signers, the "meanies", and the "you-never-can-tells." At the top of the first list you will find such favorites as Ann Blyth, June Haver, Alan Ladd, Joan Crawford, Susan Hayward and Ruth Roman.

I can remember June Haver one afternoon at a radio broadcast. It was only a day after her fiancé had died but still she signed every autograph book, every picture, and talked to the fans. Her only apology was for her appearance!—and she looked wonderful as usual. On another occasion she was the queen of the Sheriff's Rodeo at the Los Angeles Coliseum. She came out on a large horse and her size nine figure wasn't quite enough to control it. This, however, didn't prevent her from shaking hands with the fans and servicemen in the front rows.

Joan Crawford will always go out of her way to please the collectors. One evening at the Mocambo a tourist was trying desperately to take a snap of her but the bulb failed to go off. After smiling for several pictures which didn't take, Joan came over and asked for the camera. She then took out the bulb, got down on her knees in her white evening gown, and scraped it on the sidewalk! Then she put the bulb back in the camera and asked the tourist to try again. It went off successfully and everyone applauded Joan. She thanked them for taking the picture and told them to be sure and look her up on their next visit.

Then there are the "meanies". This group merely stares, balks, and refuses to sign. Bing Crosby will sit in his car eating lunch and just dare you to come near. When he sees a crowd he holds his hat and yells, "Comin' through, comin' through!" I've seen him sitting waiting for Ann Blyth by the minutes chewing on a toothpick. He watched Ann sign but when several people put the book in front of him, he only muttered, "Nope."

Lionel Barrymore will often use profanity to ward off collectors. He mumbles and groans but occasionally breaks down and scrawls his name. Betsy Drake and Cary Grant never sign. They say that they don't believe in such things and would like to be left alone. Betsy signed before her marriage to Cary but now has taken over his attitude.

Then there are the initial signers. Some on the list include J. Cotten, V. Mature, M. Rooney, and M. Dietrich. Sometimes a brave soul will ask them to sign their full names, but usually the efforts are useless.

The older stars are usually very nice. I have never seen Rosalind Russell, Irene Dunne, or Ethel Barrymore refuse to pose or sign. Young Barrymore Jr. seems to take after his aunt since he is one of the nicest newcomers in town.

Let me say right here that Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift are both swell to their fans. I have never seen Monty refuse to sign and Marlon has a terrific sense of humor. He always has something to joke about, although I'll admit you never quite know what he means. They are both great favorites out here on the coast.

There are always the stars who will sign—if you can catch them! June Allyson, Dick Powell, Van Johnson, Bill Holden, and Dana Andrews are all experts in this field. If you can discover their secret exits they are usually most cheery and cooperative.

Hollywood will always have its "meanies", but there will always be the others to make up for them. The collectors usually place a higher value on the autographs that are the hardest to get but they attend movies in which the nicer stars appear.

In a film we expected to be nothing more than a glorified horse opera, they make the cleverest use of a musical theme since Laura and The Third Man—in fact, it's more effective than either, since this time there are lyrics as well as a melody on the sound-track to help establish and build moods.

Tex Ritter is heard, but not seen, performing the number at the beginning and end, as well as at intervals throughout the picture. The lyrics actually tell the story of the film, and snatches of melody underline the action.

GROUCHO MARX—*Hooray For Captain Spaulding (Decca).

Judy Garland is Mrs. Luft now. She likes it but Hollywood doesn't. Already rumors are flying, and many are saying that bad luck runs in threes.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

number three for Judy

■ Judy Garland has done it again!

For the third time in ten years, the lovable, muddled little girl with the slightly bowed legs, the tragic past, the arched, penciled eyebrows, and the incomparably great voice, has gone and gotten herself married.

The groom, as everyone knew it would be, was her manager, Sid Luft, a smooth young man of thirty-six.

The marriage was top secret, strangely unromantic, and hurried.

It took less than five minutes and was performed on Judy's 30th birthday at the ranch of Bob Law, a millionaire California oilman.

Judge Pappy Hain, who married the couple, said, "It was over like that. Mr. Luft wanted it swift, sweet and simple, and that's the way I gave the ceremony."

Just why Judy and Sid wanted to keep their marriage such a big secret, they aren't saying. Judy's explanation is, "Everyone knew we were going to get married eventually, so we saw no point in making a big fuss over it."

Others say it was because Luft was facing a legal suit and was afraid that, as Judy Garland's husband, the court would order him to pay his ex-wife Lynn Bari more than it did.

As a matter of fact, Judy's third marriage might still be a secret had it not been for the alertness of a reporter from the Hollister Evening Free Lance who happened, in perusing a list of marriage license applicants, to come across Judy's real name, Frances Gumm Minnelli.

It was under that name that Judy on Sunday, June 8th, applied for a license in Hollister, California, a city not too far away from San Francisco (Continued on page 72)

Ava's happy with Frank —but Hollywood's making her miserable! She wants to get out of the movie colony's spotlight for a while, and settle down as just plain Mrs. Sinatra.

BY THELMA MC GILL

AVA WANTS

"A girl's got to be crazy to marry a guy in show business," says Ava. "Why did I do it? I can't explain it in terms of logic. I fall in love and I'm hooked. I'm a sucker for love."

The Sinatras' Palm Springs house is perfect for vacations —but what they really need is a permanent home somewhere. They'll never find it in Hollywood, Ava feels.

■ Ava Gardner has had it.

After spending 12 years, the springtime of her life, in the movie colony, the cat-eyed beauty from Grabtown, N. C., is ready to pull out.

"I want to leave Hollywood," Ava confessed to me, "at least temporarily—and maybe even longer. Frank and I were talking only the other night. If we could spend a year in Europe, it'd be crazy. Honestly, darling, I've got nothing against this town, only it's such a darn tough place. I mean to make a success of marriage."

She leaned across the sofa to an end table, reached for a cigarette and lit it. Then, she opened the top collar button on the $12.95 grey broadcloth shirt she'd bought at Amelia Gray. She straightened out a fold in her grey flannel skirt, cost $18.95, exhaled a puff of smoke and continued talking.

"Today is our seventh anniversary, you know. Seven months. We were married on the seventh. I think I'll put in a call to Chicago and talk to Frank. That's what I mean about this town, doll, or maybe it's just the business we're in. You want to see your husband, and where is he? Playing the Chez Paree in Chicago. For nine months I'm not in a single picture. Then I get married and bop!—the studio's gotta have me right away.

"Honestly, doll, ever since the boy and I got together we've been on the move. First you rent a house down at the beach that costs seven hundred a month. Then you rent a place like this, and it costs five hundred a month. Frank and I really don't own any furniture, you know. A lot of the stuff here comes from his office. Just threw it in.

"What we need is a house of our own, a little security, somewhere to plant roots, and somehow I just don't think this is the town for that. Cripes! What an army of snipers. What do they call that? Occupational hazard, I guess. The best thing I can think of, on the level, would be to live here for six months and live in the East for six. That's it—here six, there six. Right now I'd like to be there."

She mashed her cigarette. "Cripes! I'm hungry. Don't you want something to eat?" she asked. I shook my head. She got (Continued on page 90) by hedda hopper

WHAT LIZ TOLD HEDDA!

One of the first to drop in and welcome Mrs. Mike back to Hollywood was her old friend Hedda Hopper, who got all the latest about Liz's little dividend from her own lovely lips.

Hedda's known Liz since she was 6, and has given the young star lots of advice since then—but, she admits, it's seldom heeded.

■ I've known Elizabeth Taylor since she was six years old; and one of my first impressions of her has been the most lasting. Her mother, ambitious for her daughter to have a movie career, brought her to my home. She was but a child, with no particular interest in me, a career, and certainly not men. On that visit she concentrated on playing with a chipmunk which to Elizabeth's glee scrambled all over the place while her mother and I talked. Since that day, I've written much about her—her screen work, romances, marriage, divorce, and a bewildered young lady trying to find a pattern for her life.

I've praised Elizabeth, criticized her, and given her advice to which she listened but seldom heeded. Through the years I've been alarmed with her seeming flightiness— particularly in the romance department—and disappointed with her lackadaisical attitude toward her film career, because she has what practically every girl dreams of having: great beauty, talent, and opportunity. But I've also loved her as a mother does a child. To me she's still a little girl gleefully laughing at the chipmunk perched saucily on her shoulder. That is Elizabeth essentially—the girl that stole America's heart in National Velvet and almost overnight became a movie personality who made headlines. We've had our differences, especially when I've tried to protect this wilful young woman from following her own careless impulses. But through the years we have remained friends. She has never refused me an interview and has always answered my questions as frankly as a child. It's hard for me to believe that she's been twice (Continued on page 68)

"I like mens," says Zza Zza Gabor, and every woman in Hollywood unsheaths her claws. They call this Hungarian beauty, a newcomer to movietown, "the most dangerous mantrap since Eve."

BY JIM BURTON

hollywood's most disliked woman

■ Some weeks ago a writer for one of the many national magazines that have been printing articles on Zza Zza Gabor recently sat in the Gabor living room posing questions for a piece he was preparing.

"Tell me, Zza Zza," he asked, "why do you think other women hate you so much?"

"Hate me?" Zza Zza's expressive eyebrows rose in absolute disbelief. "Vy, zat is ridiculous. No woman ever hates me. Zey all love me. I am the best of friends with every woman I have ever met!"

"But how about so and so," said the writer. "I hear you had quite a feud with her recently." The name mentioned was of a pretty prominent Hollywood woman.

"Please!" said Zza Zza indignantly. "Don't ever mention that girl's name to me. I can not stand her."

The reporter decided to abandon the issue right there, mainly because Zza Zza was honestly not aware that she had contradicted herself in two consecutive statements.

And that is the way it is with this Hungarian beauty who, in the space of a year, has become the most talked about newcomer to films and television in Hollywood. She considers herself the most ardent champion of her sex about, but actually has little time or much consideration for women. She regards herself as a lover of all mankind, and is positive she is loved in return, but the truth is that she is a majestic snob and probably Hollywood's most likely candidate for lynching if the female citizens of the film capital ever institute Vigilante rule.

It must be admitted that the women who would like to see Zza Zza Gabor ploughed under have a point, for she is without (Continued on page ~~48~~ 81)

The Truth about Shelley's Husband

VITTORIO GASSMANN HAS SHOWN HOLLYWOOD HE'S THE NOBLEST ROMAN OF THEM ALL—A GUY WITH EVERY-

■ A few weeks ago a tall, dark and incredibly handsome foreigner stepped out on the stage at the small Circle Theatre in Hollywood. In accented English he announced that he would recite some Italian poems—in Italian.

For the next two hours, without book or notes, he delivered what is probably the most amazing poetic reading ever heard in Hollywood. He ranged back to Virgil, through Dante and into the Italian moderns. Few in his audience understood a word he said, but in all that time there wasn't a whisper, rustle or cough. He held them spellbound with his magnetic personality, with the rich music of his voice, his dramatically changing inflections, his eloquent, graceful gestures. The performance was so sensational that it had to be repeated. Afterward, he was swamped with letters.

One came from a man who wrote, "You have suddenly brought back to me the whole aim and excuse for acting, which has been forgotten—to lift up and inspire. I have not had this spiritual feeling since I heard Caruso sing."

Actually, there was nothing surprising about this amazing exhibit of talent—only the fact that Hollywood was surprised. The magnetic young man is a poet himself, the author of a collection, Tre Tempi di Poesia (Three Stages of Poetry). He is also a novelist whose book, Luca dei Numeri, won literary prizes in Italy. He is a student of the law, besides, and a professor at the Italian Academy of Dramatic Arts. He has acted in 93 Italian plays and 20 Italian movies, directed seven plays himself and written as many. He is a classical as well as popular actor, who has brilliantly performed the works of Shakespeare and the classic Greek dramatists in the capitals of Europe. He has played Aeschylus' The Persians for 35,000 people in the ancient Greek theatre at Syracuse and also in Paris and London, where the crustiest British critic rhapsodized about him, "tonight a young god walked on the stage and illuminated the theatre with his brilliance." He was the first actor allowed to portray Christ in Britain, where it was against the law.

hollywood's most dramatic heartbreak:

INGRID AND PIA TELL

On these pages appear two of the most revealing, intimate documents ever published in Modern Screen. They are Ingrid Bergman's letter to her sister-in-law telling why she left Dr. Lindstrom for director Rossellini, and Pia Lindstrom's own court testimony to the effect that she does not love her mother.

These documents are presented herewith with no editorial comment whatsoever. No words beyond these of the major participants could more adequately portray the pathos and tragedy underlying this most widely discussed case in recent times.

Ingrid Bergman's letter is translated from the original which was written in Swedish, and presented here in full. Pia's testimony has been edited only to eliminate repetitions and the legal phraseology inherent in any court proceeding.

To reacquaint the reader with the situation at the time these pages went to press, Pia gave her sensational testimony just as Ingrid Bergman was giving birth to twin daughters, and Rossellini was trying to gain permission to enter this country to defend himself against Dr. Lindstrom's grave charges in the custody case involving Pia.

For purposes of identification "The Court" mentioned in Pia Lindstrom's testimony is Judge Mildred Lillie, Gregson Bautzer is Ingrid Bergman's lawyer, Mr. Pacht is Dr. Lindstrom's attorney appearing as Pia's counsel.

INGRID TELLS WHY

Dearest Anna-Brita,

When I received your third kind letter for my birthday, I was really ashamed. I am sending the letter to Clara for forwarding to you, because I am so lazy. But also, as I have truthfully said, it is hard to write. But now you are going to get a letter anyway.

You wrote in your letter: "You still belong to us." But dear, I will always belong to you. And I hope that you feel that way, too. You cannot just push aside 15 years of a person's life. And you know, even if I have not always been writing letters, that during all these years I have been so attached to Stode, mother and father, and all of you. Like you wrote in your first letter that I said a long time ago: "Even if I should get divorced, I will get married to a Lindstromer." Surely, they were true words that came from the bottom of my heart. I will later come to why I don't now choose a Lindstromer. First I want to say that if I do get married again, my L. (Lindstromer) and my 15 years of happy life will always be left in my heart and my thoughts.

What you wrote in your other letter was so true. "If you do go back to P. (Petter), you called as a witness by and on behalf of the defendant herein, having been first duly sworn, was examined and testified as follows:

THE COURT: Do you understand, Pia?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: All right. You are not frightened?

THE WITNESS: Oh, no.

THE COURT: Mr. Bautzer over here is going to ask you some questions, Pia, and you listen to the questioning and think about it before you answer. Now, any question that anybody asks you, you give it some thought before you answer it, and if an objection is made and there is a lot of talk between counsel and me, if you can remember the question, you keep it in your mind, will you?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: All right.

will wonder if it was right and you will think of what the other one could have given you. If you stay with R. (Rossellini), you will think of Petter." You know, if I woke up tomorrow and found that I was in Beverly Hills, Calif., and I had dreamed this, all these months of soul agony, tears, scandal, etc., I would probably be satisfied and continue my life as before. I am always thinking of Petter and Pia, but at the same time I tell myself that it is impossible to go back. Petter is a settled, good man, I really know that, and I am a "flyttfagel" (bird of passage, fly-by-night). I have always, ever since I was a little girl, looked for something new, new. I have longed for the big adventure, as much as I had, saw and lived through, it was never enough. I tried to get through the daily tristesse and find happiness and satisfaction. But I didn't know what gave me happiness and peace. That is what I searched and searched for. It was the same thing with my work. I tried to change roles, change type, move from studio to studio, search for new people and work, people that could develop and help me to the goal, fulfilment. But I was never satisfied. Perhaps I came closest to my goal with Joan Of Lorraine on the stage. And at home with Petter everything was all right. After all the years of separation, while he studied, I longed for and dreamed of the moment we could have a house as all the other big stars, a home with pool and everything. And we got it. We remodeled it, we rebuilt it, we planted, we planned; and again the "flyttfagel" began to spread its wings. Now I had everything, now I ought to be satisfied. But now I started to think of how closed in everything was. I knew so few people, I saw so little of the world, I felt as if I could not develop any more. Then I started to travel around on bond tours, I went everywhere to entertain soldiers and I went to hospitals. You know, this was during the war. I was happy then, although the work was hard. Petter knew how unruly my soul was. He tried to help me, gave me all freedom to go to New York when I wanted, he tried to adjust the work in our home and at the studio without any fuss. He thought that I found peace in my work. I worked on like a demon. I always told Petter how happy I was this last year. I had wanted another little child. Maybe I thought that would take the restlessness out of me. Then I met Rossellini. Here I found another "flyttfagel" (bird of passage). A man curious of life and people, a man who tries to make the most of his own life, who has seen so much, traveled so much, knows the good and bad sides of life, because he has lived with both, knows poverty and riches, hunger and luxury, intelligent, has studied everything with deep interest on account of his curiosity, who knows, understands, has immense sympathy and great generosity toward his fellow man. He had a rich father who was probably too kind, because he grew up first as a brat, got everything, did everything. He was temperamental and wild and really never satisfied with anything.

You write about his women. I do not know what the Swedish press says but his women are doubtless no exaggeration. Now he has met someone, who in spite of circumstances and surroundings and different childhood understands him, because she has sometimes wanted to do as he but has not been able to. I feel like I have found what I have been searching for. With him I have the world I wanted to see, the work, and all new people. He says that through me he has finally found a harbor. He (Continued on page 86)

SHE DOESN'T LOVE HER MOTHER

THE WITNESS: Yes, I do.

DIRECT EXAMINATION

BY MR. BAUTZER:

Q Miss Lindstrom, I am Mr. Bautzer, and I am one of your mother's attorneys. Have you heard from your mother recently?

A Yes.

Q And when was the last time that you heard from her?

A A few days ago; she wrote me a letter. No, she didn't either. She sent me some flowers—oh, no, she didn't. Yes, she did. She sent me some flowers. Somebody else sent them for her.

THE COURT: Do you know what they were for?

THE WITNESS: For graduation.

THE COURT: Did she write you a letter, too?

THE WITNESS: No; before that.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: Did you receive any communication from your mother at the time of your graduation?

A Yes—no; no, I didn't. Well, she wrote me before that, but not that day. I didn't receive any letter or anything that very day, just the flowers.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You have talked to your mother during the time since you saw her in England; you have talked to her on the telephone?

A Yes.

Q About how many times would you say that you have talked to her on the phone?

A Two times; maybe three.

Q And have you received letters from her during that interval since you left England and the present time?

A Yes.

Q About how many letters?

A Five, six—I didn't count them.

Q What have been the subjects of your communications? What have you talked about, as nearly as you can remember?

A Oh, we just talked about her house by the sea, and about her children, and I have talked about my dogs and cats and my school.

Q And in these conversations or communications has your mother told you about little Robertino?

A Yes.

Q Has she told you, Miss Lindstrom, about the anticipated birth of the twins?

A Yes.

Q Has she told you that she misses you?

A Yes.

Q And has she told you that she loves you?

A Yes.

Q Has she told you that she would like very much to see you this summer?

A Yes, in a round about way; not exactly to the point.

Q But you are aware of the fact that she would like to see you this summer?

A Yes.

Q What have you said to your mother when she has told you that she misses you?

A I didn't say anything in particular.

Q Have you said anything to her in your conversations on the phone or in your letters as to whether or not you loved her?

A No.

Q Have you said anything in your conversations on the telephone or in your letters to her as to whether or not you missed her?

A No.

Q Do you have (Continued on page 86)

She rose to fame living a lie. Now the girl who never intended to deceive the public is letting the truth be told. For Marilyn, it's a great relief.

the secret life of Marilyn Monroe

■ The scene was a small room in the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Hollywood. Marilyn Monroe, her blonde hair in disorder and her pale cheeks wet with tears, lay back against her pillows in the sterile bed and stared dully at the wall. An executive of 20th Century-Fox Studio stood before her, his face set in stern lines. He had just finished telling her that Erskine Johnson, a syndicated columnist, was prepared to blast the story to the world that Marilyn's mother, who had been believed dead since Marilyn's infancy, was alive and living in Hollywood. Unless, of course, Marilyn could come up with some satisfactory explanation of her deceit.

Marilyn didn't speak for a long time. Nor did she look at the studio man. She just lay quietly facing her own conscience and turning over in her mind the big lie she had been living, and the background she had felt made the lie necessary. It was a sad moment for her. But she knew as she lay there that she would at last have to speak the truth, forget her own unhappiness and make a straightforward statement. She would have to explain why she had created the fiction she had been giving to the press and her bosses ever since she started in the movies. She sat up and sipped a drink of water to relieve the awful dryness in her throat.

"It's true," she said at last. "My mother is alive—and I've known it all along."

Because of this incident MODERN SCREEN feels the time has come to bare the complete facts of Marilyn Monroe's life, which we present herewith for the first time.

Marilyn Monroe was born in the Los Angeles County General Hospital, June 26, 1926, which makes her not 23, but 26 years of age this summer. Her mother, a casual film lab worker, who has been employed by both RKO (then Radio Pictures) and Columbia Studio, was; herself, 24 years old when Marilyn was born. (Continued on page 93)

TY AND LINDA'S HOUSE IS LIKE A HIDDEN JUNGLE FLOWER. BUT THEIR FRONT DOOR IS ALWAYS OPEN . . .

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

■ In the Spring of 1947 all Hollywood was speculating on the outcome of Tyrone Power's tempestuously sizzling romance with Lana Turner.

That hectic love affair was reaching its crescendo, when suddenly the quixotic Ty took off on a round-the-world good-will flight.

Two months after Lana had clingingly kissed him goodbye at the Los Angeles Airport, Ty was rumored as being engaged to a relatively unknown Mexican star named Linda Christian.

Who was Linda Christian? Everyone in Hollywood asked. What did she have that would make a man forget Lana Turner?

No one apparently knew the answer, but there were others scattered throughout the world who could have told the local curiosity-seekers plenty. The employees of the Far East Oil Company, for example, stationed all the way from China to Palestine, smiled knowingly when they read the news. To them, Linda was George Welter's daughter, the attractive little girl who always spoke about becoming a rich and famous Hollywood actress.

The girls who went to school with Linda at the Paggio Imperiale in Florence said Linda's engagement came as no surprise to them. They didn't know Lana Turner, but they were willing to bet that Linda was infinitely more versatile.

In Mexico City, friends of Linda's family said that Ty Power was a very lucky man. After all, Linda was witty, beautiful, athletic, intelligent, and could speak five languages fluently. In addition, she was a good cook, a patron of good art, a competent manager and housekeeper.

Ty must have recognized all these virtues, because he married the girl in the Church of Santa Francesca Romana in Rome. It was a wild, mad, tumultuous wedding with hundreds of movie fans, (Continued on next page)

Against their pale pink interior walls, the Powers used white and off-white furniture throughout. The handwoven upholstery is undyed natural. Diego Rivera's portrait of Linda makes a vivid color spot.

On the dark-stained wooden floors, the Powers used shaggy white wool carpets. The custom-made tables are of bleached cork with antique legs. Fireplace bench was copied from Hawaiian hikie.

Ty and Linda spent a small fortune clearing land to make room for this 35-foot heated swimming pool. Then dirt had to be brought in to make a level terrace. Now they're set for outdoor living.

Ty's den with its bleached birch walls makes a perfect setting for his framed playbills, trophies and his many autographed photos.

Black wrought-iron accents make up the Powers' front door. There's a glimpse of Mr. Roberts, the Power poodle, in this picture.

With a house full of collector's items, it isn't odd to find Ty drives one also. Both the snappy car and Nikko are his pets.

clamoring and mobbing them as they left the church.

Ty and Linda were sure their marriage would last, but in Hollywood the jaded sophisticates were saying, "It's only an infatuation. Probably won't last more than a year or two."

The marriage is three and a half years old. Ty and Linda have an 8-months-old dumpling of a daughter named Romana, and they've just moved into a new home that is causing almost as much comment as their surprise love affair.

The Power house is one of the most beautiful in a colony of beautiful homes. Painted a tropical pink, which contrasts with its black wrought-iron accents, it looks almost like a jungle flower half-hidden among the lush growth of trees that cover this particular section of Bel Air.

The interior walls are also painted a pale pink, and most of the furnishings are white. Carpets of shaggy white wool are spread on dark stained wooden floors, and the handwoven upholstery remains in undyed natural. The dining room table and the lamp tables in the living room are of bleached cork set on antique white legs. The massive bedroom furniture is modern and covered in white calfskin.

Against this monotone of white and off-white, Ty and Linda have filled their home with collectors' items from all over the globe. They own paintings from Bali, African pouffs from Marrakesh in Morocco, Italian banquet plates, a beautiful Greek urn from Athens, and a portrait of Linda painted by the great Mexican muralist Diego Rivera.

The overall impression of the Power mansion is that here stands an exciting, exotic house set down in the middle of an upper-strata California neighborhood. To most of the movie colony, the house is difficult to understand. There's a foreign quality, an air of mystery about the place, which is why it causes so much talk.

A few of the self-appointed Hollywood authorities say the pink Mediterranean house is too stagey, too theatrical, that it resembles a set out of Casablanca. Others observe that it reflects Linda's international upbringing and Ty's far-flung travels, that it is a house which is basically designed for entertaining rather than family living. But the regular Sunday parental crowd like Van and Evie Johnson, Lex Barker, and Ty's sister, Anne, all of whom bring their small fry to swim in the pool, say that the house accepts children in the same casual continental way it entertains movie moguls.

Ty and Linda are either unaware or unmindful of the furor their home is causing around the cocktail party circuit. I don't know which. They realize, of course, that it's the perfect home for them, and sensibly enough that's what counts.

In line with this, Linda likes to tell of a curious coincidence. "When Ty and I were in England," she recalls, "and he was playing in Mr. Roberts, I used to get spells of homesickness. One day when I couldn't stand our hotel rooms any longer, I began to sketch the house I'd like to own some day. Those sketches which I still have are almost identical with this house."

The style of structure is traditionally Spanish. Like hollow squares around an inner court, all the rooms, including the kitchen, open onto a sun-drenched patio. Most Mediterranean and Mexican homes follow this pattern, so that when Linda first saw the house, it reminded her of the many homes she'd known as a child in various Latin countries.

The main rooms in the house are on one level and face the side of the square nearest the street. The portion of the home you'd expect to keep more private—the bedroom, nursery and Ty's study—are located in the rear. This section is two stories high, the nursery and guest room being situated upstairs and away from the master (Continued on page 83)

Miracles do happen!

By Dan Jenkins

■ Late one night in April, 1945, Loretta Young lay wide awake in bed fighting the agonizing battle familiar to those who are desperately tired and long to sleep but can't.

"Please, God," she whispered, "let Tom come home safely. But if he must go, let him be prepared to meet You, and let it be quick and painless."

Then she rebuked herself. Loretta knew that hundreds of thousands of other wives were equally distraught over the safety of their men in the service during the last bitter fighting before V-E day. She said a prayer, then, not just for Tom Lewis, but for all of them. Miraculously, a few moments later, a feeling of peace swept over her and she lapsed into a deep contented sleep.

"It was almost," Loretta says, "as if a hand had reached out and patted me on the shoulder and a voice had whispered encouragement. In the normal way of thinking there was no logic to explain what I knew—that Tom was safe. But I knew it."

The next morning Loretta's bedside telephone rang at six A.M. It was Tom. He had flown into Washington the night before, direct from the battle zone—landing at almost the exact time that Loretta had abruptly known that he was all right.

Now let the skeptics declare that this was just a coincidence. Almost everyone can recount similar experiences. But those of us who are of a (Continued on page 91)

THE HOLLYWOOD WISEACRES HAVE PLENTY OF THEORIES ABOUT WHAT'S BURNING PIPER AND TONY, What's behind the Curtis-Laurie feud?

BUT WHETHER IT'S A REAL ROW OR JUST A TEMPEST IN A TEAPOT, NOBODY KNOWS. • BY SUSAN TRENT

■In a town where actors and actresses call each other "Darling" and "Sweetie" and "Honeybun," and publicity men are ordered to soft-pedal the verbal cat-clawing that goes on behind the scenes among many high-priced stars, it is extremely difficult to write about something like the Tony Curtis-Piper Laurie feud.

It is difficult because this is one of those deep, simmering antagonisms that definitely exists but that everyone has been ordered to deny.

Tony Curtis and Piper Laurie don't particularly like each other, and that's putting it mildly.

Neither of the two will say anything for public consumption—but privately, oh brother!

These private whisperings are the catalysts that set this feud boiling. A friend of Piper's hears what Tony has to say in confidence about his sometimes leading lady and back it goes to little Piper, or Piper in an unguarded moment will pass a remark about Tony, and in a matter of minutes the rumor makes its home in Tony's dressing room.

This sort of routine fans the flame into such a blaze that most of the inner echelon of studio employees now regard the Curtis-Laurie feud as a simple fact, as the real thing.

As you probably know, most of the well-publicized feuds aren't on the level at all. They're promotion gimmicks. The Zza Zza Gabor-Corinne Calvet fight, for example, is a device to keep Miss Gabor in the public eye, ditto Miss Calvet. The Jack Benny-Fred Allen feud is an out-and-out joke and the Bob Hope-Bing Crosby verbal tussles are more of the same.

The real feuds like Tony's and Piper's, June Haver's and Betty Grable's, Haver versus Jeanne Crain, Celeste Holm versus Bette Davis, Joan Crawford versus Robert Montgomery, Tyrone Power versus Constance Smith, Merle Oberon versus Miriam Hopkins, Joan Crawford versus Gloria Grahame—these are the feuds that are played down because they involve jealousy, ambition, personality traits and conversations which are not approved by Emily Post. ■ "Eeet's majeek," sighed Corinne Calvet as she stepped out of her car and gazed in wonder at the scene around her. It was one of those clean, crisp summer days when to breathe tastes like a tall, cool drink and sunlight sifts down through leaves to fleck velvet lawns with patches of green-gold.

The occasion was the special gathering of Hollywood's prettiest models and MODERN SCREEN'S all star, clothes-wise jury to choose what promise to be this fall's most popular fashions. And the setting was the beautiful Bel-Air home of Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond.

Just before noon passers-by stopped and stared at the first signs of activity around the entrance to the rustic brick walk that leads to the Raymond's low-lying flagged terrace and swimming pool at the rear of their home. the on again, off again Waynes

John and Chata expected their marriage to be an ideally happy one. But somehow, it just hasn't worked that way. They're apart more than they're together.

Here's the key to why the John Wayne marriage may be headed for the rocks for good this time:

John's an outdoor man—fishing is his favorite sport. But Chata's strictly a homebody, so he goes alone.

Another thing that separates them, unfortunately, is John's work. Most of his movies are made on location. He and Nancy Olsen made Big Jim McLain in Honolulu.

Their latest reconcilation led to a second honeymoon trip. But John left Chata in the middle to make another movie!

Love isn't enough. A marriage needs careful tending to make it bloom year after year. And John and Chata just haven't had the time for that!

BY MARSHA SAUNDERS

■ Several weeks ago when he finished Big Jim McLain, his latest, in Honolulu, John Wayne grabbed the first plane and winged back to Hollywood.

He was nervous and anxious throughout the entire flight. He was worrying about Chata, his beautiful Mexican wife with whom he's had a very disturbing touch-and-go relationship these past six months.

Chata had been with Duke in Honolulu, purportedly on a second honeymoon, but when he'd started the picture, Chata had packed her bags—she's no location wife—and back she'd come to their rambling estate in the San Fernando Valley.

Was Chata—the word is Spanish for pug-nose—angry with him? Was she happy? Had her skin allergy broken out again? How was she doing with her mother?

These and many other questions raced through Duke's mind as the Stratocruiser put down at the Los Angeles International Airport. It was 7:00 A.M., and Duke's old friend, Al Murphy, was waiting with a car.

Duke gave Al a lusty greeting, then climbed into the Buick and headed for home and Chata. Only Chata wasn't there, and a look of hurt disappointment broke over Duke's face. He dropped into an easy chair and muttered a few words to himself, then rose, tramped around the house, asking the help if they knew what the score was.

It doesn't take long for news to make the rounds in Hollywood. Inside of a few hours, the gossip-gals were phoning Wayne.

"Is it true," one asked, "that Mrs. Wayne has flown the coop?"

"Look," Duke said, "all I know is that she's gone to Mexico City with her mother for ten days. She'll be back then. Everything's fine."

That's a stock answer with Duke. He refuses to lead his private life in public, and whenever anyone asks how his marriage is coming along, there's the usual one-word answer, "Fine."

Only it doesn't happen to be true. Duke's marriage has been foundering for years, suffering from a variance in temperament, outlook, mother-in-law trouble, background, and a few other difficulties.

To understand the story behind the recurrent separation rumors, it is essential to know something about the beautiful young actress Duke married in 1946 at the Long Beach Presbyterian Church.

To begin with, she was 15 years his junior and an only child. They had met in Mexico City and Duke had taken her boating on the floating (Continued on page 64)

and her heart went "BAM"

■ The walls of Sing Sing Penitentiary all but leaned against those of the Ossining hospital where Anne Francis was born. Mrs. Francis was attended by the prison doctor and, while in labor, had the dubious pleasure of being serenaded by a continuous clanking on the rock pile. The fact gave relatives and family friends an opportunity for much ribbing, and among other jocular remarks was the prediction that, because of her start in life, Anne was sure to "go wrong."

She began moving, all right, and has kept going at such a pace that by comparison Ossining's most prominent citizens have been standing still these past 21 years. She did not, however, go wrong. Not only has she kept out of the pokey and off of the country's police blotters, but at the moment she is the shining new light on the 20th Century-Fox lot.

Moviegoers first saw her in Elopement, in which she played Clifton Webb's daughter. Critics there said of her, "A new star is born. Anne Francis is a vital young lady of exceptional good looks—a dewy-eyed blonde with an appealing freshness and considerable talent." Then came the lead in Lydia Bailey and her role as Webb's daughter once again in Dream Boat. By the time these films were ready for distribution, the master minds at the studio (Continued on page 84)

Besides all this, he is a championship fencer, with three cups to prove it, and a former center on the Italian Olympic basketball team. He's muscled like a boxer, which he has been, is as tall as a grenadier, which he has also been, and is so good-looking you could call him beautiful. On this September first he will be 30 years old. Obviously, he's quite a guy.

Yet until recently and indeed throughout the past year he has been known in Hollywood frivolously and usually disparagingly as merely "Shelley Winters' Roman Romeo." Now he's her husband. His name, of course, is Vittorio Gassmann.

A town that makes millions playing fortissimo the theme of romance, just couldn't believe the real article when it happened to a home town girl. Well—now the joke's on Hollywood.

Not only did Shelley Winters find a true love match in Rome and become Mrs. Vittorio Gassmann in Juárez, Mexico, as of last April 28, but what's more she's ecstatically happy, despite the sniping rumors you'll hear from time to time. And Vittorio Gassmann, who never sought a job in American films until they sought him, experts now agree, may well become the greatest Continental star ever to grace Hollywood's lots. Already his tense Displaced Person role in The Glass Wall, directed by Maxwell Shane and produced by Ivan Tors, is introducing him brilliantly, and his romantic Mexican in Sombrero has MGM bosses pounding each other on the backs. He'll star next as a convict in a highly dramatic film, Men Don't Cry before he flies with Shelley back to Rome in October for what he considers his real life's work, the classic Italian drama. He'll be back in May.

But whether or not he becomes the greatest movie rave since Valentino, one thing is certain: Already Vittorio Gassmann qualifies as the most underestimated and misunderstood man in all of Hollywood's cockeyed history. So maybe it's high time to toss all the silly business out the window and level down on the truth about the amazing man Shelley Winters married. And that's a pleasure . . .

Vittorio Gassmann is a true artist and you can tell that the minute you meet him. His head, from it's thick wavy black hair to the prominent, pointed chin, is cleanly carved, and of noble proportions. His nose is aquiline. This Praxitelean perfection caused the cameraman on The Glass Wall to exult, "It's a face that breaks into sculptured planes no matter how you shoot it. There hasn't been a face like that around since Garbo."

Vittorio's eyes are dark brown pools that seem to reflect sadness one minute, excitement the next, tenderness and then gaiety, all in the space of minutes as you talk to him. His mouth is large, with sensitive, curving lips and a smile that flashes doubly white against his dark olive complexion. He has long, thin hands and he uses them expressively. His brow is high and wide, the brow of an intellectual. His speaking voice is low, rich and restrained. Yet with all this sensitivity Vittorio conveys an unmistakable impression of strength and masculinity.

Physically, he seems slight and thin, but actually he weighs 203 pounds, all bone and muscle. He stands six-feet-two, but walks gracefully like a cat. He inherited his physical strength from his father, Enrico Gassmann, a German engineer who came to Italy after the first World War and married Luisa Ambron, a Florentine girl who had always wanted to be an actress. Vittorio inherited his artistic gifts from his mother, and later she encouraged him to pursue them. He was born in Genoa, Christopher Columbus' hometown, September 1, 1922. But when he was only five he was taken to Rome where he grew up.

Until he was 15 years old Vittorio Roberto (he never used his middle name) lived under the rugged domination of his father, a giant of a man, six-feet-five, who had duelling scars on his face and the brawny shoulders of a sculler. Vittorio was the only son, and his father was a rough trainer. When Vittorio was barely more than a baby, he tossed "Toto," as they called him then, into the Mediterranean on one Riviera vacation, walked away and left him to sink or swim. Vittorio swam; he had to. He started him boxing and wrestling almost as soon as he could walk and turned him loose for the Roman kids, who raced around the ancient ruins, to complete the manly training. "Roman boys are rough," Vittorio grins today. "They took over enthusiastically." He has scars on his face today from street battles to prove it.

THE Gassmanns weren't wealthy. The highwater mark of family affluence, Vittorio remembers, was the purchase of an old Fiat car. But there wasn't enough money to rent a garage, so it stood in the streets under the rains until mushrooms sprouted on the top. There was usually enough money, though, for entertainment. Only, while Vittorio's mother and sister went to the opera and theatre, his father took him along to the soccer matches at the Stadio. He went to public schools—three years elementary, five gymnasium and three lyceo, where he quickly became a sports whiz and a top student. His artistic talents hadn't a chance to sprout, however, until his father died, or rather, as Vittorio thinks, "killed himself."

Not deliberately, of course. But Enrico Gassmann was a man who scoffed at illness and hated doctors. So when he developed acute appendicitis, he spurned medical care, took sweat baths and violent exercises to cure it. Peritonitis developed and he died. Vittorio was 15 then, and his mother took over.

She had rich material to mold because Vittorio was really a born artist and he secretly dreamed of being a writer. Up in his room he delved into the classical poets —Homer, Dante, and Virgil. Outwardly he kept up his athletics.

When he was 19, his mother took positive action. Unknown to Vittorio, she secured a borsa di studio (scholarship) to the Academy of Dramatic Arts and enrolled him. He had never acted in his life or even considered it. But when, back from a basketball jaunt, she told him the news, Vittorio remembers being pleasantly elated. "I was curious," he says, "and I thought: An acting school—ah, there will be pretty girls!" Of course, all of this he sized up then as strictly a dilettante deal. Actors don't get rich in Rome, seldom even the good ones. Most poets and writers starve, too. For his serious profession Vittorio was headed for the University of Rome and a course in law. In Italy it was not impossible to take on both schools at once, because universities there don't hold classes. Facilities for study are available, and it's up to you to pass periodic examinations on the way to a degree. Vittorio still has six exams to pass for his law degree. But he's now on the faculty at the National Academy.

It wasn't only the pretty signorinas who held his major intrests there—although Vittorio wasn't disappointed in the scenery. But "little by little," as he admits, "I turned into a—how is it—ham." More accurately, what he found at the Academy was poetry in motion, a chance to be the poet that was inside him and the graceful athlete, too. In fact, his first fatal burst of applause came from a gymnastic feat in his first public play, Zorilla's Don Juan. Vittorio played Don Luis and got skewered in a fencing duel with a sword atop some high stairs. "My fall to the floor was magnificent," he smiles. "It—what you say—wowed them."

AFTER that he played in almost everything the Academy produced—musicals, operas, comedies, classic tragedies. He had one more year to go on his three-year course when the Italian army called him for officer's training with the Grenadiers, but that lasted barely two months because the Yanks were swarming up Italy's boot and there wasn't much future in being an Italian soldier. With the Allied Armistice, they let him go. Vittorio left the Academy, dropped his law courses and turned pro. To get a steady job he had to go into enemy country, up north to Milan, the Nazi half of Italy. He made his debut there at the Odeon Theatre, in a play called, appropriately enough, The Enemy.

It wasn't exactly a climate you'd expect budding artists to flourish in. There were constant bombings and the imminence of Nazi concentration camps. But Italians are seasoned by a violent history, and they take life as it comes. The repertory theatre where Vittorio acted never closed, war or not, and he did 36 plays the first year. Salary—300 lira a night, or in American money, exactly one half-dollar. But in 1944, believe it or not, you could live pretty fancily on that in Milan. Vittorio lived in a good hotel and, as he modestly admits, "I was a big hit with the old ladies."

The young ones liked him, too. Especially Eleanora Ricci, the daughter of Renzo Ricci, a famous Italian actor. They were married during Vittorio's second year at Milan, when he was just 21. They have a daughter, Paola, now seven. But their marriage lasted barely three years. "We just didn't get along," is all Vittorio will say about that. There's a point, in passing, however, which Hollywood ignored in it's first uninformed gossip about Shelley and Vittorio: She was breaking up no home when she fell in love with the handsome Roman. Vittorio and Eleanora had been separated five long years before Shelley and Gassmann met, although, with no pressing reason for a divorce, he didn't get his until ten minutes before he and Shelley said "I do."

During those years Vittorio Gassmann became, as Ingrid Bergman truly stated, "the finest young actor in Europe." Back in Rome after the war, he plunged into classical drama. He played everything—even American stage hits like A Street Car Named Desire, All My Sons, and Anna Christie. All in all, close to 100 plays lie behind Vittorio Gassmann, and in the best Rome theatres. He had his own company with the Italian actress, Maltagliata, for which he directed and wrote. In 1947 he published his prize-winning novel. He won top acting awards—more of those than money. So to support his family he made Italian movies—20 of them. The one with luscious Silvana Mangano, Bitter Rice, was the only one of the lot shown in Hollywood, where a girl named Shelley Winters saw it before she left for a European holiday. Pretty soon, in Rome, she was telling Vittorio Gassmann how much she liked his performance, which was the truth. And Vittorio was telling her how much he enjoyed her job in A Place In the Sun, which was a lie, he hadn't even seen it. But, as Vittorio argues, "I had to have some kind of an approach, didn't I?"

It's a little late at this point to review the global romance of Vittorio Gassmann and Shelley Winters. Mostly, it can be summed up in Vittorio's words. "Between us we supported the trans-Atlantic airlines." Vittorio flew to Hollywood and home. Then Shelley flew to Rome for two months and they both flew back together to Hollywood. By then, of course, a certain understanding had been reached. In fact, it was after Vittorio flew home the first time that Shelley sent him the gold key that is his most sentimental possession today. It carries the familiar French wish, "May we love as long as we live, and live as long as we love" and a more intimate inscription from Shelley: "Here is the key to my house and the key to my heart."

There is one still lingering myth about those impulsive Hollywood flights of Vittorio's, however, that needs to be punctured: He didn't fly either time to get a job in Hollywood pictures. He flew to see Shelley.

ACTUALLY, Vittorio Gassmann had chances at Hollywood long before he met Shelley Winters. Three years ago Sam Jaffe, now his Hollywood agent, looked him up in Rome and shrewdly signed a managerial contract, even though at that time Vittorio didn't speak English. Then Sam Zimbalist, fired by Ingrid Bergman's report, told Mervyn LeRoy about him and suggested a test. But although Vittorio could have taken one all the long time that Mervyn directed Quo Vadis in Rome he never bothered.

It's true, of course, that after Shelley Winters fell, curly head over high heels, for Vittorio in Rome he needed neither an agent nor press agent to sing his praises in Hollywood. Shelley told everyone she knew and a lot she didn't in superlatives about Vittorio. Understandably, she had and still has the best reason in the world to want him here and now to keep him here. But Shelley faced a torturing dilemma one day not long before they were married.

She was at MGM then, making A Letter From The President. Vittorio had an appointment with Benjamin Thau, a top MGM executive about a proposed contract still in the talk stage. Shelley left him and flitted off to wardrobe, and when she returned she found Vittorio leaning dejectedly against a parked automobile, his face white as a sheet and looking to Shelley "as if he was about to cry."

The cause of Vittorio Gassmann's upset condition, incredibly enough, was something that would make the average actor new to Hollywood jump with joy. He had just been offered a seven-year contract at the greatest studio of them all, guaranteeing him more money than he could possibly make in Rome. But he hadn't signed. Instead, he had walked out into the air to think, uncertain, torn and a little scared. He wanted to stay in Hollywood with Shelley. But seven years in this one place, making movies!

"Seven years passes quickly" Shelley argued. "I signed a seven-year contract not so long ago and already it's halfway through. Before long you'll be free to go back to Rome and financially independent for life."

"Yes," agreed Vittorio. "I know that. But there are so many things I want to do. Play Hamlet, act the classics, study, direct, write, travel. These are my young years, the years that count."

By now a lot of people, including Shelley Winters, understand a lot more about the intense, studious young Roman who has come, seen and started to conquer Hollywood. Mainly, they realize that the problem isn't keeping Vittorio busy, it's keeping him here. Frankly, Hollywood doesn't particularly enchant him—for artistic, patriotic and practical reasons. Vittorio makes less but keeps about as much making pictures in Rome, where already he's top man; there are lower taxes, no agents' fees, cheaper living. Besides, being a Roman, anything away from his "terribly exciting city" Vittorio really considers camping out. He likes Hollywood all right, but he's not impressed. "It's exactly as it's supposed to be," he'll tell you. "The architecture is a little—uh—mixed. But Hollywood is honest. It doesn't pretend to be anything it is not." New York—that's another thing. To his European eyes it's ugly, rushing, noisy, nervous. Rome's strongest pull for Vittorio is the classical drama. By now, of course, he has that compromise six months in Rome, six in Hollywood contract at MGM, which proved the answer to his riddle.

ALREADY in Hollywood Vittorio Gassmann is respected as a flawless screen actor. He spoiled exactly one take during his entire first Hollywood picture. He impressed his hard-cooked crew, to whom no actor is a hero, much less a foreign one, with his talent, friendliness, and his moxie, too. They often broke into applause after his emotional scenes and had to hand it to him for plenty of guts right from the beginning.

The first day of shooting after a late night, Vittorio had to race time and again up a long ramp at the United Nations Building. He disappeared after the first two tries, but came right back and carried on. Not until the day was over did they find out he'd ducked under the ramp and lost his breakfast. Another time some sailors aboard a boat, chasing Vittorio to an easy leap off a five-foot rail, got their timing confused and dashed to the action spot seconds late. Without hesitating, Vittorio climbed to the deck above and jumped down a jarring 15 feet so the scene would come out right. "Hey," protested his director admiringly but concerned, "If you're going to do stunts, I'll hire a double."

Gassmann laughed. "In Italy," he said, "an actor who has a double is a sissy." Last day of the picture his crew tossed Vittorio a dinner and strung a banner across the studio street. "YOU'RE A GREAT GUY, VITTORIO," it read; "WELCOME TO AMERICA. WE WANT YOU TO STAY."

Actually, Vittorio Gassmann has had no trouble at all adjusting to America and Hollywood. Basically, he is a sophisticate who stays himself and indulges his tastes no matter where he is. The glamor of movieland doesn't intrigue him; on the other hand it doesn't bother him. He lives with Shelley in her small Hollywood apartment with no plans for anything more pretentious until they come back from Rome.

Each morning he rises early and reads the classics, an hour before Shelley gets up. Sometimes he writes, sometimes he just sits and meditates. To Shelley her husband is "a mathematical man—the most disciplined, organized person in the world. "Why," she'll tell you, "I twirl around like a dervish but nothing happens. Vittorio doesn't make a wasted motion and everything's buzzing along all the time!"

Little of the buzzing is frivolous. Vittorio's no stuffed shirt, though. He likes to go dancing, for instance, at Ciro's and Mocambo now and then and does, although "fun" to him usually means a play, opera or concert. "I do a very good samba" he'll inform you with no false modesty, explaining that he learned it in Brazil where he took an Italian company on tour last year. He doesn't care for big parties, but agrees that they're the same all over, usually a bore but sometimes amusing. Food to him is important and so far, while Shelley struggles with cookbooks from scratch, they've been practically living at Hollywood's Italian restaurants like the Naples, because Vittorio's not tactful about American fodder at all. To his palate, it's awful. "Everything," he thinks, "has peanut butter on it or mayonnaise."

BUT there is nothing superior or condescending about Vittorio's manner; on the contrary, he is as friendly as a pup and sometimes seems actually naive. For most of his pet American peeves, he has discovered something else he likes. If he does abhor television, hurried meals, and traffic signals, he's crazy about Hollywood's casual clothes, his second-hand Chevvy, and of all things, fresh milk.

For cosmopolitan Vittorio Gassmann the shuttle between Rome and Hollywood should present no major problems. A new language, for instance, to a man who already spoke five, has already proved a breeze. The first sentence Vittorio spoke to Shelley, barely a year ago, was halting and incomplete. "You—very—fine—artist, I theenk." But by now he can talk and understand American as well as anyone, even slang, and his accent irons out more every day. Shelley taught him. So now, with the new intercontinental life in view, Vittorio's returning the compliment—with the aid of a steadily spinning linguaphone and daily lessons with a professional Italian language teacher.

But I wouldn't say that Shelley Winters is considering rivaling her Roman mate at the drama on his own home grounds or anything like that. Not at least if the lesson I saw scribbled on a scratch pad the other evening when I dropped by the Gassmanns' is any indication of her thoughts. It read in Shelley's fine hand:

"Buona sera, Caro (Good evening, Dear)
"Hai lavorato molto? (Did you work very hard?)
"Hai fame? (Are you hungry?)
"Cena e pronta (Dinner is ready)"

That's nothing out of Dante, of course. But with a lesser Italian poet named Vittorio Gassmann, who came to Hollywood with a couple of strikes against him, it makes a hit—just as Vittorio has with Shelley Winters and everyone else who's been lucky enough to meet him. END

hollywood fashions for fall

Presently, a Tanner Gray Line bus pulled into the drive, and out of it flowed an array of lovely young models—all in brightly colored cotton prints and carrying band boxes—who were whisked into the house, there to change into the new fall outfits and await the judging.

Then came the stars, greeted in turn by Jeanette and Gene. The last to arrive was Vera-Ellen, who exclaimed admiringly as she took Jeanette's hand. "You should always wear copper color. It goes so beautifully with your hair!"

As Gene escorted the guests down the steps to the pool, strains of soft music rose from the terrace where a three-piece string ensemble was playing. Suzan Ball and Ursula Thiess couldn't resist stopping along the way to marvel at the sight below of multi-colored blossoms reflected like jewels in the emerald-green water.

During lunch the show opened with a unique specialty number. June Taylor, who swims under water to music, appeared at the edge of the pool in a long, filmy, gray chiffon cape. She removed the cape and stepped forth in a silver sequin swimsuit, then darted into the pool and went through her Quicksilver number, twisting, turning and diving in that fantastic, breathtaking type of swimming that made Esther Williams famous. Jeff Hunter, who was busily engaged in conversation with Mrs. Hunter (Barbara Rush) and the Rod Camerons when June started her act, suddenly caught a bright flash in the pool near his table. "Man," he said, startled, "for a fish like that I should've brought my block and tackle!"

After June's act the stellar board settled down to the business at hand. The tables were cleared and all manner of accessories were laid out for inspection. Each star had pencil and paper, and, as sparkling jewelry, colorful umbrellas, Luxite nylon hosiery, and Dream Step shoes, both formal and informal, were passed around, the names of favorites were jotted down. Vanessa Brown was completely captivated by a tiny purse atomizer, "Skwish," which looks like lipstick and can be used to carry perfume, deodorant or hair lacquer.

Finally the models passed in review, and the snappiest salutes were earned by Jaunty Juniors for coats, junior dresses from the famous Junior House of Milwaukee, more sophisticated dresses from Kay Windsor, suits from Murray Sices, who calls them "Sicettes" and makes them for women 5 ft. 5" and under.

West Coast designers who made a good showing were Koret of California for an informal, sports-type dress and Luxite for balbriggans, together with Holeproof Nappers (Slippersocks) for casual wear.

Everyone decided Madcaps were a pretty saucy, becoming type of hat, and Lubar's umbrellas a happy combination of parasol and rain-resister. The jewelry from Ledo was an easy winner, and Honeybugs' "Slip-A-Sox" was the answer to what to wear for loafing. Other winners were Luxite's nylon hosiery and Grantly's sunglasses by Foster Grant.

When the judging was over, Sally Forrest, Vanessa Brown, Corinne Calvet, Jeanette MacDonald, Virginia Gibson, Ann Sheridan and Vera-Ellen slipped into the outfits of their choice to pose for the photographers. The other members of the board stood around and chatted among themselves, making their own observations on trends they felt were important for fall. If you had been there and overheard some of the comments, you would know that there will again be the rustle of taffeta mixed with the softness of wool; velveteen, plain and with corduroy; printed and woven cottons with a new fall look in dark patterns; rhinestone and the new gold nugget jewelry; small, snug hats; open-toed shoes; and last of all something quite new—"Koret's Tubinyl", a dress with permanized pleats that can be dashed through suds, rinsed, and presto, fresh and crisp and ready to wear the next day.

It was the 17th of the month so Duke bought his Chata 17 red roses, and on each wedding anniversary she receives the same gift.

CHATA (Esperanza Bauer) was a competent actress in Mexico and on the way up when Duke Wayne first met and fell in love with her. She had none of the fame that enveloped Maria Felix and Dolores Del Rio nor the touted sex appeal of a young internationalist named Blanca Welter Christian who was later to become Mrs. Tyrone Power.

Esperanza lived a quiet life with her mother, who was only 15 years older than she; because of the nearness of their ages, the relationship was almost sisterly.

Added to this was the fact that Mrs. Bauer had been separated from her husband ever since her daughter's infancy. She had no other children. Esperanza was and is the all-consuming interest of her life.

In Catholic countries, maternal supervision is extremely strict. In Esperanza's case, it was nearly slavish, since Senora Bauer had nothing else to do but watch over her daughter and her career.

This sort of solicitous care is admirable, but it has its drawbacks, too, and one of the most outstanding is that it hinders the growth of self-reliance on the part of the girl who is being supervised.

It is no secret that when Chata married Duke Wayne, she felt lost; so, too, did her mother. Duke, having much more perspicacity than people give him credit for, much more sensitivity and insight, recognized this at once, and it was he who insisted that his mother-in-law live with them.

He hadn't thought about it beforehand—in fact, had only bought a small house with one bedroom and a den. But when he saw how deeply this separation through marriage affected mother and daughter, he said, "You must live with us, Mamacita. It'll be best for everyone."

Mrs. Bauer refused. "It is best for young married people to live alone," she advised. But then she looked at Chata, at the desperate plea for acquiescence in her daughter's eyes, and at last, she let herself be won over. She went to live with Duke and Chata, no doubt hoping to make a break in the near future. But the break never came.

IT is difficult to grow up and face your problems yourself when you have a mother nearby to do all this for you, and that's what happened to Chata, according to intimates.

When Duke was away, and he's away a good deal of the time on location, Chata always had her mother for companionship. They gossiped together, they went shopping, they gradually re-furnished the house.

When Chata came down with a cold, Mrs. Bauer took charge at once. Nothing was too good for her baby.

When Chata had small quarrels with her husband—and these are part and parcel of every marriage—there was always Mamacita to run to. While Duke never complained, he's always been partial to people who stand on their own two feet.

Friends say that he resented the fact that, on occasion, Chata would move into a hospital and take a room next to her mother when Mrs. Bauer was ill. Whether or not he thought this was carrying loyalty too far, Duke never said. Where Chata is concerned, he's been amazingly tractable. He has loved his little "Pugnose" very much and realizes that she gave up much for him.

Sometimes a man's second wife resembles his first. This is true where Wayne is concerned in that both of his wives are of Latin extraction.

Duke's first wife, Josephine Saenz, was the daughter of the Dominican consul stationed in Los Angeles. She met Duke when she was a coed at the University of Southern California, and he was a second-string tackle on the football team. They were married in 1933 in a Catholic ceremony held in Loretta Young's garden. Ten years and four children later, Duke was hailed into court and sued for divorce on grounds of mental cruelty.

The mental cruelty was the legal facade. Josephine was socially ambitious, intent upon raising her children and meeting people in the right circles, a woman of great charity and civil consciousness—and Duke—well, he's always been the earthy, homespun type who prefers to hoist a few, with loud and lusty men such as Grant Withers, Ward Bond, Jack Ford, and others of that ilk. Basically, he's a man's man.

WHEN he married Chata he not only found her physical beauty irresistible but was overcome by her spiritual tranquillity and her willingness to dedicate her entire life to him. This oneness of purpose was something he found almost difficult to believe—a woman who wanted absolutely nothing but him.

But a man sometimes is not enough. There should be children or friends. The Waynes' marriage has not been blessed with children; and Duke has spent so much of his time working far from home that there has been no one for Chata but Mamacita. Since Mamacita's ties are to the old country, there have been many, many trips to Mexico City and Acapulco. For a time Chata was sure that she had lost Duke to his work, and while she realized that a man's work came above his woman, she resented not having her share of his time.

Chata is not one for the rough, lusty, back-slapping frontier type of humor. No Latin-American girl is. In the company of Duke's friends, she has frequently felt out of place, insecure, an intruder in her own home, because discussions of fishing and politics left her cold.

This insecurity, this loneliness, this feeling of being outside the pale manifested itself in various psychosomatic illnesses.

Bo Roos, Duke's business manager, who goes down to the Scripps Clinic at La Jolla for a checkup each year, suggested that Chata check in and let the doctors give her a thorough going over.

"If anyone can find out about her skin allergy," Roos said, "these guys at the Clinic are the ones."

So Chata came and was examined, and when it was all over, the doctors shrugged and said, "Nothing organically wrong, Mr. Wayne. It's probably just nerves." But this manifestation of nervousness had something behind it and still does.

A FRIEND of Wayne's feels that Chata thinks her husband resents her mother. But Duke really likes Mrs. Bauer a lot.

Others suggest that Chata is afraid of facing life, of making her own decisions without maternal advice. They say that there is a tremendous conflict seething within her. To whom does she owe her first loyalty? To the mother who has sacrificed everything for her? Or to her husband?

When Duke was pressed for some reason why he'd returned to a wifeless home after finishing Big Jim McLain, he said, "Chata's gone down to Mexico City to buy her mother a house. After that, she's coming back here. We haven't separated or broken up or any of that stuff."

THAT Chata is willing to work hard to save her marriage, no one denies. When reporters asked her in Mexico City whether she was determined to divorce Wayne or would try to work things out, she said emphatically, "I still hope that John and I can work everything out and that we'll be back together very shortly. Of course, I can't promise definitely that we will. Nobody can, but we'll try. I always think when there's been trouble that it's a good idea to get away from Hollywood for a while and let things simmer down."

Jerry Giesler, the famous trial lawyer whom Chata had consulted last February before she and Duke were reconciled, told me, "By the time your article appears in print, we'll definitely know whether the marriage is on again or off again." END what liz told hedda!

Shortly after her divorce from Nicky Hilton, I had a heart-to-heart session with her in the small apartment she was living in. She received me in a gorgeous lace negligee; but like an impish little girl, she was barefooted. It was the first time I'd ever seen Elizabeth in a serious mood. There was no laughter in her violet eyes, which usually dance, and she was as tense as a violin string. Life had descended upon her, leaving her hurt and confused.

"Hedda," she told me then, "I'm beginning to realize that I've been riding through life on a pink cloud. But the whole thing now seems like a dream with everything so right and perfect on a fantastic scale. But I fell off that cloud with a bang. I'm glad I did. One can't go through life being a romantic—at least the way I was. You see I'm just a normal girl with the average faults and virtues. But, being a movie actress, I wasn't allowed to develop on normal lines.

"I was thrown with older people instead of kids my own age. I'm still scared of young people. The older ones protected me—perhaps in the wrong way. They said I was fine when I wasn't fine. They gave me praise when I needed criticism. I know little of responsibility; and I'm going to have to learn it the hard way. I'm even having to teach myself to pick up my clothes and put them away. You see, being a movie actress, I had all these little things done for me and took them for granted."

At that time she was dating Stanley Donen. Hollywood predicted a quick, impulsive marriage. I asked Elizabeth if she was in love with the guy. She thought the matter over carefully before answering. "No," she finally said, "I don't love him. We're good friends who have a lot of likes in common." She was obviously speaking the truth as subsequent events revealed.

Then she went to New York and was frequently seen with Montgomery Clift. The press tried to cook up a romance between them; but I laughed at that one. If they wanted romance, they had plenty of time for it while making A Place In The Sun together. I saw them do a love scene before the camera that was so passionate and realistic it shocked even me. When the scene was over, I asked, "Where in the world did you learn to make love like that, Elizabeth?" She grinningly replied, "Oh, Hedda, you ask such funny questions." It wasn't Monty. It's true that he escorted her to the premiere of The Heiress in a rented tuxedo with a studio limousine at his disposal. But he thought so little of the event that he stopped at a drive-in for a hamburger on his way to pick up Liz; and his chief concern was how the studio press agent who accompanied him was to get home after delivering him to Liz's door.

But Liz was born for romance. She went to London to make Ivanhoe and came up with Michael Wilding, who was 20 years her senior. I said, "Ye gods, here we go again. Taylor is off on another tangent!"

When Michael came to Hollywood, I had them both visit me for a very frank talk. Having gone through the same situation of marrying a man much older than I, I warned Liz in Mike's presence of the hazards of such a situation. She looked at me with those great eyes and said, "What do you think I am? A child?" I couldn't help but smile, because at that time she was 19 years old.

I then mentioned the fact that her predecessor in Mike's affections had been Marlene Dietrich, and going from a grandmother to a debutante was romance in reverse. Without boasting, Mike said, "I've gone with many women in my time."

At that Elizabeth gave him a sharp glance and asked, "Many?"

"Of course, darling," he replied. "You know how old I am."

I then broke up something that might have been a quarrel by saying, "Elizabeth, you haven't done badly for a 19-year-old girl. Remember Glenn Davis, Bill Pauley, Nicky Hilton, and Stanley Donen." Mike giggled.

After that we settled down and I gave Mike a going over that he won't forget. "I happen to be very fond of this child," I told him. "And even though she thinks she's mature, she's not. You're an experienced man of the world. You've been around, indulged, had experience." Again I pointed out the failure of my own marriage by wedding such a man. This was for Elizabeth's benefit, but she laughed in my face. "No matter what you or anybody else thinks, I love this man, and I'm going to marry him. I love him, I love him, I love him."

"You were probably saying the same thing to Stanley Donen a few months ago," I said. The idea didn't seem at all strange to her. She said, "Stanley and I are friends. I shall always be grateful for his help when I was going through a difficult time after divorcing Nicky. But Mike I love."

It was Liz who kept bringing up the subject of love. Mike was reticent about expressing his feelings. But I must say this for him. Despite my trying to talk Elizabeth out of marrying him, he held no enmity toward me. Before leaving for Europe, he called up to say, "I want to thank you again for your frankness and to say goodbye."

LIZ was back on that pink cloud again, but this time more substantially so. When Mike said in New York that he didn't consider himself engaged, it made no difference to her. She followed him to London and got her man. Immediately after the ceremony, he sighed, "Marriage is such a tiring affair," and allowed a London bobby to carry Liz through a jostling throng to a waiting limousine while he trailed along behind. When a reporter asked where they intended to spend their honeymoon, he replied, "Together, I hope." Evidently Liz just skipped such quips.

Then came the startling news that she was expecting a baby in December. I say startling because she returned home ahead of Mike to do a picture for MGM. Rumor had it that one thing that broke up her marriage to Nicky was that she didn't want a baby and he did. Liz, the talk went, was too interested in her career to take on the added responsibility of children.

This was not true. "A month after my wedding I knew we'd made a mistake. Our marriage couldn't last. So I didn't want to bring a child into the world under those circumstances," Liz explained to me. "I know about that rumor and the criticism I got. But I couldn't tell anyone the real reason for my not wanting a baby then. I hardly dared tell myself, because I wanted, oh, so very much for our marriage to succeed. I kept telling myself that it had to last, even when in my heart I knew it was ended."

Liz returned to Hollywood alone; and quickly the gossip that she and Mike were having difficulties started floating around. The fact is that MGM had given Liz a four-months (Continued on next page) honeymoon, and now the studio wanted her to come back to work. Michael couldn't come along, because he had to wait for passport clearance to come to America. This time he intends to settle in Hollywood, as MGM has him under long-term contract. The ugly rumors had it that MGM had signed Mike, because it feared Liz might take a permanent suspension to remain with her husband in England. This is also false. The studio was negotiating with Mike long before the officials knew that Liz had fallen in love with him. I went straight to the top to get this information. Dore Schary, head of production at MGM, has much to do with the hiring and firing at that studio. He told me, "We signed Wilding because he has personality, charm, and can act. He'll be very good in comedy parts; and we think we have a winner in him."

I asked Liz if she wanted to co-star with Michael in films. "Naturally," she replied.

I seem to be always popping into Liz's life when important things happen to her; so as soon as I learned she was expecting a baby, I went to see her. She was sharing her apartment with her companion-secretary, Peggy Rutledge. When I walked in, three animals were bounding around the living room. One was a miniature wire-haired dachshund; another was a French poodle. Sharing their rompings was a cat that was apparently alley bred.

Liz may have Mike, but she still can't bear not having animals, too. Apartment rules forbid pets, but I'm not letting her down by revealing her secret. By the time this article hits the stands, Liz and Mike plan to be living in their own home. And all the ex-landlord can do is scratch his head and ponder the thought that he'd harbored a miniature menagerie.

PEGGY opened the door for me, and Liz emerged from the kitchen, looking radiant and smiling at her brood of animals. I could see immediately that she was her old impish, happy, carefree self. She certainly didn't appear to be an expectant mother. She wore a low-necked, white piqué dress with a full skirt and ruffled petticoat beneath. But, miracle of miracles, she was also wearing shoes. Her hair was poodle cut and she kept tousling it all during my visit. Her waistline was still something all girls dream of having.

"Are you excited about the baby?" I asked.

"Oh, gad, yes," she replied. "Thrilled is no word to describe my feelings. We wanted very badly to have a child."

"Then you won't do your picture," I said.

"I probably will," she said. "But the studio wants to re-write the script again, and delay the starting date two months, which may complicate things."

"What did the heads of the studio think of your having a baby with a picture coming up?" I asked.

"They're in sixth heaven, especially Benny Thau and Nick Schenck. They loved the idea."

"And your mother?" I asked.

"She's in seventh heaven," Liz replied. "I don't care whether it's a boy or a girl. If it's a boy, we'll call him Michael; if a girl, Michele. Don't you like that? Michele is the feminine equivalent for Michael."

Peggy brought us slices of watermelon. I gave a bite of mine to the cat. "Freaka, the dachshund, will eat anything—cucumbers, radishes, endive," said Liz. "We just grew this watermelon in the backyard. Do you like it?"

"I got the seediest slice in the lot," I said. Liz giggled. She had seated herself with her feet on a coffee table, and started fondling a cross that hung from a chain around her neck.

"When I come to see you, you have to work, young lady," I said. "I brought a photographer along."

"Well, let's get him in here," said Liz. I gave him the high sign through a window to enter; and Liz greeted him like an old friend. He suggested that we pose together with the animals. "You'd better take the poodle," said Liz. "She hasn't spoken to me since I got home. She's jealous of the dachshund." While I held the poodle, Liz cradled the cat and dachshund in her arms. The two dogs started sizing each other up. "Get this shot over quickly before somebody gets killed," said Liz.

"So you know what married life is all about now?" I asked.

"Yes," she said. "I feel married. I'm all for it."

"What do you like about it?" I asked.

"Look straight into the camera," said the photographer.

"That was a mean question," said Liz. "I like the happiness of being married. I haven't been so happy since I was 12 years old. I never expected to have that feeling again. I like the companionship. Use all the adjectives you know and you won't have enough. I like the closeness of it and most of all the contentment. I feel just like an old cow—just sitting here gloating away. Life is so peaceful."

"But don't you miss all the excitement of running around and all the intrigue?" I asked.

"Oh, cripes!" she said.

Lady Tailspin (the cat) tired of playing with the dog, went into the dining room, jumped up on the table, and began eyeing a caged love bird. "Aren't you afraid the cat will get the bird?" I asked.

"It's a bit of a problem," said Liz. "Watch out for the kitty. She scratches."

"I don't like 'em," I said. "They always scratch me."

"Oh, they know whom to scratch," Liz roared.

She was right. Lady Tailspin gave up trying to get the bird out of the cage, moved up on a ledge, and began sniffing the flowers on my hat. Then she scratched me.

"Are you going to teach Liz to play golf?" I asked Peggy, who's very good at the game. "Now that she's expecting, she'll need exercise."

"Do I? Oh, dear!" said Liz.

"I took her to the links one day, and after three holes she was finished," said Peggy.

"I do take walks—from the living room into the bedroom," said Liz. "You can't ride horseback when you're pregnant, can you?"

"Noooo, dear," I said.

"I've just learned you're not supposed to travel either during the first three months. And here I've been flying halfway around the world."

"When did you learn that you were going to have a baby?" I asked.

"About a month ago," she said. "I wanted a baby so bad; and then I got the idea that I couldn't have one. I thought I was only half a wife, because I couldn't have children for Mike, and I'd cry on his shoulder about it."

"You're so happy, I do believe you'd give up your screen career," I said.

"I wouldn't mind giving it up," she replied. "Fortunately, however, things can be worked out so I can have both a career and a family. But it wouldn't bother me if I had to quit movies."

"Your career was never a matter of life and death with you anyway. For a 19-year-old girl . . ."

"Twenty," she corrected. "I was 20 on my honeymoon."

"Youth! It's wonderful," I said. "What happened on your honeymoon?"

"What can you print that happens on a honeymoon?" she said. "It was beautiful. There was snow 12 feet deep everywhere, but the temperature in the daytime was around 90 degrees. Everybody skied in bathing suits. We were in the French Alps, and the only English speaking people at the hotel. It was very cold at night. But with the white snow, bright sunlight, and that blue, blue sky, the days were more beautiful than you could imagine.

"We had a little balcony outside our rooms, and each day we'd go there and sit in the sun with towels around us. A friend of ours who ran a bar nearby told us later that the people trained their binoculars on that balcony when we were there. And when we'd go inside and close the shutters, they'd all drink a toast to us."

THE photographer finished his work, and the animals were released. The cat and dachshund started playfully batting their paws at each other. Liz was intrigued. "I love Freaka. We saw her picture in a paper when I was sick in bed with the flu. Mike loves dogs, too. So he rushed all over London trying to locate this particular puppy for me. He found it finally around midnight and brought her home to me.

"We had no name for that cat. The headwaiter at the 500 Club gave it to us. The pilots and stewardesses on the plane coming home gave her a new name—Lady Tailspin. Peggy, do you know what I did with that thing they signed?"

Peggy got up and found the paper. It was labeled: "Flagship Flying Report. Flying Crew. Flight 5. One small English kitten. Lord (or Lady) Tailspin. May she always land on all fours."

"She's a girl," said Liz, "so I'm calling her Lady. As soon as I have this baby, I want another. That way they'll be companions to each other without too much differences in their ages."

"Sister, wait'll MGM hears about that little scheme," I said. "The studio likes to keep their box office stars working. Maybe you shouldn't have told about your going to have this baby until you started your picture."

"I can't keep a secret," she said. "You know that. Besides, by the time it started, I'm sure they would have guessed. Maybe they'll rush the picture, so I can do it."

The white poodle was down under the coffee table chewing on something. Liz investigated, retrieved the object, and said, "Here, you can't gnaw on that Buddha. A soldier in Japan sent it to me."

"Would you like to live in England?" I asked.

"I'd love to live there in the spring," she said. "It's like no other place in the world then. But Mike can't go back for three years. He has to stay here to establish residence. Mike's sold his apartment in London and most of the furniture. The furniture was antique and we're going to get a modern house. We've both got five-year contracts at MGM."

"I hear you got a big hike in pay when you signed your new contract," said I.

"That's right," she replied. "More money. More taxes. But I don't mind."

She can use the cash. A year ago she was practically broke. She asked for no alimony from Nicky Hilton.

"Do you remember when you called me in New York, the day I flew to England?" she asked.

"Yes," I said. "The King of England had just died. And there were stories in the British papers that Mike's parents weren't too keen on your marrying their son."

"They're the sweetest people in the world—very old World type," said Liz. "The English people were wonderful to me. But when you called me in New York, I was in a real panic. After hanging up the phone, I started to cry. So I called Mike and told him I couldn't come over because people were saying it didn't look right. He said he'd try to get permission to come to America, but that we'd have only five days together. He promised to call me back. But something went wrong with the telephone and my plane was leaving in 45 minutes. So I said, 'To heck with it! I'm going to England.' The plane was already warming up when I got a call at the airport; and a man came running out to tell me that Mike was on the phone. I said, 'Tell him I'm on my way to London.' So we had four wonderful months together instead of just five days."

"Doesn't Mike have any qualities that irk you?"

"None. We're both a little lazy."

"Do you still leave your clothes lying around on the chairs and floors?" I asked. "Or does Mike pick them up for you?"

"Are you kidding?" she said. "He picks his things up, but leaves mine lying there. But I'm better about that than I used to be. If I leave things lying about, they accumulate and I can't get through the room. So I figured it was easier to pick them up as I went along."

"Have you done any cooking?" I asked.

"Just one dish—bacon and eggs," she said. "But that's Mike's favorite dinner. Lucky me."

"Why don't you go to cooking school like Shirley Temple did?"

"I don't want to be too precise with my cooking. I want to experiment. Just take a cook book and figure it out myself. But I'll need plenty of time to daddle and throw pots and pans around."

"How often do you talk to Mike?" I asked.

"Every day," she said. "We just like to hear the sound of each other's voices. He's so generous. He gave me this cross, a sapphire and diamond pin, and some long diamond earrings."

"Well, let's get a load of the loot," said I.

She brought out the jewelry and said, "I can wear the earrings long or short. They're in two pieces." She tried very hard to put the two sections together. "I can't make them stay in place. I'll have to send for Mike. He knows how they work."

"Will you have your servants call you Lady Wilding like the Douglas Fairbanks' do? They call him Sir Douglas."

"Sir Michael, Lady Wilding," she said pertly. "Oh, just call me Queenie!"

With that, I picked up what the cat had left of my hat and departed.

This is the picture of Elizabeth Taylor as of today. Quite a contrast from the confused young girl, bordering on a nervous breakdown that I interviewed just a little over a year ago. She's the little girl with—not a chip—but a chipmunk on her shoulder again. END

number three for judy

The license clerk, Katrina Lynn, says, "I didn't recognize Judy at all. She was wearing slacks and a large pair of dark glasses and her hair was tied in a bun at the back of her head. She and this fellow Luft applied for a license, and then they rode off to some ranch about 20 miles south of here."

It was a record-breaking ceremony, but at least Judy didn't get married in slacks. She wore a short-sleeved dress of navy blue but was hatless.

After the ceremony, which took place at four in the afternoon, the couple spent the night at Law ranch, then drove back to San Francisco. Judy remained to carry on with her act, and Luft returned to Hollywood where all hallelujah broke loose.

The day after the wedding, Sid was hailed into the California Superior Court where he was ordered to double the $200 monthly payments he makes to his ex-wife, actress Lynn Bari, for the support of his three-year-old son, John.

When Luft turned up in court with his attorney, he told no one of his marriage to Judy, and the supposition was that he and the singer were still engaged.

Luft was put on the stand and was asked about his financial position. He was a most uncooperative witness, and he angered the judge so much that the Bench termed his testimony "guarded, evasive . . . and nowhere near the truth," which is strong language indeed from a Superior Court judge.

On occasion Sid's sense of humor gets the better of him, and this oftentimes works against him. For example, Miss Bari's lawyer asked Luft about a motion picture manuscript entitled Man o' War, which Sid's company purportedly owns.

"Is this a manuscript or a book?" the attorney inquired.

"It's a horse," Luft snapped.

The attorney, little Sammy Hahn, blew his top at that remark. The reply, he said, was typical of "the man's character—to give such an answer under oath in a court of law. A horse," he continued, "that's what we're talking about. This man, who is too poor to pay more than $200 a month for his son, can feed three horses. When a man can feed and shoe horses, he can feed and shoe his own child."

Hahn then got around to Judy, whom he had subpoenaed into a court a month before. "She's a little Charley McCarthy," he asserted. "This girl gives him all her money. He can write as much of a check as he wants. He lives high."

The judge said that he thought Miss Garland had told the truth when she testified that she paid Luft a salary of $500 a week as her manager. "She's very vague about business matters," he said.

He then studied a list of expenses which Lynn Bari had made out as necessary for the support of her son: $200 a month for a governess, $75 a month for rent, $50 a month for nursery school, $50 a month for food and $25 for clothing.

He ordered Luft to pay these. When Judy heard about this in San Francisco she said nothing. But then came the delayed, reluctant announcement by Bob Law that Judy and Sid had been married at his ranch.

BACK into court marched little Sammy Hahn, charging that inasmuch as Sid was married to Judy when he appeared in court, he should be held in contempt, as he had failed to disclose that fact.

"My client's original complaint," the lawyer said, "alleged that Luft and Judy Garland were in a partnership, and that last year the partnership had earned more than $750,000. When they both came to court, Miss Garland denied it. Luft denied it, too, which was all right, because they weren't married then.

"But they got married on Sunday, and three days later Luft came to court still denying, still pleading poverty.

"Under California law, the day they were married he immediately got half her income. That makes him half a millionaire."

Hahn petitioned for a new hearing, and it may well be that Luft's payments for support will coincide with his increased ability to pay.

Judy says that her marriage to Sid "is the most wonderful thing in the world," and it is no secret that she credits her husband with the success of her comeback.

After all the trouble she's known in her young life, however, it seems ironic that three days following her third wedding, Judy should be back in the headlines because of her new husband's legal difficulties.

She herself had no trouble whatever in arriving at a quick financial settlement with her second husband, director Vincente Minnelli. She paid him $25,000 for his share of their house in the Hollywood hills, and he agreed to pay her $500 a month for the support of their five-year-old daughter, Liza.

Moreover, Judy's relationship with her former husband is warm and friendly. "Vincente," she says, "is one of the nicest and kindest human beings I've ever met."

Lynn Bari's opinion of Sid Luft, however, is entirely different.

In all honesty, it must be reported, that the prevailing opinion in Hollywood is that the marriage will last two or three years, no longer.

A director who has known Judy for years says, "My own feeling is that Judy is now in a state of dependency. I caught her act in Los Angeles, and I was at Romanoff's for the after-show shindig, and she still seems very neurotic to me. What that kid needs is a first-rate analyst, not a husband. She's been mixed up ever since she was a child, and I don't think she understands herself yet. As for Luft, he's a nice enough guy. But you know what happens when a husband is dependent upon his wife's talent for his main support. After a while he begins to resent her. Subconsciously he accuses her of depriving him of his manhood, of his self-respect.

"I remember a guy by the name of Harmon Nelson, who was married to Bette Davis. Ham earned his own living, too. He had an orchestra, but Bette was so domineering that he couldn't take it. After ten years he threw in the sponge. Judy isn't domineering. If anything, she's the opposite; she's ultra-dependent and emotionally immature. But let's face it. Suppose she got sick tomorrow. What would Luft have to manage?

"I don't want to sound like a pessimist. But it just doesn't seem like a healthy setup to me. I love Judy, and I pray to God I'm wrong."

MYRTLE TULLY, Judy's secretary, says, "I think Judy and Sid came along for each other exactly at the right time. Both needed help. They found it in each other. They get along very well. Judy's matured a lot these past few years, and Sid has been the man behind that improvement. No matter what anyone says, I'm sure it will be a good and lasting marriage."

For any marriage to be lasting, both partners have to contribute to each other's welfare. In this marriage, Luft is proving to Judy that she is a highly desirable woman whom he loves for herself rather than for her talent. END

e any cause at this point for any unhappiness between them?

While Piper's popularity is zooming, Tony is the first to admit that there's enough room on top for everyone.

Tony was angered in June of this year when the studio took him off salary for going away to Durango, Colorado, for five weeks with Janet Leigh, who was on location making Naked Spur with Jimmy Stewart.

"I've never been so mad in my life," the irrepressible curlyhead blurted out. "I've tried to cooperate with the studio to the best of my ability. I've gone on tours. I've done stuff over and above what was called for in the contract. And if that's the way they want to play ball, I can play that way, too."

Friends say that the suspension cut Tony to the quick, that he felt he needed someone to protect his interests—after all, Piper had Leonard Goldstein to look after hers—so he discharged his agent and signed with the Music Corporation of America, Hollywood's largest talent agency. The move helped, because it was an MCA representative who went out to Universal and got Tony back on salary.

"Look," the talent representative told the Universal crowd, "what's the sense of bickering? I pick up a trade paper, and I read how much Tony spent making long-distance calls to Janet. The studio says it paid for them. I pick up another trade paper, and there's a story of how Tony, when he was in New York, wanted a corned beef sandwich from his favorite delicatessen. The studio paid the cabfare to get him a sandwich from the Bronx. This is kid stuff. Tony's done a lot for the studio, and the studio has done a lot for him."

UPSHOT of the whole shebang was that Tony was taken back on salary and, what's more, raised to $1,000 a week.

Just about the same time, the contract of producer Leonard Goldstein expired, and he left Universal.

"I think," said a friend of Piper Laurie's when she read the news, "that Leonard's departure is a good thing for Piper. From now on whenever she does anything good, she'll get the credit instead of having it attributed to Leonard's influence. All Leonard ever did for the girl was to give her an opportunity to display her very fine dramatic talent. A few jealous cats may resent that, but everyone needs a helping hand, especially in this racket."

You can talk your jaw off, but that still doesn't mitigate or allay the existence of a feud between these two intensely ambitious youngsters, Piper and Tony.

The feeling exists in many quarters that they will never again make a picture together, not out of choice anyway. But such a feeling will undoubtedly prove wrong, since movies are not cast on basis of personal likes or dislikes.

One studio man I consulted said, "So maybe these two kids aren't crazy about each other. What of it? Who says that you have to go crazy over everyone you meet? Sometimes you meet someone, and you just don't like the way he looks. Youngsters, on the way up, they're entitled to feel their oats. Let them be a little temperamental; let them do things to spite each other. As they grow up, they get to realize how silly it is. In this business, you have to live and let live.

"There is no studio rule which compels anybody to like anybody else. Everyone on the lot, however, must be able to work together. From where I sit, Piper and Tony work together just fine, and that's the way it's got to be. They're both a pair of lovely, intelligent kids, and what differences they have, I can assure you they'll work out."

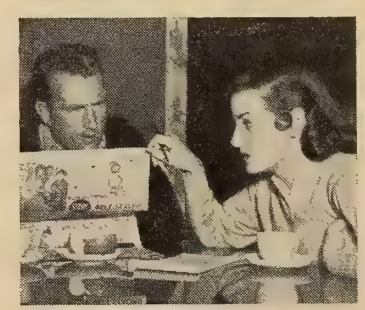
MODERN SCREEN presents a new service department in which the stars themselves trade ideas, opinions and problems with our readers. Jane Russell contributes the fifth in a series of columns being written by top Hollywood personalities.

Take my word for it



by JANE RUSSELL; star columnist for September

I like a house with a view.

Interior decorating is my dish.

I have no head for money.

My son owes me nothing.

VICTOR MATURE AND I had an interesting time the other day—we got together and compared sullen looks. There are lots of people like us in the world; they can feel happy as a delirious lark inside, yet from the outside you'd think a storm was raging. Well, maybe a person's disposition needs a little hiding . . . that way there is an agreeable surprise when you brace a sourpuss and he or she turns out to be feeling very sunny indeed! Somewhere I read that tramps make it a rule to mooch from persons who look grouchy, because they always seem anxious to prove that they are not and come across that much quicker with the dime—or is it a quarter these high-priced days?

Few things peeve me, provided I've had enough sleep the night before. All I want is nine hours—but I don't mean eight and a half! We Russells can always sleep. If we don't sleep, we can't even think, let alone get around and look normal. Everyone who makes trips with me thinks I have a ghastly way of traveling, especially on planes. I put plugs in my ears, wrap myself up in a blanket and curl up like an old snake from take-off till get-there. (And at home I sleep like a bear in a hole—the room dark, the bed and pillow soft—none of this new orthopedic hard mattress stuff for me. Not yet, anyway!) And that nine hours business figures in all my appointments. For instance, in New York, when I wanted to take in some of the hot music spots on 52nd Street, I always figured backwards from the time I had my appointment the next day. Supposing I had to make a personal appearance at 10 A.M., I'd count backwards and thus find out I could be out as late as 1:00 A.M. the night before and still get my sleep. I was able to see Slim Gaillard this way at the Downbeat Club, and I was able to attend a big party for Mel Torme at Jane Harvey's apartment where Herb Jeffries, Hazel Scott and Johnnie Johnston, among others, were present. No, I didn't pipe down and listen. I sat on the piano and gave out as loud, if not as good, as anyone! And I loved every music-filled second of it!

I LIKE DEFINITE THINGS. I like complete bop or strict symphony. Opera leaves me indifferent, or, let me be plainer and say I think it's corny. I don't mean to offend anyone who does like it, but this is how it is to me, honestly . . . one minute dramatic, the next musical, like a day that can't make up its mind if it's going to be sunshiny or rainy. I like one or the other, but not half-way. I guess I'm the same about my personal habits. I'm either dressed to kill or casual—I don't even own anything in between. Without slacks or blue jeans I'd be lost. Without a beautiful gown for a change I'd be minus the thrill I get when I do step out of an evening all a-glitter.

My professional name is Jane Russell, but it's not Miss Russell at any time, as far as I am concerned. If anyone is worried that much about addressing me, they might as well be legally correct and call me Mrs. Waterfield. But what I prefer, the simplest, is just "Jane." That's definitely yours truly at all times.

I GET TERRIBLY IMPATIENT about little things: a pin won't come loose, a door is stuck, somebody is stupid (including me). The big troubles I think I can accept without too much inner conflict . . . that is, all but one which is bothering me now. I can't get over what I consider is a dirty trick being played on young married couples today. I am talking about the tract house, the homes they are selling in most of the big housing developments. Why, in this period of picture windows, of living rooms stretched out attractively by making the kitchen space a part of them (just separated by a bar or counter), of great study being given to merging the inside of the house with the outdoors, must the same old-line dwellings be put up? Why do they insist on putting a small window in a large wall? Why not view instead of wall? It costs no more. Why not ideas instead of conventionalism, which is sometimes called tried-and-true but which I call tired-and-trite? There is a reason, of course. It's a simple one. The men who lend the money for housing projects, the bankers, are mostly old men, and they refuse to approve any plans for houses which are not like the plans they have okayed for years. They are deaf and blind to the modern touch and go dumb when such ideas come before them.

I get unhappy every time I pass such a new home settlement. I really believe that what we are building in these tracts are the slums of tomorrow. It has bothered me so much that I have been devoting a lot of my time working with an architect I know, Tom Lane, to get our ideas accepted by builders. Maybe I'll go into the business along with my husband. Last year I was offered a chance to decorate a model home in a housing tract in Pueblo, Colorado. It was part of the Hoffman development there, and I jumped at the chance. This may have been the beginning of something for me.

continued

I THINK THAT IF I WERE ASKED what I like to do more than anything else in the world, my answer would be to redecorate old, dilapidated houses. I just ache to do over a place. I am probably not great at it, my tastes may run too much to the dramatic, but I usually can figure out ways of giving almost any sort of a place some personality. I like to use shadows (meaning low-powered lamps in some areas), to dramatize, to cut up a garden so that there are spots with surprise elements, and I try for a feeling of age or tradition in the general effect. When I did my own house I had the help of Harriet Shellenberger, one of the best interior decorators in California. She encouraged me on my passion for Chinese guk (my house looks like something peeking out from behind a statue of Buddha) and advised on materials. I didn't go so much for patterns or prints, more for solid colors and modern designs. I was able to go in for heavier, silky fabrics rather than cotton, so I did. But a lot of what I have could be had in cotton if the other came too expensive. My furniture is from the Baker Company and mainly copies of old Chinese designs. For a personal touch I created my own dinnerware—large, square plates of pouf umber with gold dripping around the edges. (Pouf umber is what I call the color you get when you mix raw umber and burned umber together. Some people call it mud, but I like it so much that my whole living room is done in it.)

I JUST HAVEN'T A HEAD FOR MONEY. I guess, and refuse to think about it. They are still talking at the studio about the time I was put on a plane for London and somebody got suspicious and asked me if I had any funds. We went through my purse and found three dollars! Tom Lane and I went to a downtown Los Angeles church once, where we joined the choir—he with the bassos and I with the feminine contingent. Came collection time and I knew I hadn't a dime. But I had a scrap of paper and a pencil. I passed a note all the way across the choir to Tom. It read, "Can you give your Aunt Jane a little money to put in the pot?" He did.

Because of my habit of coming home with a new table or the like when I go out to buy a dress, Robert sometimes comes home with a new dress for me when he goes out for a shave and a haircut. He has bought me a barbecue dress, sweaters and other wearing apparel. His taste is surprisingly good. As he had come to learn, I am not one of the ten best dressed women in America; maybe he's fighting to keep me from being one of the ten worst! He knows what I like. He knows I don't like knicknacks (he's no knicknack himself!), but he thinks I should spend a bit more time on wardrobe details.

In a way I do. I have quite a collection of lotions and creams, and I use them pretty steadily. I'm one of those girls who uses a dark lipstick to outline the lips and a lighter lipstick for the inside. I'm still looking for the right lipstick. I like to paint my fingernails and my toenails in the summertime—beach time I should say. I use mascara, and I know enough to start making up with a clean skin and, no matter what happens, to keep the hair out of my eyes. I don't think a tall girl looks so well using the peek-a-boo technique, although, as you know, you wouldn't have to go far to find a photograph of me in just such a pose.

Unless it says so in a picture script, and only in a picture script, I don't wear strapless dresses. I have no arguments against them for anyone else except that they are darned uncomfortable. I like halter tops with everything. So in wardrobe I am afraid I am not too selective, and certainly not in flowers, since my favorite, because it grows easy and gives you the most fun, is the lowly geranium. Start them anywhere and there they are, in almost any color, any combination you want.

THE PERFUME THAT INSPIRES ME the most is Charbert's Breathless, which is probably a wrong way to pick perfume since you should consider the effect it has on others. Well, if I don't consider this, I do think about other people a lot. I have plenty of opportunity in my business. One of my pastimes is psychoanalyzing people; putting them into certain pigeonholes, and it is surprising how accurate you can be at this if you don't use snap judgment. I am most suspicious of "pushy" people, the kind who don't give you a chance to make up your mind about them but just assume they will be liked. They come on too fast; they have their foot in the door while you are still wondering whether you should have opened it in the first place.

Oh well, it is all in the way you have been brought up, I suppose . . . but maybe that's too simple. I was brought up on plain food, for instance, and I love the more garish dishes —Mexican, Spanish, Russian, grapeleaves with meat and rice and that sort of stuff. This last is an Armenian delicacy.

WHAT I MEAN ABOUT CHILDREN is that properly raised they mature with individualities of their own; wrongly developed they are mixtures of undecided traits and characteristics. I don't care for parents who promote childish fears as disciplinary aids. I don't care for parents who hope their children will live in ignorance of what life is about as long as possible. I think children should be, as a Bible phrase has it, "Wise as serpents and harmless as doves." My number one peeve, however, is the mother or father who keeps harping at their children about how much they owe their parents. A child owes nothing to his father or mother. All this business of "After all I've done for you!" is so much mouthwash. If your child doesn't love you, it is your own fault. You have been too assertive, too demanding, perhaps. There is only one way to get love and that is to win it. The very fact that you don't have it is all the proof necessary that you don't deserve it.

My Tracy is ten months old now. My Thomas is two years old. She is almost as big as he. They are full of love . . . so full that they can't help giving me lots of it if I am a nice person. If I am not, there is nothing they can do about it. It will be my fault.

hollywood's most disliked woman

Zza Zza Gabor boasts no freckled nose or healthy tan. She is less of a tomboy than Whistler's Mother. She has been quoted as speaking of slacks as proper attire only for lady plumbers. She would rather be seen in a pine box than a pair of blue jeans; and she thinks exercise is all right for weight lifters but not for a lady of gentility. She is a stickler for morality, however, and proves it by having little more than a cool nod for men she isn't or can't be in love with. The fact that Zza Zza's romantic urge is so overdeveloped that she finds something lovable in almost every man she meets keeps her life from becoming dull and is largely responsible for her reputation as a love thief.

As she herself puts it, "I like mens!"

A newly crowned starlet long on curves and short on intellect, upon being shown a picture of the Venus de' Medici shrilled, "A medical Venus. That's a new one on me!"
Bennett Cerf in This Week

The Gabor type of loveliness is heady. She is what a man would hope to see if he passed a lady's Turkish bath and someone had forgotten to pull the shades. Her hair, which changes color at her whim but is generally reddish-blonde, is never done in a prim coiffure but is delightfully and carefully wispy. Her skin is like white satin. Her eyes are blue and cool and rather small, but generously circled with thick lashes much darker than her hair. Her nose and mouth are classic and her jaw line sweeping and youthful. Her expression is mobile, impish one instant and adoring the next.

Below the neck, Zza Zza Gabor is happily proportioned. Her measurements, 36-24-36, are better than average, but it's the way she uses her body that is really outstanding. Even at ease she looks as though a good deep breath would make her more comfortable, but she won't take it. And her neckline is a constant source of irritation to all other women.

No film celebrity has a background to compare with Miss Zza Zza Gabor. She was born—only her mother knows exactly when—in Hungary, and is one of three daughters of an aristocratic family. Her father was an exceedingly well-off army officer. Her training from birth, supervised by her lovely mother, Jolie, was directed almost entirely toward the day when she would be set free among a world full of handsome rich men. The arts of batting eyelashes and listening to baritone voices with an expression of complete attention and suppressed passion were instinctive, but were improved upon by Jolie. And Zza Zza was taught to accept a jewel or fur with infinite grace and gratitude, while at the same time taking it as something quite her due. It is these things that make Zza Zza different from other, less gifted women. And these things, also, which cause her to be disliked so intensely by her own kind.

At the age of 16, a time when the average American girl is in love with both Tony Curtis and the captain of the basketball team at school, Zza Zza experienced her first mad passion. She fell in love with a gentleman quite her senior by the name of Burhan Belge, head of the Turkish Ministry of Information. He was anxious to get married, but Turkish law forbade a career member of the government service from marrying a foreigner. It was a poser, but Zza Zza turned her face toward the President of Turkey and he promptly proclaimed Turks and Hungarians brothers, making the marriage possible.

The next two years of her life held enough adventure to last most girls a lifetime. Ankara, Turkey's capital, was the scene of some of the most exciting international intrigue in history. A recent movie, Five Fingers, exposed the period. Zza Zza flitted through the international quarters of the city like a butterfly in a swarm of horse flies. She had friends—and admirers—on all sides of the conflict that was raging. A high official in the British Embassy was insane about her, as were a number of the Axis supporters. And to balance things, the president of the country found himself unable to restrain himself in her presence. Zza Zza, totally and truly unaware that anything except good company, flirtations and excitement counted, soon found herself obliged to leave her husband and the East for a less explosive atmosphere.

On the journey that finally brought her to America in 1941, she experienced most of the incidents one would expect her lusty beauty to lead her into. She was arrested as a spy in Bagdad, suspected of being one in numerous other places, and shuttled around as quickly as nervous espionage detectives could arrange transportation. In England she was a guest of the King and Queen, as well as H. G. Wells, G. B. Shaw and other notables. And she arrived in this country, broke but eager to face a new life.

Although she came to Hollywood shortly after arriving in America, so she could be with her sister, Eva, who was then under contract to Paramount, Zza Zza had no desire to begin a theatrical career. The movies were too tame for a girl who had lived, and wanted to continue to live, the genuine article. She spent a period as a hausfrau, Zza Zza's own improper term, and then married the richest man she knew, Conrad Hilton, the hotel magnate. She became the mistress of his household and, ironically, "Mom" to Hilton's two fun-loving sons. And she missed by an eyelash becoming Elizabeth Taylor's mother-in-law.

When her marriage to Conrad Hilton ended, Zza Zza walked away with a chummy handshake and a fortune in gems and property. She has a five-year-old daughter, Francesca, as a result of that marriage. For a period after that Zza Zza played the local field of admirers, taking time out occasionally to act as hostess at her ex-husband's social affairs. Then she met George Sanders.

Those who knew Sanders intimately could hardly believe what they saw happening. Noted as a man who lived for his own pleasure and a man unimpressed by any feminine qualities, Sanders fell hook, line and fishing pole for Miss Gabor. He began to smile in public and actually (Continued on next page)

Rabbit eye tests prove

Zonite's absolute safety to body tissues

in Feminine Hygiene

Read Why You Should Never Use Weak Homemade Solutions of Vinegar for This Intimate Purpose

Feminine hygiene (including internal cleanliness) is a sane, wholesome practice among women. It's so important for health, married happiness, after their periods and for deodorizing problems. This has been verified among doctors.

The vital question is what antiseptic to use in the douche. Your antiseptic should be a powerful germ killer and one that protects against offensive odors. Yet it should be SO SAFE it could be accidentally SWALLOWED WITH SAFETY. ZONITE fulfills these requirements. ZONITE is bringing confidence to women by the thousands.

Proof of ZONITE'S Safety to Tissues

The membranes of a rabbit's eye are even more delicate than membranes in the vaginal tract. Laboratory tests show that ZONITE as used in the douche was put twice daily for three months into rabbits' eyes. Not the slightest irritation appeared at any time. But ZONITE's safe qualities are not based on rabbit eye tests alone but on clinical tests by a famous surgeon and scientist, and on actual use by thousands of enthusiastic women for 30 years.

No other type liquid antiseptic-germicide of all those tested for the douche is SO POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues as ZONITE.

Warns Against Use of Vinegar

What intelligent woman would ever use vinegar as a deodorant? What woman would pour vinegar over an open cut and expect germicidal protection? Vinegar has many valuable uses. But any intelligent woman would never use such homemade solutions for a cleansing douche. A woman needs and deserves ZONITE's germicidal and deodorizing action.

ZONITE'S Miracle-Action

ZONITE completely deodorizes. It flushes away odor-causing waste substances. It helps prevent infection and kills every germ it reaches. It's not always possible to contact all germs in the tract, but you can be sure ZONITE immediately kills every reachable germ. Always use as directed.

(Continued from preceding page) admitted he was smitten. Zza Zza dangled Sanders from the tips of her fingers. And when the mood and the madness of the man's passion suited her, she married him.

Because you can't change an old dog but can teach him new tricks, the Sanders marriage was different from the outset. George slipped back a bit into his narrow cloister, and Zza Zza went along in her gay, usual way. Finally, Hollywood discovered that she was accepting dates without apparently disrupting her home; nor did she seem to mind when George's eye fell on another woman. Separations followed without either one appearing to mind it too much.

As of this moment, nothing has been resolved about this marriage. Zza Zza lives in a huge home in Bel Air's swankiest section. George is about somewhere. On the day MODERN SCREEN interviewed Zza Zza, the reporter happened to look through a window and see Sanders drive off toward town. He expressed some surprise, having heard that the husband had moved out again.

"Oh, zat is nossing," said Zza Zza, with a wave of a hand that wore a 22 carat diamond, "he is just a guest here."

ZZA ZZA might have lived the rest of her days without ever making a professional appearance if it had not been for an incident while the family was entertaining the James Masons one night early in 1951. Zza Zza was telling Mrs. Mason that a television producer had approached her and asked her to make an appearance on the now famous Bachelor's Haven program.

"Ridiculous!" George snorted. "She's too dumb to do anything on television."

It would be an understatement to state that Zza Zza has proven differently. Within a matter of weeks she had become notorious as a woman who said exactly what she meant—and who meant plenty. Something in the Iconoscope she faced each Sunday night heightened her natural beauty and she came into living rooms more exotically beautiful than ever. Her butchery of the English language rocked even the poker-faces of Movietown with laughter. Zza Zza became a star.

But with stardom came the hatred she ignores so elegantly today. Although she is ostensibly on the side of the ladies on her program, she shifts at the first sign of a real battle to the male point of view. This is distracting to her professional foe, Paul Coates, a Los Angeles columnist, but downright infuriating to girls who sit with bared teeth before their TV sets at home. In the first place, they calculate, she just can't look that good. And in the second, she's obviously just after every man she sees. It has gotten so women who have husbands she hasn't seen object to her. And the only thing that keeps Bachelor's Haven from becoming the highest rated television program in its area are the iron hands of wives turning the sets off when Zza Zza smiles into the camera.

Zza Zza Gabor's entry into movies came as a result of her television show. Mervyn Leroy, preparing a picture called Lovely To Look At needed a foreign woman whom men could be counted on to look at. He called Zza Zza, after seeing her on the show, and asked her if she'd like to test for the role. Zza Zza indignantly informed him that she most certainly would not test. She could be seen on TV. That was test enough. Leroy opined as it probably was and hired her anyway. During the making of this picture, Zza Zza was teamed with Kathryn Grayson, Marge Champion and Ann Miller. She vows these girls swear the sun rises and sets on her, but, being women, it seems unlikely.

THERE is such an air of competence about Zza Zza Gabor that Hollywood women refuse to consider it as part of the reason her screen career is forging ahead. They prefer to blind themselves to her talent and unique charm, and hint that she capitalizes on her over-stimulated glands to get ahead.

"It is so silly," says Zza Zza about this. "People are always saying I make love to my producers or directors. Such nonsense. They say I am in love with everybody, and every man is in love with me. They say Mervyn Leroy was in love with me at MGM, and Nunally Johnson at Fox. And now they say John Huston, who I will work for in Paris, is my lover. This man I have never even met yet! And all of these men are happily married to other women!"

Because of her almost terrifying candor, you can bet that Zza Zza's statement is true. But it cannot be denied that any wife whose husband comes into intimate contact with Miss Gabor will spend a couple of extra hours a week in a beauty parlor. No woman, no matter how substantial her marriage, could possibly ignor the Gabor risk.

Zza Zza's opinions of Hollywood women are given at the drop of a suggestion.

Farley Granger's quote to a newspaperman when Shelley married Vittorio: "I'm surprised. I always thought Shelley would marry Shelley."

"Everything is wrong here," she said recently. "A woman in the movies gets up at five o'clock in the morning. At seven she is seated in a beauty parlor chair having her hair done and her face made beautiful. At nine o'clock she is standing in a lovely living room, dressed in an exquisite evening gown, and she spends the day until six o'clock playing a romance with a lot of handsome men. So when she gets home in the evening, she takes it all off and walks around in old clothes or a comfortable bath robe. No wonder the men get sick of them."

Zza Zza expresses the opinion, also, that the Hollywood men are spoiled.

"There are too many beautiful women here," she stated as though it was an interesting lie. "A man must shove his way through them to get into a night club. Consequently, the men are not as cavalier as they should be. Some of the beautiful women here should go away. Things would be better."

Men, according to Zza Zza, should be dangled on strings rather than have their wills catered to. No man, she feels, should be given an inkling that he is anything more than a temporary toy that might well be discarded the day after Christmas. And she feels strongly that women in Hollywood lack candor. One of her acquaintances, a very beautiful actress, once sold gloves in a department store and now never mentions it.

"It is so silly," says Zza Zza. "How interesting it would be for her to say to a mans, 'Once I used to sold gloves for a living.' He would like her better."

This attitude is considered undercover hatchet work by Zza Zza's contemporaries, who are quite sure telling a man the low points in a glamor girl's background is almost a certain way to lose him. She's a liar and a giver of bad advice, they cry.

When she is in the mood to confess her real opinions, Zza Zza will repeat a favorite expression which seems to imply that Hollywood girls are something less than all-around prize packages.

"The girls in Hollywood," she says, "are not on a par with European women. In Hollywood a woman is a nothing. In New York a woman is a telephone number. But in Paris a woman is a woman!"

Yes, Zza Zza Gabor is a revolutionary. By instinct and training she is a predatory creature not willing to share a male bone with any other female. She has the attributes which make her plundering easy—and she must go through life, and her movie career, which now looms formidably, on a solo safari, wary ever of the spears of her own kind.

MODERN SCREEN asked her for a single incident which would prove her contention that women really like her.

"Very well," Zza Zza said, "last Christmas Eve I was at a party and somebody introduced me to Ethel Barrymore. Miss Barrymore was very kind to me. She said she liked me on the television and admired me very much. She wanted to be my friend. You see?"

We saw, but we left without making an issue of the fact that Miss Barrymore is roosting on 70, and more than likely no longer cares. Forty years ago, she'd probably have cut Zza Zza down with a Christmas tree icicle! END the house that spells welcome

In addition to the patio in the middle of the structure, there's a lanai on the far side that runs the full width of the building. This outdoor living area serves as a second living room. The roof over the terrace is made of translucent glass, giving off a lovely soft light to the open porch. The tile floor is partly covered with hemp rugs, and Linda had a great time filling the outdoor room with comfortable black and rattan lanai furniture. It's a terrific spot for a party as any member of the movie colony's social set will testify.

SHORTLY after they adjusted themselves to their house, Ty and Linda decided to give a housewarming.

The Powers rigged a tent over the patio, hired an orchestra, and rented a dance floor. They strung plastic curtains along the edge of the lanai as a protection against the California night air, then set ten tables for ten on the lanai.

Not satisfied with looking like a queen for this occasion, Linda decided to prepare some of the dinner. She can cook in five languages, too. The dinner that night was so sensational that before it was over, every woman in the house was pleading with Linda for a set of recipes.

Before Ty and Linda purchased the residence they now occupy, they insisted upon a couple of re-modeling ideas they had in mind. Ty particularly wanted some kind of projection booth so that he could show 16 mm. movies in the living room, and he also wanted a study and a bath nearby. Linda's remodeling ideas centered about a diet kitchen next to the nursery upstairs. And, of course, they both wanted a swimming pool.

Putting in the pool was quite a job. A good portion of land had to be cleared of trees and undergrowth to make room for a 35-foot tank. Workmen brought in truckloads of dirt trying to terrace down to a level plot. It cost a pile of money, but for people who love to swim in a heated pool all year round, it was worth it.

When it came to the interior, Linda insisted that it be furnished with custom-made pieces (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) of her own design. She's a creative person with very definite likes. In every case she knew the effect she wanted the room to bear. To make certain that her furnishings would lend themselves to that effect, she enlisted the services of Paul Fox from 20th Century-Fox's art department. A man whose daily job consists of executing fabulous script ideas for decoration, Fox had no trouble in following Linda's designs.

All the upholstered pieces in the Power living room are modern but based upon old motifs from other countries. The couch, for example, is made of foam rubber set on a wooden base but it's definitely Moroccan in feeling. The bench in front of the fireplace is copied from a Hawaiian hikie.

The dining room is small but surprisingly expandable. There is one large rectangular table that seats six. Then along the wall there are two console tables that serve as sideboards, but they can be pushed against the end of the long table or they can be fitted together to form a separate table. Linda is having still another pair made so that she can seat 20 people at three tables.

Linda so arranged her furniture that when you step into the living room and look through to the dining room, you don't see a table and chairs but a mirrored screen that gives a feeling of great depth to the two rooms.

Like most Californians, the Powers do a good deal of outdoor living. They use their patio so much that a complete set of china is stored outside in the great Italian dresser. China and dresser were wedding gifts from Henry Hathaway who directed Ty in Prince Of Foxes and originally used the stuff as props.

Most of the pieces inside the bedroom come from Ty's old Brentwood home. Linda liked and kept them. Only the huge bed and commode covered in white calfskin are new.

When he's home, Ty spends a good deal of time in the den he had built for himself. The bleached birch walls are perfect backdrops for his framed playbills and etchings.

All in all, the house seems to radiate an atmosphere of worldiness and solid reliability. A visitor who was taken through recently by Linda turned to his hostess and said, "My dear, if your marriage is as good as your house, it will last a long, long time."

Linda smiled. "Por supuesto," she said, which is Spanish for "of course."

(Tyrone Power can soon be seen in 20th Century-Fox's Pony Soldier.)

(Continued from page 61) sat back and purred over the knowledge that they had once again picked a winner.

And while they were busy congratulating themselves, Anne momentarily and quietly slipped out of their fingers and into the arms of Bamlet Price, Jr., a dark, handsome veteran bomber pilot. The young couple, who had told no one of their plans, were married in a surprise ceremony, with only a few close friends and relatives present. Then followed a week's honeymoon trip to Santa Barbara, Carmel, San Francisco and Yosemite. For Anne, who's looking forward to raising a family, her marriage is by far the happiest achievement of her first 14 months in Hollywood.

That she landed in Hollywood at all is no surprise to Anne. When she was five years old she painstakingly scrawled her first written sentence—"I want to be a movie star." The paper still rests with other mementos in a beribboned box tucked away in the family home.

The childish hope for the future may have been coincidence, but Anne's talent was not. From the time she was six years old, most of her waking hours were spent before a photographer's camera, a microphone, a theater audience or a television camera. She was kept so busy as a photographer's model and an actress that public school was out of the question and tutors were hired to educate her. Back in those days, Anne sometimes envied the kids who went to P.S. No. 74. They went skating and swimming in the afternoons, and Anne sometimes wished she could join them instead of going downtown to pose for another magazine cover. But these were only fleeting moments of regret, for Anne liked her work. Now she feels it has been more than worthwhile.

She claims to have worn out two tutors before Miss Quinn came along. To Anne, then 13, the 20-year-old Miss Quinn seemed ancient and very wise. The teacher had a way of spreading her own enthusiasm for learning. Mathematics and geography were brushed over in a cursory manner, and then the Misses Quinn and Francis really got down to brass tacks in a discussion of philosophy and life in general that went to a depth shunned by the average adolescent.

Anne is an exceptionally mature girl for her age, a natural result of her having spent so much time with adults. She has none of the giddiness associated with most girls of college age, and when occasionally she catches herself acting gayer than she feels, she pulls herself up short. She loves people, but as individuals and not in crowds. At a party she prefers to sit quietly in a corner and observe rather than join in the small talk. She likes to meet people slowly and take her time in getting to know them. Nothing irritates her so much as a new acquaintance who pushes too fast for a friendship.

People have described Anne as reserved, but it is not quite the proper word, for although she shows a great deal of restraint, her personality bubbles around the edges and there is a suspicion that she is holding back an innate gaiety. Perhaps it can be explained by the fact that early in life her career put the cap on an effervescent personality.

When Anne was still an infant, the family moved from Ossining to a small town in New York called Yorktown Heights. It was a country life, and Anne loved it. There were woods to roam and horses to ride and chickens in the back yard. Once in a while her mother would take her into New York City, only an hour away, to pose for a magazine cover. But back at home she could take off the fancy clothes, climb into something more comfortable, whistle to her dog and be off again to the fields. Then, when Anne was seven, the Francises lost their home. They moved into Manhattan where her father got a job selling at Macy's and her mother picked up occasional work. The transition from overalls and bare feet to patent leather shoes and hat was made suddenly, and Anne simmered with resentment against the necessity of "looking like a lady." She was a tomboy at heart—the fire escapes in back of the tiny three-room apartment were a sorry substitute for the meadows she had known.

But her career boomed. While she went on being a junior cover girl, she also entered radio, eventually becoming known as the Princess of soap opera. She was the first child actress to have her own television show, and for many years was much in demand as a fashion model. She worked in summer stock, and on Broadway portrayed Gertrude Lawrence as a child in Lady In The Dark. In between jobs she visited agencies with her mother, looking for work. Even at the age of seven Anne was a true professional and knew instinctively the kind of smile or type of expression wanted by a photographer.

Her earnings were spasmodic, and most of the time infinitesimal. The Sunday radio program she called her own brought the munificent salary of two dollars per show. Anne worked not to add to the family coffers, but because she wanted to. The money she made was "put back into the business," spent for clothes and her studies in dramatics, piano and singing, and for the other lessons that filled her days. Nevertheless, her parents were well aware that such a professional life was apt to spoil Anne, and they did everything in their power to keep her a normal youngster. There had been three babies before her, none of whom had lived, and it was difficult to deny Anne anything. They tried to teach her the value of money. Anne recalls one method in particular—if she was willing to walk the 12 blocks to Rockefeller Center, she could spend the bus fare saved for a book of paper dolls.

ANNE was taught that a young lady never shows anger or temper or any extreme emotion, and in her effort to cooperate she bottled up a natural exuberance. Her emotions have been released in her acting, and Anne says today that if she hadn't chosen to be an actress, she would now be a potential explosion.

This early training in restraint made her self-conscious, and her shyness increased when she began working with other professional children in New York. The others considered her odd because she was from the country, and although she made friends quickly, her whole life was to be affected by one particularly vicious small female who, jealous of Anne's success, managed to turn her friends against her. Anne didn't understand; she would find one good friend or a group of friends and be happy in their companionship until suddenly they would drift away from her, and sometimes even avoid speaking to her. The reserve that people notice in Anne today is the outcome of this experience, which happened in the sensitive years when she was entering her teens.

The change didn't affect her career. It went right on soaring, and at about the same time her father found a more remunerative job. The family bought a house on Long Island, in East Rockaway, on the water. It was only a summer place, but Anne and her parents made it into a permanent residence. With the rise in the family fortunes she felt the world was growing brighter. Hollywood, by this time, was her affirmed goal. She haunted the neighborhood movie theaters and worshipped Alan Ladd from afar. To Anne, Maureen O'Hara was the most beautiful thing that ever flashed across a screen. "She looks the way a heroine should look," Anne used to say.

She didn't have long to wait, for when she was 15 MGM beckoned and gave her a one-year contract. Career-wise, it turned out to be the biggest disappointment of Anne's life. She sat for the whole year, waiting for a role, and got nothing more than a brief walk-on part in a Mickey Rooney comedy. She found herself in front of the broom when the studio swept out a lot of young hopefuls at the end of the year, and, disheartened, she went back home. Not long after, she was given a role in So Young, So Bad, a film about juvenile delinquency that was made in New York. On the strength of her work in it she was brought to 20th.

IT WAS, of course, the turning point in Anne's life. Her mother came to Hollywood with her and stayed for almost a year, during which time the mother-and-daughter team was swamped with pitiful letters from Mr. Francis, inquiring how to make an omelette and what herbs to put in a stew. After nine months Mrs. Francis felt that Anne was well enough established in her new home and went back to take over the kitchen in East Rockaway, much to her husband's relief.

Neither parent felt any qualms about leaving Anne on her own. They would miss her, certainly, but from the first they had known that Anne was destined for a career and would one day want to leave the nest. They had every reason for confidence in their daughter. Anne was set to work in pictures immediately, and took the whole thing with a serenity that surprised Hollywood. No one knowing Anne's background, however, could expect her to be non-plussed. She had behind her years of experience in every medium of show business, and neither cameras nor fame were unknown to her.

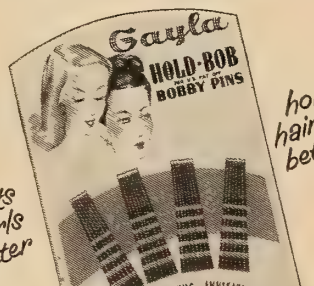
Anne has made a great many friends in Hollywood, but, unlike most newcomers, she hasn't attached herself to one of the social cliques of the town. Her friends are mostly actors and actresses who are struggling along without contracts. They're all around Anne's age, and they are people who understand her, friends with whom she feels comfortable.

Before she met Bam, she was perfectly content to be by herself of an evening, reading, painting, or playing the piano. She's a quiet, self contained person, and there's never been the urge for her, as there is with most people, to always be with others. Sometimes she would eat out alone at a Westwood restaurant where she knew the piano player and the waitresses. Customers often turned to look at the attractive blonde sitting by herself in a corner and wonder, and Anne looked and wondered right back.

NOW all that has changed. Anne and Bam (a family surname) were introduced for the first time by mutual friends last August. Later, when Anne moved to Westwood, she discovered that Bam had an apartment right next door. She also found out they had much in common, and they used to sit for hours discussing their ideas about life and work.

Bam, who's studying for a Ph.D. in motion picture production, wants eventually to teach in the field of educational films. He is currently writing, producing and directing a short documentary on the evil effects of dope, and Anne is serving as his assistant director and producer. The two spent a recent week end scouting locations for the film near Lancaster, and finally discovering an ideal spot—a Joshua tree and cactus stretch that resembles the country around the Mexican border.

At the moment they are living in one apartment and using Bam's as a studio and workroom. But they hope soon to find a larger place, perhaps a small bungalow house.



For an actress who has been in Hollywood such a short time, Anne seems to have her life well in hand. She knows what she wants, and if she is still a bit self-conscious in a crowded room, she is confident before the cameras. She is serious about her work and her marriage, and she is constantly seeking self-improvement.

How do I know, Anna-Britta, if this is the great happiness? I understand that this is the big adventure. But who knows the end? Now about Petter. Why don't I stay? Why don't I marry a Lindstromer? Because far inside we have grown apart. We all have happy memories. Petter took me as a little girl and moulded me, taught me everything. But now I want to develop more, and Petter does not fly where I want to fly. Petter with his hardheadedness, uprightness, and stubbornness cannot understand it. Maybe nobody understands. But I hope that you understand that I never will hate Petter. If I do hate someone, it is myself who has ruined a home, who has caused worldwide scandal.

To calm my bad conscience I am telling myself: I think Petter without me, without having to be the husband of a movie star and live in Hollywood, will better find himself. Now he is on his own and with a great career ahead of him. He has always said that work for a person is the most important thing and comes first in life.

I think that Pia when she has overcome the first shock, also will grow up to become a better and richer person. Life in Hollywood is not good for a child. To have everything, and only have friends who also have everything, what is she going to do in life if she once should not come into not so good circumstances. Now she can go to school with "normal children," and she can come to me and see the "world". Maybe some year she could go to school in Switzerland. She will get a wider view of life and by seeing different sides of the world she will learn and understand more.

Dear, such a long letter. I am now finally finishing and hug you with all my heart.

Ingrid

P.S.—I am so occupied with my own problems that I did not ask how you are and how things are with you and Lena. I hope everything is well. Write again soon . . .

The above is a translation from Swedish of a letter consisting of five handwritten pages, dated Rome, Sept. 3, 1949, addressed to Karaste Anna-Britta and signed Ingrid. Testified to by pia lindstrom testifies

A No. I think I threw most of them away, because we are moving. I don't like to clutter up my desk. I don't want to keep any letters or messages.

Q Have you kept any of the letters that your mother sent you?

A I probably kept a few. They are probably around somewhere, but I don't keep track of them.

Q Did you show your father some of the letters that your mother had sent you?

A I might have shown him a few of them but I don't show them all to him, just if I feel like showing him a letter, or something; just something funny, or something.

Q Now, generally in the letters that you have thrown away, did your mother tell you in each of those letters, Miss Lindstrom, if you can remember, that she loves you?

A Well, at the end of the letters she always says, "Miss you. Love, Mama."

Q Would you have any objection to seeing this little baby, Robertino?

A Not this year. I mean, I don't want to see him this year.

Q Would you have any objection to seeing the expected twins, assuming that they are born and that they are twins?

A Oh, well, I would like to see them, but I would like to see them in Pittsburgh.

Q You would like to see them where?

A In Pittsburgh, because that is where we will be, and I don't want to go to Europe this summer.

Q Have you ever had any association with small children?

A Yes.

Q Little babies within the age of a year or two?

A Friends, neighbors have babies.

Q You like children, don't you?

A Well, I am a child myself. I guess I like them.

Q When you saw your mother in England in the summer of 1951, did your mother tell you about the home that she lived in, in Rome?

A Yes.

Q Did she tell you at that time that she would like for you to come and visit with her in her home in Rome?

A Yes.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: Did you tell your mother at that time, in England, that you would like to visit with her in Italy?

A No.

Q You desire to stay in, I think you said, Pittsburgh or near Pittsburgh, this summer?

A Yes.

Q Why is that?

A Because I would like to get acquainted with my school and with the people living around, and I have never been there before, so I would like to get acquainted with them before I start school there.

Q What time does school start there, do you know?

A No, I don't know. It probably starts at eight o'clock or nine, I guess.

Q No. My question was perhaps not definite enough. What I mean is, about what date does school start, if you know?

A Oh, well, it starts in September; about September 12th, I guess.

Q About three months from now. Would you object to taking a trip someplace for a few weeks prior to the commencement of school?

A Yes, I would.

Q Do you think that you would not have an opportunity, if you took a trip for a few weeks, to become acquainted with your environment?

A Oh, I probably would have a chance, but I mean even if I did visit my mother, it takes a few days to get there and it takes a few days to get back, and we were just there last summer. I don't see any point in going again.

Q I didn't specifically mean, Miss Lindstrom, about going to see your mother. I mean, would you have any objection to taking a trip for a while before you commenced your school in September?

A If we went up for a few weeks up to the mountains, or something like that, that would be all right.

Q Tell me, did you enjoy the meeting that you had with your mother in England?

A It was all right.

Q Were you happy to see her?

A Yes.

Q And she was happy to see you, wasn't she?

A Yes.

Q You didn't object to seeing your mother in England?

A No, except I wanted to get to Sweden, because I expected to meet her in Sweden, and I wanted to see my relatives.

Q You like Sweden, don't you?

A Yes.

THE COURT: Were you born there, Pia?

THE WITNESS: Yes, I was.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: Would you object to going back to Sweden for a while to see your relatives?

A Well, not during this summer.

Q Was there anything unpleasant that happened between you and your mother during your visit?

A Well, it wasn't unpleasant. My mother argued with my father. It wasn't unpleasant for me, because I wasn't arguing.

Q And was this the time that your mother said that she would like to keep you permanently?

A No. They were arguing over stolen money.

Q That is, your father and your mother were arguing over stolen money?

A Somebody stole money.

Q Wasn't it a fact that they were arguing over whether or not she could keep you permanently?

A No; they were arguing over money.

Q Is that the only thing they were arguing over?

A Well, when I was sitting at the table, yes. It was during dinner.

Q But during all the time that you were in England, is this the only time that they argued about money?

A Well, they might have argued when I was in bed, or something.

Q Did you ever hear your mother say that she would like to keep you permanently?

A No.

Q Your mother told your father in front of you, didn't she, Pia, that she had a right to take you wherever she wanted to?

A Yes.

Q Do you remember when you and your mother were in bed together in England, that one night?

A One night?

Q Didn't you sleep together one night, you and your mother?

A No; we slept together three nights. Well, maybe it was two nights. We slept one night at friends, and one night at Mr. Bernstein's farm. Maybe it was two nights. I think it was two nights.

Q One night you slept together at the Leans, did you not?

A Yes. I don't remember how many times, but it was more than once we slept together.

Q Whether it was once or twice or three times, do you remember one conversation that you had before you and your mother went to sleep?

A Yes.

Q What was the subject of the conversation? What did you say and what did mama say?

A Well, we had been reading this book that had modern art pictures, and there was one picture that had an eye, and a big foot, and a rock, and a bird and a bush, and we were laughing because the picture was supposed to be of a man kicking a rock, and the stone flying at a bird and knocking this bird out of a bush. That was the conversation.

Q Any other conversations?

A Oh, yes. I ruined a pair of shoes. I stepped in a lot of mud, and I had to throw my shoes away. We talked about my shoes.

Q Any other conversations that you had during any of these occasions that you and your mother slept together?

A I think she talked about her house by the sea again, and—I don't remember.

Q Did your mother ask you then whether you were happy to be with her?

A I don't think she ever asked me in that sort of way, "Are you happy to be with me?" I don't think she ever said that.

Q Not in those words, but in effect did she ever say, "Pia, are you glad that we have this opportunity to be together?"

A I don't remember whether she ever asked me that or not.

Q Did she ever ask you, during any of these conversations, if you missed her?

A I guess she must have.

Q What did you say?

A I guess I said yes, to be polite.

Q You guess you said yes, to be polite?

A Well, I really don't miss her that much, but I couldn't very well tell her I don't.

Q And the only time that you heard your mother and father arguing was that one occasion at the dinner table, about money?

A Yes.

Q Tell me, would you object to seeing your mother again in England?

A Not this summer.

Q Miss Lindstrom, before you left for the summer visit, what did your father tell you about the visit to England?

A Well, he said we were going to England and my cousins were going to come down from Sweden and stay in England, and we were going to go to Sweden and my mother was going to meet us in Sweden.

Q Did he tell you that he thought it would be a good idea if you visited with your mother?

A Yes. After we got to England he found out that she was in England, and I met her, and then we arranged that I should go and stay with her for a few days.

IT HAPPENED TO ME

It was a rainy weekend at the seashore and our drafty, antiquated Victorian hotel was at its worst. It was also bursting at the seams with guests. A friend called from New York to say she was bringing a very important person and that we had to make room somehow. Appalled, we had to give her the worst room in the house—it was the last one.

That evening my friend introduced us in the cocktail lounge, and we talked of our work, our children and other female trivia. Not a word about the poor room, the bad weather or the cold she was coming down with . . . and nothing but praise for the food which I had prepared.

Of course, the guest was the chic, perennially charming and completely fabulous Gloria Swanson.

Beryl T. Yocum
Beach Haven, N. J.

Q And you wanted to see your mother in England at that time, didn't you, as well as see your relatives in Sweden?

A Well, I was going to see my mother in Sweden. I didn't know she was going to be in England. I didn't expect to see her.

Q You didn't object to seeing her in England, did you?

A Well, I would rather have seen her in Sweden.

Q Do you remember whether or not you wrote her telling her that you were anxious and happy to see her?

A No, I didn't say that in a letter.

Q You don't write those kind of letters?

A Well, I didn't write her a letter saying that.

Q Have you ever written her a letter telling her in the letter that you love her?

A I always sign my name, "Love, Pia."

Q And does that express the way you feel about her?

A No; it is just an ending for a letter.

Q Did you say it to her to be pleasant?

A No, it is in my letters. I always say in my letters, "Love, Pia," to my mother. To my father I say, "Love, Pia".

Q But the meaning to you in each case is different, is it not?

A I think so.

Q So I take it to mean that you actually, when you sign the letter saying "Love, Pia", that you don't love your mother?

A I don't love her. I like her.

Q And you don't miss her, do you?

A No.

Q And you don't have any desire to see her?

A No. I would rather live with my father.

Q Miss Lindstrom, do you understand what this case is about, as to what your mother is seeking to do in this case?

A Yes. She wants me to come to Italy, and I don't want to go to Italy.

Q But you realize, do you not, that your mother is not asking to have you live with her?

A But I just saw her last summer.

Q But you realize, do you not, Miss Lindstrom, that your mother is not making any request of this court or of you to live with her?

A Yes.

Q You realize that she is only asking to have you visit with her during a part of your summer vacation?

A Well, she has written to me that she would like me to stay, too. I mean, she would like me to come and visit her and stay, and how much I would like Italy, and I must learn how to speak Italian in school.

Q Well, I think loving you as much as she does, she probably would like to have you stay with her, but I want to know whether or not you are aware of the fact that she is not making any request of Judge Lillie here, nor are we asking upon her behalf, for you to go and live with her. You realize that?

A Yes.

Q And you realize further that she is only asking for you to come and spend a part of the summer vacation with her?

A Yes.

Q And that you object to?

A Yes.

Q You love your father very, very much, don't you, Miss Lindstrom?

A Yes.

Q And your father has told you that he does not desire for you to go to Italy, hasn't he?

A Well, he would rather have me live with him.

Q Yes, but he has told you, has he not, that he would prefer that you do not go to Italy?

A No, he hasn't.

Q He hasn't, upon any occasion, told you that he didn't want you to go to Italy or didn't think that you should go to Italy?

A No, he never said I shouldn't go to Italy.

Q Has he told you that he doesn't think that you should see your mother?

A No.

Q Has he told you that your mother is responsible for this present situation which even finds the result here in the courtroom?

A No.

Q Has your father told you anything at all about your mother in the course of last year?

A Well, he has talked about my mother.

Q What has he said?

A Today he said— He gave me a necklace for my confirmation, and he said how he used to buy jewelry for my mother, and he talked about my mother.

Q If your father told you that he desired you to go to Italy, that it was his desire that you go, would you then go?

A No.

Q If the Court felt that it was necessary to make an order for you to go to Italy, would you go?

A No.

Q Well now, Miss Lindstrom, you would like to do whatever would make your father happy, wouldn't you?

A It depends upon if I want to do it. I mean, if he told me to go to Italy, I wouldn't go, and if he said it, he wasn't very happy; it wouldn't make me happy, so I wouldn't go.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You testified, I believe, that you had met Mr. Rossellini?

A Yes.

Q That was when he came to Los Angeles in 1948?

A Yes.

Q Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Rossellini at that time?

A Well, he lived in our house, so I guess I talked to him, but I don't remember anything that we talked about.

Q Did you find him to be a considerate, gentlemanly man?

A I don't remember. I didn't find him anything.

THE COURT: How old were you, Pia, when he came there, do you remember? Was that in 1949?

MR. BAUTZER: February of '49.

THE COURT: Did you see him often, Pia?

THE WITNESS: Who?

THE COURT: Mr. Rossellini, while he was at your home.

THE WITNESS: I was out. I mean, I went to school.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: During the times that you did see him, did you observe anything about him that you objected to?

A Well, I didn't eat with him. I ate by myself, and I went to bed earlier than he did, so I didn't observe much.

Q But during the time that you did see him, you didn't dislike him at that time, did you?

A I didn't like him; I didn't dislike him. I just didn't have any—

Q Your father has told you about him, hasn't he?

A What about him?

Q Well, you had conversations with your father about Mr. Rossellini?

A No. We just don't sit down and say, "Let's talk about Mr. Rossellini."

Q I am certain you don't, Miss Lindstrom, but you have discussed Mr. Rossellini with your father, haven't you?

A Yes—yes.

Q And what generally has your father said and what have you said?

A Well, he said, "He lives with us," and then I said, "Yes." I don't remember what we discussed. We just—

Q As nearly as you can remember.

THE WITNESS: I don't remember what we discussed. We discussed that he used to stand in front of the fireplace and tell how religious he was . . . He borrowed my father's money and bought presents

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: When your father told you that Mr. Rossellini used to stand in front of the fireplace and quote the Bible, did he tell you what Mr. Rossellini said?

A No.

THE COURT: He didn't say "quote the Bible". He said "talked about how religious he was".

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: Talked about religion. Did your father tell you that he quoted the Bible?

A Yes.

Q And that he borrowed money?

A Yes.

Q Did he tell you anything else about Mr. Rossellini?

A No.

Q He told you absolutely nothing else about Mr. Rossellini and Mrs. Lindstrom?

A Nothing that I can remember.

Q Well, he told you about the publicity concerning Mr. Rossellini, didn't he?

A I don't know what publicity you are talking about.

Q Did he tell you about any publicity about Mr. Rossellini? He did, didn't he?

A Well, there were articles in magazines about him.

Q Your father discussed those with you, didn't he?

A He said I shouldn't get worried if people in school talked about articles. He said I should know about them, that I wouldn't get very surprised if I should hear my name mentioned, that I was getting in the magazines and the papers.

THE COURT: Pia, before your mother left for Italy, did you spend much time with her?

THE WITNESS: No.

THE COURT: Weren't you home when she was home?

THE WITNESS: Well, she wasn't home very often.

THE COURT: Did you eat with her?

THE WITNESS: No.

THE COURT: Did you eat with your father or by yourself?

THE WITNESS: Well, my mother didn't want to eat with me. She didn't want to eat by herself, and she ate later than I did. I had to go to bed.

THE COURT: Did your mother ever eat with you?

THE WITNESS: Not that I can remember.

THE COURT: How about breakfast?

THE WITNESS: She was up earlier than I was.

THE COURT: Did you see your mother very much during the day after school?

THE WITNESS: No. She comes home later than I was. She came home while I was going to bed, and had dinner after I was in bed.

THE COURT: That was when she was making a picture and working, isn't that right?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: When she wasn't working and wasn't making any pictures, didn't you see her quite often?

THE WITNESS: No, because then she went to New York.

THE COURT: How often would she go to New York or other places away from home?

THE WITNESS: Whenever she felt like going to New York.

THE COURT: Was it once or twice a year, or would you remember?

THE WITNESS: I don't remember. When she got tired of staying at home, which was quite often, she went to New York.

THE COURT: Did she ever take you with her?

THE WITNESS: No.

THE COURT: Did she ever ask you to go?

THE WITNESS: No, because I had school.

THE COURT: Did your mother ever take you any place like the movies?

THE WITNESS: No. She took me to the studios a few times.

THE COURT: Did you go any place with your mother aside from that?

THE WITNESS: No.

THE COURT: Did you go with your father?

THE WITNESS: Well, sometimes he picked me up from school, but he was working, too, during that time.

THE COURT: Who took care of you?

THE WITNESS: We had a nurse, and then we had a maid, and my father did most of the taking care of.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: Pia, you testified that your mother would go to New York when she got tired. How did you know she was tired?

A When she got tired of staying home.

Q You mean bored?

A Yes. When she couldn't find anything else to do. She would swim and take sunbaths, and when she got tired of taking sunbaths or swimming she went to New York.

Q How did you know that she was tired of taking sunbaths and swimming?

A Because that's why she said she went to New York.

Q She told you the reason she went to New York was because she was bored?

A She said that she was tired of staying at home, and she wanted to go and see the plays in New York, and she wanted to see some friends.

Q Isn't it a fact, Pia, that your father told you that?

A I don't remember. I don't remember who said it, but somebody said it.

Q But it is possible that your father said that, isn't it, Pia?

A Yes.

THE COURT: When your mother would go to New York or go away from home, would she write you?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: She would call you on the telephone from New York?

A I don't remember. I was only about six, or maybe up to eight years old. I don't remember when she called me or if she called me.

Q Miss Lindstrom, isn't it a fact that you used to go shopping with your mother quite often?

A I don't remember.

Q Miss Lindstrom, has anyone told you to say, "I don't remember"?

A No.

Q Nobody has told you at all to just say, if there is a question that maybe you don't know how to answer, you should answer that—it is perfectly proper—which it is—to say, "I don't remember"?

A No. I was told that I could say "Yes" or "No", or "I don't know" if I don't understand; if I don't know it.

Q Or, "I don't remember"?

A No. I was never told to say, "I don't remember", but I don't remember.

Q You don't remember any occasion of your mother taking you shopping?

A No. I wasn't thinking that I was going to have to remember it.

Q Do you remember your father taking you different places?

A No, I don't remember that, either.

THE COURT: What would you and your mother do together at home, if anything?

THE WITNESS: Swim.

THE COURT: Did she read to you?

THE WITNESS: I don't remember whether she read to me or not.

THE COURT: You don't remember?

THE WITNESS: No. I mean, I don't remember whether she read to me. I suppose most mothers read to their children good night stories, or something like that.

THE COURT: Did your father read to you?

THE WITNESS: I don't remember.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You remember your mother reading Alice In Wonderland to you, don't you?

A No.

Absent Minded Rex

Rex Harrison plays tennis on a court that belongs to his friend Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. Occasionally his wife is confronted by a bewildered husband who remarks that he seems to have lost a lot of trousers somewhere. She knows just where to look for them. Sighing, she drives to the Fairbanks home. After tennis, Rex, Doug, Jr., and their athletically inclined friends retire to a steam bath Fairbanks has built near his court, and when Harrison finishes parboiling himself, he is likely to climb absent-mindedly into a pair of flannels belonging to Fairbanks. His wife has fetched home whole armloads of his trousers, as well as shirts and sweaters.

PETE MARTIN—"HOLLYWOOD WITHOUT MAKEUP"

Q You don't remember. Do you remember a little market on Camden Drive in Beverly Hills?

A Little market on Camden? No, I don't remember any market on Camden.

Q You don't remember?

A No. There's lots of markets on Camden. There's McDaniel's, and there's the Safeway, and there's Ralph's.

Q You remember being in those markets with your mother, don't you?

A No.

Q Didn't your mother used to buy your clothes for you?

A I don't remember if she did. Somebody did. I don't know whether she did.

Q Don't you remember the times, Miss Lindstrom, that you and your mother used to play a little game where you both imagined that you were in another world, and the two of you were different people or different animals?

A No, I don't remember.

Q You don't remember having any association with your mother at all?

A Well, I remember that I saw her, and knew that she was my mother, and I said "Hello" to her, and "Goodbye" to her, and we swam together and talked together. Naturally I guess we played. I played with my father. I always played with both of them. I don't remember anything about a little store on Camden and another world and animals and bedtime stories.

THE COURT: When your mother didn't come back, did your father talk to you about your mother and Mr. Rossellini?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: What did your father tell you?

A I don't remember his exact words, but he just told me about them getting married—no; he said my mother wasn't coming back.

THE COURT: Pia, after your mother left, did you stay out of school a little while, or did you just keep on going to school as you always had?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: Do you remember when your father went to Italy the first time?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: When he came back, did you stay out of school a while, do you remember?

THE WITNESS: I don't remember, but I don't think I did. I guess if I would have stayed out of school I would have remembered it.

THE COURT: When your father came back from Italy, did any of your classmates at school say anything about your mother?

THE WITNESS: Well, they always said—well, there was writing in the papers, so they would say, "I read about your mother in the paper," or "I saw her name mentioned in the paper," and I said, "Yes, I know."

THE COURT: Would any of them mention Mr. Rossellini?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You talked to your father about their mention of Mr. Rossellini, did you not?

A I suppose I did.

Q When the stories came out in the newspapers, you read them, did you not?

A Yes.

Q And it is a fact, isn't it, Miss Lindstrom, that your father then discussed them with you?

A No. He told me about them first.

Q Well, he told you about the stories first, and told you about Mr. Rossellini, did he not?

A He said that my mother was marrying Mr. Rossellini, and that's all he said.

Q Nothing else?

A Well, I can't remember. It must have been on that line, of them getting married, and she was going to live in Italy and she was going to have a son—or, I mean, she was going to have a child.

Q Did he tell you whose child that was going to be?

A My mother's.

Q Did he say anything else about that?

A Well, I just took it for granted that it was her child. I knew she was having a baby.

Q Did he say anything else about it?

A No. I don't remember—we just talked about it, and he said that they were going to stay away.

Q How many times have you written your mother in the last couple of years, Miss Lindstrom?

A My goodness, I don't know how many letters. A hundred, fifty; I don't know how many letters. I don't write her every week, but I answer her letters.

Q Do you show the letters to your father before you send them?

A No, I don't.

Q Does he read them?

A Not unless I just feel like showing it to him.

Q Which sometimes you do?

A Yes, because sometimes I spell words wrong; if I don't know how to spell a word, I ask him how the word is spelled.

Q Your father has told you to write your mother, hasn't he?

A Yes, he has.

Q Do you have a picture of your mother in your bedroom?

A Yes, I do.

Q That is on your dresser?

A It is on a table. I have a whole lot of pictures of my father, my mother, and relatives and friends; mostly empty frames, because I haven't found any pictures to put in them.

Q Mostly empty frames?

A Well, yes; people keep giving me frames for presents, and I don't have any pictures to put in them, so they just sit there.

Q Have you noticed any continuation of the remarks of your classmates in the last year?

A Well, no. Now they all know, so nobody says much any more.

Q Now they all know what?

A That my mother is married to another man.

Q In the school that you go to, do any of your classmates make fun of you any more?

A They never did.

Q They never did?

A No.

Q What did your classmates say to you, if you can remember?

A Well, they would say, "I read somewhere that your mother is getting married to another man, and I saw your name in the paper and there was a picture of you in the paper; didn't look anything like you," and so on, like that. Just read things in the paper or in magazines. There was an article in one magazine.

Q Did they say anything about Mr. Rossellini?

A They said that my mother was marrying Mr. Rossellini.

Q Anything else, Miss Lindstrom?

A Yes. They used to say people who weren't nice, they called them Rossellinis.

Q You discussed this with your father, didn't you?

A Yes.

Q What did he say about it?

A He didn't say anything.

Q Did you ask him what to do, or—

A No. I just said, "They are calling people who aren't nice, Rossellinis," and so he said, "Ha-ha," or he just said, "Oh." I mean, he didn't say anything.

THE COURT: Did he ever tell you not to pay any attention to what the children said?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: He said it in connection with that?

THE WITNESS: Well, he said not to mind anything that people said.

Q Assuming that you went to Europe, and pictures of you and your mother were taken, would you object to that?

A Yes, because every time I walk down the street, everybody looks at me.

Q When you testified that your mother never had a meal with you, that you could remember, you asked your father why your mother didn't eat with you, didn't you?

A I don't remember.

Q You told your father, did you not, that you were not interested in seeing your mother?

A Yes.

Q And this was prior to your trip to England?

A No, I never said that. I mean, I didn't say before I went to England that I didn't want to go to England.

Q You didn't say it?

A Because I didn't know I was going to meet my mother in England.

Q But you were not happy to see your mother in England?

A I was happy to see her.

Q Then before you left you told your father, didn't you, that you were not interested in seeing her?

A Well, yes, I didn't want to see her that much.

Q Did you tell your father that you were not interested in seeing your mother?

A No. I said I would be happy to see my mother. I mean, I didn't particularly want to see my mother.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You told your father, didn't you, that your mother didn't care about you?

A I don't remember saying that.

THE COURT: Do you feel that way about her now?

THE WITNESS: What way?

THE COURT: Do you feel that your mother doesn't care about you now?

THE WITNESS: Well, I don't think she cares about me too much.

THE COURT: Why do you say that?

THE WITNESS: Well, she didn't seem very interested about me when she left. It was only after she left and got married and had children that she suddenly decided she wanted me.

THE COURT: Pia, if you wanted to go to Italy, would you tell me that you did?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: Even though your father may not want to go?

THE WITNESS: Well, he wouldn't go anyway, I don't think.

THE COURT: Well, even if he didn't want to go, would you tell me if you wanted to go?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: You are sure you don't want to go see your mother this summer?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: And this is your idea and not your father's, is that right?

THE WITNESS: Yes. He told me that if I wanted to go, he would stop the court case, and I could go.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: When did he tell you this; today?

A No.

Q When.

A About two weeks ago, when the court case was—I think it was a week ago, whenever the court case was beginning to start, he said that it was costing him a lot of money, and he said if I wanted to go, he would stop the court case because it was wasting money unless I wanted to stay.

THE COURT: Did you talk with your father then about it?

THE WITNESS: He said that they were going to go in court, and they were going to try and decide, because my mother wanted me to come to Italy.

THE COURT: Did you think about it then, whether or not you wanted to go?

THE WITNESS: Well, I already knew that I didn't.

THE COURT: Did you reconsider at that time?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: You told your father that you didn't want to go?

THE WITNESS: Yes.

THE COURT: Do you have any feeling at all about Mr. Rossellini?

THE WITNESS: Well, now I naturally don't like him because from what he has done now, but before I didn't think anything about him at all. I mean, he just brought me presents all the time, and was very nice to me, did everything I wanted, brought me presents about every day, came home with more presents.

Q BY MR. BAUTZER: You haven't talked to your father about Mr. Rossellini regarding your attitude about not wanting to see him, have you?

A Well, he knows, I think, that I am not interested in seeing him.

Q If Mr. Rossellini were not with your mother and you would not have to see him, would you feel differently?

A No.

Q Would it make you feel any differently towards your mother or towards her desire to see you?

A No.

ava wants out

She called Maria, the housekeeper, and politely asked for a coke and a lettuce and tomato sandwich toasted. When she returned she tried to crack a pecan with a single-blade nutcracker. She failed. "Gosh!" she exclaimed. "What a hokey nutcracker."

"When did you dye your hair blonde?" I asked.

"How do you like it, darling?"

I crinkled my nose.

"It looks awful now," she explained quickly, "because it's yellow but wait till you see it tonight. Tonight the girl'll put some blue in it and silver it up. It'll look nice. Really will. I dye my hair about once every two years. I don't know why. For the change, I guess. Honestly, doll, it doesn't look half bad. I mean, Frank doesn't mind."

Maria brought the coke and sandwich. Ava bit into the toast. She weighs 123 lbs. and looks thinner than she ordinarily does. She hasn't been feeling too well lately, she admitted, in fact had been laid up in the hospital for a few days.

"How's your mental condition?" I asked.

"Whattaya mean, mental condition?"

"Your outlook on things."

"What things?" Ava Gardner asked.

"Your suspension, Frank, your plans for the future, those things."

She thought for a moment, her eyes growing meditative as twilight. "I wish we had the Palm Springs house in Los Angeles," she said presently. "That's a great house. About the future, who knows? We don't have any definite plans. How can we? Who knows what comes up in this business? That's what I've been trying to tell you. A girl marries a stockbroker or a bookkeeper, her life is set. She knows the score. Marry some guy in show business and it's rough. Today he's in Chicago. Then he's hitting St. Louis. When he comes home, the studio wants you to take a flying leap to Mexico.

"I know what you're going to say. You always say it. Why don't I quit and have some kids and settle down? I'd settle for that. Funny thing, we were in this restaurant the other night. A handwriting analyst—some hokey dame came over. I scribbled a few words. 'You're going to have twins,' she told me. 'Eventually two boys and a girl.' She also told me I'm going to be pregnant in five months. Frank told her we'd work on it. I can't have twins. Least, I don't think so. No twins in Frank's family. None in mine. But two girls and a boy, that'd be great. I mean two boys and a girl."

"Frank makes a good father," I said.

Ava smiled. "Out of this world. We had the kids down at the desert before we went to Honolulu, and Frank was wonderful with them. It was the first time for me. Their mother's done a great job. I sure want to see more of them. They're just adorable, you know."

The housekeeper let Ava's dog, Rags, into the house and tied his leash to the coffee table.

Ava picked the dog up and hugged him.

"He's a Welsh Corgi," she explained. Then to the dog, "Aren't you, Rags?" She put him down, explaining that she'd first met the dog in England two years ago, thinking he was a lovable little mongrel. An Englishman told her that Rags was no mongrel at all, that her mistake was a frequent one since there were less than 150 such dogs in America. "Anyway, Frank had this little creature flown over for my 28th birthday. My sister Babs has one named Shannon. They're just wonderful. Excuse me, honey. That's the phone."

While Ava was talking to her agent, I looked around this new house she and Frank rent furnished at $500 a month.

It's a small house located in a fashionable section of Beverly Hills on a canyon road. It has five rooms and one for the maid. The largest room is the bedroom. Ava and Frank sleep in a tremendous double bed. On the night table at the left, Ava's side of the bed, rests a small portrait of Frank, showing him a 17-year-old youngster in Hoboken. A wedding picture of Ava and Frank stands on one dresser and portraits of Ava's various nephews and nieces on another. The room also contains a radio, a record-player especially built for Frank, and a television set.

One of the closets in the foyer beside the bedroom was opened. It contained nothing but Ava's shoes. I counted 35 pairs. Most of them were plain black high-heeled pumps.

Tain't true that Sam Goldwyn, noting the success of Biblical pictures, decided he was going to film Adam and Eve "with a cast of thousands."
Irving Hoffman in The Hollywood Reporter

I returned to the living room, a modern rectangle done in light green with grey carpeting. A portrait of Ava painted by her good friend, Paul Clemens, hung on the wall over the baby grand piano. Portraits by Clemens hang in many Hollywood homes.

Ava came back from her phone call. "Sure you're not hungry, sweetie?"

I said, "No."

"When I'm hungry," she said, "I eat like a pig. Honest!"

"I thought of some questions to ask," I said, "while you were on the phone. I'd like you to level on them."

She said she would.

"A year ago," I began, "when I asked you if you were contemplating a marriage with Frank—or maybe it was more than a year ago, you said, 'Do you think I'm crazy? Why should I marry him? He's in show business. I've already been married to two guys in this racket. Look what happened.' Now tell me, Ava, what made you change your mind?"

She laughed to herself. "I still say the same thing. Honest, doll. A girl's got to be crazy to marry a guy in show business. Why'd I do it? I can't explain it in terms of logic. In fact, logic's got nothing to do with it. With me it's pure emotion. I fall in love with a guy, and I'm hooked. Lana's the same way. We're a pair of suckers for love. I always will be.

"In all of my marriages, it's been the same bit. When I told friends Mickey and I were going to be married, they came to me and said, 'Listen, Ava. Better suicide. You don't know what you're doing.' With Artie the same routine. When I started going with Frank, more warnings.

"Here's the way I feel about it. If things blow up, I'm the one to suffer. I'm the fall guy. I'm the one who's got to take the rap. But I'm funny about marriage. To me if two people fall in love, the best thing, the only thing, is a wedding ceremony. I feel I'm entitled to make my own mistakes and pay for them.

"I fell in love with Frank. It wasn't intentional. I'd met him ten years ago when he was singing with Tommy Dorsey at the Palladium. I'd seen him around the studio. It was nothing. Just hello and goodbye. Two years ago we met and it started getting serious. Can I help it if I don't have sense enough to run away from love? The result is that I've never been happier in my life. I think the same goes for Frank."

The phone rang again. Maria came into the living room. "Perdoname, Senora," she said, speaking to Ava in Spanish. "Su doctor. El telefono."

Ava jumped up. "Back in a minute, sweetie."

She was back in less. "Shoot," she said.

I fired a second question. "What goes with you and these constant studio suspensions?"

Ava lit another cigarette. For the first time her good humor seemed to evaporate. "All I'm going to say about that, doll, is this: my contract expires in December next year . . . Enough?"

I nodded. It's no secret in Hollywood that Ava would like to terminate her MGM contract as quickly as possible. Hollywood's most beautiful actress and Hollywood's largest studio just don't happen to see eye to eye on story values.

Ava has developed into an actress of considerable talent and surprisingly fine literary taste. She has turned down several roles offered to her. The studio sees no point in paying her for not working so that a good portion of her time has been spent on suspension.

Once Ava's Metro contract expires, she intends to leave Hollywood, circumstances permitting, for a substantial period.

She has never been a particularly ambitious girl. Neither does she covet fame or money. What she is looking for is emotional security and personal happiness. To have these, she feels strongly that she must be with her husband. She prefers to spend at least six months of the year with him away from Hollywood. In the movie colony she has the recurrent feeling that she is the cynosure of all eyes, that everyone is waiting for her marriage to founder, that thousands of I-told-you-so wiseguys build up every little quibble into a cause célèbre.

Hollywood has given Ava some money —not much but more than she ever had before—and a good deal of notoriety, but she has been happiest away from Hollywood when she's had Frank at her side.

Since Ava's suspension Frank has been the sole source of family income. Frank makes good money on the personal appearance circuit, but it's hard work, and he has to give away a good portion of his earnings for the support of ex-wife Nancy and his three children.

If Ava could only obtain her release from MGM, she feels she could go to Europe and make a picture over there for at least $50,000 per film. Metro gets $65,000 and up when they loan her out. Ava could also remain in Hollywood and make films on a free lance basis which would again supply her with the wherewithal to travel.

Ava loves the house she and Frank own in Palm Springs, but the desert is no place for a young couple during the hot months. Besides, Ava is beginning to think that Palm Springs is too close to Hollywood for the type of privacy she craves.

"I never have been very good," Ava says, "about explaining how I feel about things. All I know is that I've got to get away from this town for a while. I need a change."

"Is that why you've been dyeing your hair?" I asked. "A sort of substitute?"

Ava Lavinia grinned. "It's sure going to be funny," she said. "I've posed for different magazine photographers as a brunette, an ordinary blonde, and a platinum blonde. By the time the magazines come out, I'm going to be a redhead." END

miracles do happen

(Continued from page 49) normally religious turn of mind feel we have had personal proof of the power of prayer. Those who take pride in being modern sophisticates scoff at such a thought but cannot deny that there is much in life that cannot be explained.

"Prayers are always answered," Loretta Young declares. "Sometimes almost miraculously. If you believe in prayer, you can make things happen that seem miraculous, that is, if you storm heaven with your prayers."

It must be explained that Loretta makes no apology to friends or the public for the fact that she is religious, nor has she ever maintained the attitude that her beliefs make her a trifle "better" than anyone, inside or out of Hollywood. To the casual observer, her delicate, ethereal beauty makes her appear fragile, as though a brisk wind might pick her up and deposit her in the next county. Actually, Loretta Young's personality is as lusty and direct as a truck driver's, minus of course the tendency of many of those gentlemen to employ a vocabulary that can peel paint off walls.

"You might as well face it," Loretta told me, "I am not going to be trapped into a deep discussion about miracles. I am perhaps as well versed in theology as the normal church-goer, but I might as well attempt to explain the mysteries of a delicate brain operation. But I will tell you some of the answers to prayers that I have experienced personally and some wonderfully inspiring experiences of people I know personally.

Actors worry and fret their careers away instead of enjoying them.

Loretta Young

"To get down to cases. Two years ago one prayer of mine was answered so swiftly and surely that it seemed like a miracle to me. This answer came with blinding, split-second speed and no one could convince me that it was not a positive answer to my prayer.

"My two young sons and I were out walking. Peter, the youngest, ran on ahead, suddenly turning off the sidewalk, across the narrow parkway, and into the street. I called after him, frantically, but my four-year-old sprite was free as a bird. His entire world at the moment consisted of the empty street and the new wonders that lay on the other side of it.

"My vision swept the road in search of that inevitable speeding car. Normally, a half-hour could go by without anyone using that street, but there it was, a huge station wagon bent on setting a new speed record. Horror-stricken, I shrieked Peter's name and stood paralyzed.

"He didn't hear me. At that point he was about four feet into the street and pounding ahead on sturdy legs. I don't know whether I had time to close my eyes, but I whispered 'Please, God, please save him!' "

For an agonized moment that seemed an eternity, Loretta waited for the sound of screaming brakes and the indescribable pain of seeing her child lying crushed on the pavement. Then, as though she were watching a motion picture in which one scene is suddenly frozen on the screen, Loretta saw Peter standing stock still, just shy of the middle of the road, while with tires whining, the station wagon was rounding the turn just ahead.

Something had caused Peter to stop, amazingly, in his headlong romp. He couldn't have heard his mother's frantic call. He couldn't have seen the station wagon, for a parked car to his left had hidden it from sight. Even if he had heard the sound of the approaching station wagon, he couldn't have stopped, because his four-year-old reflexes could never have halted his momentum.

"It was prayer," Loretta repeats, simply. "God said yes."

"The true miracle," she continues, "is a supernatural act of God which the human mind cannot logically explain. Just as a child cannot understand why an electric light goes on and off but accepts the fact with a perfectly natural faith, an adult cannot fully comprehend the actual cause of what we call a miracle but also accepts it as a matter of faith."

One of Loretta's favorite stories of the power of prayer concerns Pat O'Brien.

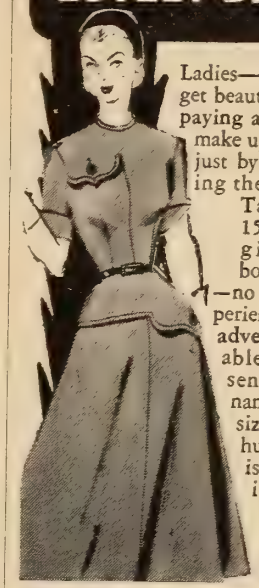
"Pat's oldest daughter was only a baby at the time," she says. "About two, I think. Anyway, she became terribly ill. The doctors did everything they could. They finally gave up in despair. There was no hope. It was only a matter of time. Pat went into his room alone. He went down on his knees and started saying his Rosary. He stayed there in his room, alone, on his knees all that day and night, praying, never moving. And they came in the next morning and told him his little girl had reached and passed the crisis and miraculously had lived.

"You can bring about apparent miracles through prayer. Actually, what you are doing is asking for spiritual guidance to help you get what you want. If it is right for you, you'll get it. If it isn't, you won't. You just don't get down on your knees and say 'gimmee.' And it will happen many times that a prayer will be answered for one individual, but not for another, even though the circumstances seem almost identical. This has happened to me. If this has happened to you, don't let the result be that you become skeptical."

LORETTA points out that she could never explain or attempt to prove the truth of miracles to anyone. There may be thousands, or hundreds of thousands who have never heard of the miracle at Lourdes, or the many others that have been verified through the years. If they cannot accept these as facts, then unfortunately, they will never be able to recognize those almost miraculous events that happen around them every day.

For instance, some years ago a priest who is an old friend of Loretta's came to her to explain that he needed $5,000 for a trailer and a projection unit to take into Utah missionary territory. Loretta was upset, because she couldn't at the time afford to donate the amount.

"I just don't have that sort of money right now," she explained, "but I'll see what I can do among my friends."



"We'll work on this together," the priest said. "I will pray."

And Loretta prayed. And the answer came. Several days before, the Lux Radio Theater had asked Loretta to play in one of their weekly dramatic shows. But, because the studio contract at the time stipulated that she must pay the studio 50 per cent of her radio fees, she had been turning down air shows as a matter of principle. This, however, was different.

Loretta called the studio and asked if they would waive the 50 per cent clause in this particular case. The executive to whom she talked not only gave in, but sent her a sizable check of his own. Then, with another small prayer that the part would still be available, Loretta called the Lux people.

Call it coincidence, but the star who accepted the role in Loretta's place got a heavy cold a few (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) hours before and couldn't do the show. The Lux man thanked heaven over the telephone, and well he should have. The following night, Loretta did the show and gave her check for $5,000 to the priest.

Most agnostics, psychiatrists and just plain people might not believe that this happened as a result of prayer. Loretta does believe it, and no one can deny that her faith has had a great deal to do with a happy life, while many of her sister stars, who believe only in luck and themselves, have reached a climax of unhappiness.

As Mrs. Tom Lewis, Loretta leads a full, busy life. Her happy marriage is not an accident, but the creation of a husband and wife who recognize their marriage as an adult partnership. They do not "adjust their halos" every morning. They are a pair of warm, exciting and adventuresome spirits. They have great standing, and wealth, too. But it has not made them arrogant or prejudiced.

On the latter point—the subject of prejudice—Loretta Young has another story well worth re-telling to those who have not heard it.

On the set of her last picture, Paula, she ran across a sound technician who had worked on previous pictures she made at Columbia. "Why, Dick Williams," she exclaimed, "I haven't seen you in ages. What have you been doing with yourself?"

The answer rocked her back on her heels. "A year ago," he said, "I was a dead man!"

"Oh, stop it," Loretta retorted.

"It's true," he persisted. And then he told his story:

Dick Williams was a Texan. A big, gruff man, proud of his southern heritage. As has been the case with people all over the country, at times, Dick grew up with an unreasoning prejudice against Negroes. In his later years in Hollywood, he took to drink. Took to it all the way. He became, in fact, a drunken bum. No studio would hire him. Eventually his wife left him. He was thrown out of his apartment. He wound up in a shack, contracted pneumonia, and one day some neighbors found him on the floor of his miserable quarters, apparently a dead man. A doctor certified to the fact and sent him to a funeral parlor.

Moments before he was to be injected with embalming fluid, Dick Williams fluttered an eyelid. The undertaker, understandably nearly changed places with him. Dick was rushed to a hospital, where his condition was pronounced hopeless. Nevertheless, the usual emergency remedies were applied and he responded feebly.

What he needed was 24 hours nursing care, but the man was a refugee from Potter's Field, stone broke. There were no funds to provide three nurses on eight hour shifts, but volunteers were found.

When Dick Williams, many hours later, regained consciousness, the first thing he saw was an anxious colored face peering into his own. He was a weak, sick man, so he could do nothing about the old feeling of revulsion that swept over him. Devotedly, the three negro women slaved without thought of themselves to cure a man who hated them and all their people.

They not only saved his life. They renewed it and added purpose in place of the prejudice that had ruled his thinking. Today Dick Williams is back at work. One of the first things he did was to save every penny he could earn to buy those nurses three fine watches so important to them every day in their wonderful lifework.

"It wasn't much," he told Loretta, "but it was all I could give them, then. Materially, I mean. What counts is the way I feel about it. I love those three women. They taught me real, brotherly love. I've found something I never had before. I lost my life, and it was given back to me. It was a miracle!"

So, is it so hard to understand why Loretta Young will frankly admit that she believes in prayers being answered? But still refuses to try to explain how they work? It's enough that they do work—for her, and for others who truly believe in them.

Take the case of the prominent Los Angeles woman who suffered so acutely from arthritis. Medical science failed to stem the tide of pain. For two years she had been in a wheel chair unable to move her limbs. She often lunched at a drive-in, where she need not leave her car. A little car hop who waited on her noticed her great pain and brought her a small statue of Christ.

"Put this on the table beside your bed," she told the woman. "I will burn candles for you, and on the ninth day from today you will have no more pain."

On the ninth day, the woman remembered, but did not expect relief. She looked wistfully at the little statue, and in a moment she had lifted both arms above her head, something she had not been able to do in years. And from that day she has been free from pain.

Obviously, it happens every day. Loretta Young is not the only one who can tell us about such proof, but she does so with effective, factual honesty.

And you come away, knowing that what she has said is true. END

the secret life of marilyn monroe

(Continued from page 43) Marilyn's mother's name was Gladys Pearl Monroe and she was a native of Mexico. Her father was Edward Mortenson, who was a baker by occupation. It is apparent that at the time of the birth Edward Mortenson was estranged from Marilyn's mother, for the birth record states that his whereabouts, on June 1, 1926, were unknown. Although Mortenson was only 29 years old at the time, there is no known record of his ever showing up again, so he may be presumed to be dead. There is no proof, however, that he was killed in an automobile accident as has been printed in Marilyn's official studio biography.

Gladys Monroe had borne two children prior to the birth of Marilyn. One, a girl, died at a very early age, and the other, a boy, is still alive. He is an invalid, it is reported, and not aware of his relationship to the glamorous star. Because his mother's original name was no doubt of Spanish origin, it is evident that Gladys Monroe was married to another man before Edward Mortenson, and that his name was Monroe. It has only been during her motion picture career that Marilyn has used the name Monroe. Before trying Hollywood she used her legal name, Norma Jeanne Mortenson most of the time, but did, on occasion (as in early studio biographies) call herself Norma Jeanne Baker. The only clue to the reason for this lies in the fact that on her birth certificate the name Baker appears as her father's trade. Marilyn may have picked it from there.

Not long after Marilyn Monroe was 92 born, her mother fell ill of a nervous ailment and entered a state hospital for treatment. She has been confined to this or other hospitals for most of the time during the past 25 years, being released from time to time as her condition improved. When it became apparent that Gladys Monroe would be unable to care for her infant daughter, the child was given to a foster mother, Grace McKee, who is now Mrs. E. L. Goddard, to be raised as her own. No record of a formal adoption has been uncovered, but there is evidence that Mrs. Goddard and Grace McKee are the same person because when Marilyn was signed to a contract by 20th Century-Fox for the first time, on September 5, 1946, Grace McKee appeared before the Los Angeles Superior Court as Marilyn's legal guardian. It must have been established at that time that Grace McKee had some legal standing as guardian, otherwise the court would not have approved her signature on Marilyn's contract. And Mrs. E. L. Goddard has been identified as the woman signing the papers with the studio.

An odd facet of this contract, by the way, is that the signature of a guardian was not necessary. According to California law, a girl of 18 who is married is emancipated insofar as the making of contracts is concerned . . . and on September 5, 1946, Marilyn Monroe was still married to James Edward Dougherty. It is not relevant that she was separated from her husband at that time, so the signature of the legal guardian might well have been intended to hide the fact of her marriage from the studio and public. Or it might have been to hide the fact that she was 20 years of age. If the studio today believes that Marilyn Monroe is 23, as her official biography indicates, it might have believed on September 5, 1946, that she was 17, which would have made the approval of a guardian and the courts necessary.

Evidence available at this time seems to substantiate the major portion of Marilyn Monroe's story of her many foster homes. Records of Los Angeles County's foundlings and displaced children are not available for any number of reasons, so it is, therefore, impossible to check and confirm the exact number of homes Marilyn Monroe lived in and the names of the people she stayed with. It was possible, though, to confirm that Marilyn's "adoptions" were not all handled through official channels. She was taken care of by some families for short periods of time as a kindly service to the guardians properly charged with her. As a matter of fact, in the absence of public records in the matter, it is not too certain that Marilyn was ever actually a county ward, except, of course, in the sense that, being a semi-orphan, she came under the legal jurisdiction of the county officials.

Many people have been kind to Marilyn Monroe in her life. While she was never close to more than a handful of her benefactors, she has at least been given the love and friendship of as many folks as most of the rest of us. Mrs. Goddard has been her first and foremost friend. She has, throughout her life, been at hand when Marilyn needed her. She has kept her secrets and substantiated Marilyn's stories about the deaths of her mother and father publicly, whenever it was necessary.

Because the details of Marilyn Monroe's boarding out has been printed so many times—mostly in error—it is practical in this report to skip over most of her formative years and move to her mid-teens. At that period she was living with a Mrs. Anna Lower in Westwood, California, and attending one of the three high schools she studied at. Her life with Mrs. Lower was very happy, for it seems it was really the first "home" Marilyn ever knew, a home in which she felt equal with other kids. But something happened to break it up. Mrs. Lower was planning to move east.

Marilyn was faced with the problem of finding another permanent home. She had never been in love and has admitted to only one infatuation, a crush on a neighbor boy who today is making quite a name for himself in pictures, one Howard Keel of MGM. She had met and dated a lad named James Edward Dougherty, a shaker at the Lockheed Aircraft Plant.

Jim Dougherty says he liked Marilyn well enough, and some of their friends thought that if they married it would solve all her problems. On the 19th of June, 1942, Dougherty and Marilyn were married in Westwood and took up residence somewhere near Culver City. Shortly after, Dougherty joined the Merchant Marine and after a training period in California went to sea. They never had much of a home life, nor were they really ever terribly fond of each other. When Dougherty went away, Marilyn took a job at one of the small defense plants making parts on contract for the aircraft industry. It was then, at the age of 17, that she got her first taste of the limelight.

Sweaters are the lazy girl's way to romance.

Jane Russell

An army team of public relations soldiers came to the plant one day to shoot some pictures of a war plant in action. Marilyn, for obvious reasons, was chosen as the model for the worker in the pictures. They sold it to editors like hot cakes, and this sowed the seeds of discontent in Marilyn Monroe. She began to want the fame and glamor of a public life.

Dougherty, during this time, was overseas. As he tells it, he was in Shanghai when he got a Dear John letter informing him that Marilyn wanted to be free. He told a reporter some years later that it didn't make much difference to him.

James Edward Dougherty is now a policeman on the Los Angeles Police Department. He refuses to discuss his marriage to Marilyn, stating only that he is again a married man, with a couple of kids, is very happy and wants nothing to interfere with his marriage. He lives near his station in Van Nuys, California.

With modeling proving to be a pretty tough racket, even for a girl with all of Marilyn's attributes, she decided to branch out into the entertainment field. It has never been publicized, but she planned to become a singer and started taking lessons in vocalizing and stage comportment from Phil Moore, the famous jazz musician who has coached many stars in stage and cafe technique. She tried hard but never got anywhere, probably because she had no musical talent. She moved to the Studio Club, a boarding house for young women just three blocks from an orphanage where she spent some time as a child. She tried to get day work in pictures, as a photographic model, and a walking dress model for clothing salesmen. It was during this period that she couldn't pay her board at the Studio Club and posed for the now famous nude calendar which is today being distributed by the Western Lithograph Company of Los Angeles. She earned 50 dollars for this pose, and it has netted the owners a fortune.

How Marilyn Monroe got her first contract at Fox is not known. But the story that she was baby sitting at the home of a studio casting executive and invited in for a screen test is a complete fabrication. At any rate, she did go to work at 20th Century-Fox, remained under contract for a year and contributed exactly one film role, a bit in Scudda Hay, Scudda Ho, before she was dropped.

It was shortly after her first stint at 20th that Marilyn again met her mother. Gladys Monroe was improving in health and, with the approval of her doctors, had come out of the hospital. Marilyn moved in with her and they tried making a home together. But it didn't work. They had been apart for so many years, according to friends of the mother, that they were strangers. When they went their separate ways it was for the last time, although Marilyn has helped her mother financially whenever it has been necessary.

It has always been surprising to Hollywoodites that Marilyn Monroe has never played the glamor circuit of gay night spots nor indulged in any of the quickie romances most pretty girls in the movies seem to devote so much time to. She divorced James Dougherty in Las Vegas, Nevada, on October 2, 1946, at the age of 20; the charge was mental cruelty. And since that time she has only been known to have two men in her life who could actually be called "boy friends." One of them was Johnny Hyde, one of the most important agents in Hollywood. She was his constant companion for almost two years prior to his death in 1951. The other is Joe DiMaggio.

It has been rumored from time to time that the reason Marilyn doesn't get around much with fellows is that she is the secret lover of a prominent motion picture executive. Even the most simple investigation proves this to be a lie and either the result of a malicious gossip or an attempt by publicity men to give her an aura of sexy mystery. Any self-respecting courtesan in Hollywood has at least three mink coats in her closet and drives a late model Cadillac convertible. These are the badges of the lady's occupation. Marilyn Monroe has an old, small car, not even a convertible, and when she needs a fur for a premiere or some such event she must borrow one from the studio wardrobe department. No, it is not pleasant to blow up a good story, but Marilyn Monroe is an unusually straitlaced and moral young lady for any community, let alone Hollywood.

As she lay in the hospital bed at the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital turning these thoughts over in her mind, Marilyn Monroe must have thought that it was a cruel twist of fate that had brought her secrets into the open. She must have dreaded facing the people of her studio and the press that she had fooled, but she need not have been ashamed.

The road before Marilyn Monroe today is well paved with good things. Love has come into her life with Joe DiMaggio. Success on the screen in better roles is assured her. And, in time, she will have all the money she will be able to use. Her mother, widowed again recently and living within five miles of the studio where Marilyn is under contract, is close if she wants to see her, and need no longer be denied. The husband of her youth is out of her life and she need have no further contact with him. The past is behind and the future bright ahead. END

(Marilyn Monroe can soon be seen in 20th Century-Fox's We're Not Married.)

Q. Is it true that Bob Hope bought a radio station in Denver for two and a half million? How much money does he have, anyway?
—M. N., Cleveland, Ohio

A. Hope bought the radio station, will also put up a TV station in conjunction with a group of Denver businessmen. He is a millionaire several times over.

Q. I understand that Elizabeth Taylor's baby will be delivered by Caesarean section. When will it happen?
—V. S., Elko, Nev.

A. The delivery will be a normal one on approximately January 15th, 1953.

Q. Why did Maureen O'Hara deny her marriage to Will Price was breaking up when everyone knew it was on the rocks? How many times has she been married, anyway?
—N. U., Dublin, Ireland

A. She was hoping for a reconciliation. Has been married twice.

Q. Is Lucille Ball pregnant again?
—D. E., Evanston, Ill.

A. Yes.

Q. I've been told that MGM tried to cancel The Great Caruso because the studio was sure it would flop. Is this a true story?
—V. S., New York, N. Y.

A. Partially. Nick Schenck, chairman of Loew's which controls MGM, has always had his doubts about opera on the screen.

Q. Is it true that Marilyn Monroe and Janet Leigh both wear falsies?
—S. L., Salt Lake City, Utah

A. No.

Q. How many children do Martin and Lewis have and how much do these comics owe their creditors? Aren't they in debt up to their necks?
—R. T., Steubensville, Ohio

A. Dean Martin has five children, four by his first wife, one by his second. Jerry Lewis has two children, one of whom is adopted. In the past year M and L have paid off $300,000 in obligations, currently owe nothing.

Q. Doesn't MGM have Lana Turner's mother on the studio payroll at $400 a month?
—J. F., Santa Fe, N. M.

A. No. Mrs. Turner is on Lana's personal payroll.

Q. What is the inside story on the feud between Tony Curtis and Farley Granger?
—D. H., Akron, Ohio

A. Jealousy.

Q. Now that Vittorio and Shelley have been married a few months, isn't Vittorio disillusioned?
—F. F., Los Angeles, Cal.

A. Not disillusioned, merely disenchanted. (See page 32.)

Q. Has Esther Williams left MGM to free-lance? Isn't she organizing the Esther Williams Aquacade?
—N. S., Livermore, Cal.

A. Esther's $5,000-a-week contract expires in 1957.

Q. Is Dick Widmark leaving Hollywood for good?
—B. G., Toronto, Can.

A. Leaving, but not for good.

Q. I understand that when Greer Garson was Eileen Snelson, she had a child in India. What's happened to the baby?
—T. U., Butte, Mont.

A. No truth to that one.

Q. I read in the newspapers that Red Skelton is expecting a third child. When is it due?
—C. K., Lancaster, Pa.

A. Red doesn't know, since his wife isn't yet pregnant.

Q. Is it true that Jane Powell and her husband are very devout Catholics?

A. Jane is not Catholic. Her husband is.

Q. Now that Olivia De Havilland is divorcing her husband, hasn't she made up with her sister, Joan Fontaine?
—S. K., Des Moines, Iowa

In accordance with Italian custom, the Rossellini twins will be cared for by this wet-nurse for six months. She's called a Balia.

Ingrid laughs happily as she unwraps some of the gifts friends brought for the twins. Both tiny girls slept through party given for them.

LOUELLA PARSONS'

GOOD NEWS

JUDY GARLAND HONORED AT HOLLYWOOD DINNER . . . THE BATTLING SINATRAS STILL GOING STRONG . . .

With a voice quavering with emotion and nervousness, stuttering like an unhappy child, Marilyn Morrison Ray answered my telephone call to Milwaukee to ask her if she and Johnnie Ray are expecting the Stork.

"I-I-I don'tttt know," she stammered. "I don't thinnnk sooo."

I didn't know until later that I had reached Marilyn right in the midst of a difficulty in which her famous "Cry" singer husband was having troubles with the police over a "disturbance" charge.

He was not booked, but the police reported to the newspapers that they had been called to the hotel following a loud argument between Ray and another man.

Never for a minute let it be said that Marilyn isn't devotion itself to Johnnie. She is such a sweet, gentle girl.

Even as nervous and upset as she must have been after the fracas (whatever it was), she kept telling me in her trembling little voice, "Johnnie was a sensation at his opening here last night, Miss Parsons. He's the biggest thing in show business," she said, proudly.

Zsa Zsa Gabor, who does as much acting off stage as she does on, never wears paste jewelry on the screen—non, non! She wears her own fabulous sparklers.

One day director Mervyn Le Roy was kidding her and asked if she weren't afraid she would be robbed.

"Oh, no," Zsa Zsa shrugged, "Zese are joost vorking diamonds."

The NOT-SO-GAY-DIVORCEES: You'll get a kick—as I'm sure I did—from the following first-hand account letter from Nevada about the doings of our glamor-divorcees sitting out their six weeks in and around Lake Tahoe:

"Lana Turner's house is really in Zephyr Cove, not Glenbrook as reported—this little bit of deception intended to keep the tourists from flocking around.

"It's a lovely house, tree-shaded, right on Lake Tahoe and it has a private pier with a motor-boat. But poor Lana just isn't the outdoor type.

"The first day she went boating with her daughter, Cheryl, she got such a bad sunburn she was ill in bed for three days. As you know, Lana has such fair skin, the sun is poisonous to her.

"When Rita Hayworth was here, she wore denims and T-shirts and overalls and really enjoyed the life. Lana's divorce-wardrobe is very swanky—velvet lounging suits, cocktail dresses, etc.

"She was here two weeks before Fernando Lamas could get away from his picture to visit her, and that weekend it rained in Northern California and Nevada!

"Just about Lana's only diversion is driving down to the country store to telephone her pals in Hollywood, particularly Fernando. She's on a party line at the house—a four party line at that!

"If this weren't bad enough, the house Lana is renting is owned by a Justice of the Peace who's well known around these parts as being very obliging about getting up in the middle of the night to marry couples.

"So, all night long, Missy Turner is awakened by happy couples asking 'How much?' to marry them!

"Redheaded Maureen O'Hara is having a their parents' summer home.

Ingrid, surrounded by her family, is a picture of happiness. She holds Isabel, while Rossellini holds little Ingrid, and Robertino stands between them.

LANA TURNER, MAUREEN O'HARA, SITTING OUT DIVORCES IN NEVADA . . . ARE RITA AND ALY RECONCILING?

much better time of it at a dude ranch just outside Carson City. She and eight-year-old Bronwyn are roughing it in fine style in their own little cottage, doing their own cooking and with no maid or governess.

"They live in their riding clothes—little Bronwyn's as brown as a berry and is becoming an excellent rider.

"There's been some local gossip about the two good looking young men who fly up weekends to visit Maureen, but they are her handsome Irish brothers, so no news there.

"Ida Lupino is also here with Howard Duff—not for a divorce, of course. Ida is making her picture at Lake Tahoe and she's a little black and blue from a recent accident, which you wrote up in your column. It was nearly serious—if she hadn't jumped, she would have been thrown down the mountainside."

Who is this spy who writes such intimate doings? I'm not a'tellin'. There may be some other divorcees up there we'll want to hear about.

SOMETIMES you have to feel sorry for parents. They are people, too.

Never was a girl brought up in a more palsy-walsy, chummy-wummy, express-your-own-personality way than Joan Evans. Her youthful parents, Dale Eunson and Katherine Albert, were hepped on the subject that Joan should be a "free soul."

From the time she was able to toddle, she was an integral part of their lives, dining with the grown-ups, attending matinees and being encouraged to express her own individuality.

She was taught to call them "Katherine" and "Dale"—not old fashioned stuff like "mamma" and "papa."

When Joan, at 14, took up a movie career, Katherine and Dale were right behind her, even to giving up their writing careers in New York to accompany her to Hollywood.

And, yet, if I hadn't happened to uncover her plans, Joan would have eloped with Kirby Wetherly, automobile dealer, on her 18th birthday without a word to Katherine or Dale about her plans.

After my story broke, Joan decided to wait until she finished her picture with Audie Murphy, to marry. (P.S. She didn't wait, after all, as you all know by now.)

Our best psychiatrists claim that elopements are usually planned by children who have been tied too tightly to the apron strings and haven't fully expressed themselves. Oh, yeah?

I guess Dale and Katherine turned out to be just mamma and papa after all.

TATTLE TALES: The Van Johnsons keep denying it, but rumors persist that all is not well. One story is that Evie had consulted a lawyer, then changed her mind . . .

The Tyrone Powers have been getting the rugged rumor treatment, too. When I called Linda to check, she laughed and said, "Come out and have breakfast with us Sunday, Louella. You'll see for yourself how happy we are with our beautiful baby" . . .

Mrs. Fernando Lamas said on her arrival in Los Angeles to divorce Fernando that their parting is "very amicable." In fact, it is so amicable that Mrs. Lamas added, "Fernando is a wonderful man. I would like very much to live here in Los Angeles after we are divorced, so I can be near him."

Rock Hudson was a happy boy that Toilers

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Liz Taylor attended the wedding of columnist Ed Sullivan's daughter, Betty, to Robert Precht. Betty was a bridesmaid at Liz's first wedding.

Of The Sea takes him to London where Gene Tierney is making a movie with Clark Gable. Before Gene left Hollywood, she and Rock were an item. But gossip from London is that she has lost her heart, shall we say, elsewhere?

Speaking of Rock, his former girl friend, Vera-Ellen, may have eloped with her new heart, Dean Miller, by the time you read this.

THERE was warmth and genuine affection back of the testimonial dinner given Judy Garland—"Miss Show Business" they called her—by the Friars Club at the jam-packed Biltmore Bowl. Only one other woman has been so honored by the Friars—and that was Sophie Tucker.

On the dais with Judy were George Jessel, Eddie Cantor, Rosalind Russell, Olivia de Havilland, Marie Wilson, Ronald Reagan, Lt. Governor (of California) Goodwin Knight, George Burns, and Ezio Pinza.

But Mickey Rooney, who started with Judy, was not at the speakers' table. He was seated at a table on the floor with the other customers, many strangers to Judy. Certainly no other guest knew her better than the boy who was her co-star for so many years.

Poor Mickey tried hard not to show that he was hurt. He laughed harder than anyone else at the jokes. And his eyes grew misty when someone grew sentimental about Judy. But he laughed too loudly to fool me.

I don't say that Mickey hasn't his faults and sometimes he can be cocky to the point of being overbearing. But whoever forgot him in seating the speakers' table made a mistake for my money.

Roz Russell made the most charming speech of the evening saying that she had long been Judy's fan. "But I didn't need to bring my autograph book tonight, Judy," she said. "Your name is written in my heart."

George Burns got the biggest laugh of the night telling Judy that he, too, is a singer. "You got a better break than I did," cracked George. "Louis B. Mayer discovered you when you were ten. When I was ten, Louis B. Mayer was ten, too."

Ezio Pinza sang wonderfully—a parody on "Some Enchanted Evening"—about the time he managed to get two tickets to see Judy at the Palace.

Of course, the climax of the whole evening was when Judy took the spotlight and sang her heart out saying "Thanks."

Just as I was writing this, Judy Garland and

SPECIAL AT-HOME TREATMENT FOR 4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"!

Now—you don't have to let nature rob you of a nice skin. And it's so true. When a girl needs a pretty complexion, nature seems bent on spoiling it. Skin that only yesterday was baby-soft, suddenly begins to develop over-active oil glands. And at the same time your skin seems to get sluggish about throwing off the every-day accumulation of dead-skin cells. When these tiny, dead flakes build up into a layer over the pore openings—there's trouble ahead. Enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Today Pond's recommends a greaseless treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores, blackheads. It's quick, easy!

Remarkable

one-minute facial clears off... softens... brightens "young skin"

Cover face, all except eyes, with a lavish 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave 1 minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens stubborn, dead-skin cells—dissolves them off! Frees the tiny skin gland openings so they can function normally. Now—after 60 seconds—tissue off. How tingling-fresh your skin feels. And how much smoother, clearer it looks.

For skin that "can't take" heavy make-up: Use a thin film of greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream for a more natural, fine-textured, smoother powder base!

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Gregory Peck grabbed the reins to give his wife, Greta, a spin around the Colosseum in Rome. The actor is in Italy to do a picture. He took his three sons along, plans to stay a year.

Sid Luft called to tell me they are expecting a baby in the spring. I'd suspected this happy news for a week or so—but couldn't get them to admit it. Judy says, "Go ahead and laugh now about the weight I'm gaining. I don't care!"

THE battlin' Sinatras no more than made up a fight lasting ten days than they had another almost as hectic.

After pouting for almost two weeks, Frankie flew from Las Vegas (where he was appearing) to get Ava and take her back with him.

The very night she arrived, they tuned up another battle royal!

Of course, they say they like this sort of thing and that it means nothing. But, if you ask me, they are quarreling too often and too seriously for their own good and the good of their marriage.

Disgusting the way certain women tried to take advantage of Marilyn Monroe claiming to be her "mother" after Marilyn was misquoted as saying she had never known her real mother.

Marilyn knows—and has known for some time—that her mother is an invalid in a sanitarium near Los Angeles. I know of no other star who has weathered more hard breaks than this luscious blonde, unless it was Jean Harlow.

Someone recently dubbed Marilyn, "The new Goddess of Love—Junior Grade."

It is remarkable that Marilyn has retained her simplicity and sweetness with all this dizzying success and nonsense that surrounds her.

She's never forgotten her sad childhood and her heartaches for children who are orphaned and who believe they are not wanted or loved.

When I saw Marilyn recently she said, "I want to lead a drive to do something personal for orphans—not just the usual thing of sending dolls or food to an orphanage. I mean something intimate, actual contact with the children. It's the most awful thing in the world to feel that you have nobody to love you."

Marilyn, herself, doesn't have to worry on that score now. Joe DiMaggio, the baseball great, is perfectly willing to make up now for all the love she may have lost in her childhood.

They nearly fell over at MGM when Elizabeth Taylor hit them broadside with that English accent she re-acquired during her three-month honeymoon with Mike Wilding in London.

Of course, Liz was born in England, but many years in this country had softened those broad a's and clipped syllables.

And then, the prize baby walks in sounding like a cross between Noel Coward and Katharine Hepburn at her "rawlly" best.

This came in just peachy as Elizabeth is supposed to be the most American of American girls in The Girl Who Had Everything.

"Oh, it won't take me long to lose the accent," Liz laughed, "rawlly it won't!"

When she finishes the picture she'll have plenty of time to polish-up her Americanese again while she awaits the birth of the Wilding heir or heiress.

NEVER have I heard Rita Hayworth sound so happy as when I called her to check that Prince Aly Kahn was coming to Hollywood in late August to visit her and their daughter, Yasmine.

"Is this a reconciliation?" I asked my glamorous girl friend.

"It could be—it's possible," she replied and I wish you could have heard the happiness in her voice.

Rita, however, was not happy about those printed stories that she had sent an emissary to Cannes "offering" a reconciliation to Aly.

"Utter nonsense," she said. "Why should I send anyone to Aly about our problems when I talk with him so often over the Trans-Atlantic 'phone?"

Several months ago when I wrote my scoop on Rita for MODERN SCREEN, the very first interview she had given about her marriage, I told you I believed she was still in love with Aly although she insisted she was going through with her Reno divorce.

She would say nothing against him—in fact, if you remember, she told me, "It is very hard to get him out of my heart."

Well, I hope they get together. Their little daughter, Princess Yasmine, is the sweetest child, just adorable. And when Aly sees her again, I just don't see how he can let her go.

There's a line of dialogue, ad-libbed by Cyd Charisse, which will remain in the finished version of Sombrero.

There's a scene outside the Reforma Hotel in Mexico City (where the MGM troupe is on location) in which Vittorio Gassman, Cyd, and Ricardo Montalban are supposedly "looking over" the arriving guests.

Just for the laugh of it, Shelley Winters and Tony Martin decided to surprise their mates (Vittorio and Cyd) by walking on as extras.

Instead of being surprised, Vittorio played it straight and turned to Cyd asking, "Who are those people?"

"Nobodies!" wisecracked Mrs. Tony Martin. "Just movie-struck nobodies!"

THE young English actress (married) who is having such a fine old "secret" romance with an actor on the lot (also married) may be surprised to know they aren't fooling anyone.

She's been leaving the studio at noon every day—supposedly for the dentist's.

He leaves the studio at noon, supposedly to go home for lunch.

They meet at such a quiet little cafe—but not so quiet I haven't heard all about it!

THE LETTER BOX: The fans who wrote me several months ago complaining about Janet Leigh's low-cut gowns are now complaining about Judy Garland's decolletage. "Alva, of Seattle" writes: "We don't mind Judy putting on poundage—but tell her to keep it covered up!"

Kathryn Dickey, Huntsville, Alabama, is a wild-eyed rooter for Dale Robertson. Since your letter arrived, Kathryn, Dale has become the father of a baby girl, Rochelle. No, they hadn't expected a girl because the nursery was done in blue!

Nancy Fusse, Floral Park, New York, writes: "Every time Lana Turner falls in love and you write a story on her she always tells you 'This is the real thing. Our marriage will be so right, Louella'—and you always fall for it. She hasn't had a marriage turn out 'right' yet!" Well, Nancy! For heaven's sake!

That's all for now. See you next month

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

The Hollywood Reporter

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Everybody's holding their breath that the Liz Taylor-Mike Wilding baby won't be premature. Liz fell down the stairs at her home, and accidents do happen . . . Golly, today's movie stars are turning out more babies than movies! . . . Judy Garland, for instance. And wait and see if Judy and her mother don't reconcile after the Garland-Sid Luft image arrives sometime this winter. Mrs. Ethel Gilmore, Judy's ma, was quoted by a newspaperman as saying "Sid's a bad guy" after the wedding; later she denied it, saying, "Judy and I never had a quarrel. She just brushed me off. But all those things I'm supposed to have said against her aren't so. Judy's press agent banned me from talking." Mrs. Gilmore has been working as a clerk at Douglas Aircraft in Los Angeles . . . It looks like a Caesarean operation for Judy . . . Meanwhile, Luft has been setting up a $30,000 trust fund for his four-year-old son by Lynn Bari . . . And isn't it time we reporters quit describing Judy as "a mixed-up little girl"? After all, she's 30.

Garland & Liza

More babies: Lucille Ball's doctor wouldn't let her attend the Friars Club testimonial for Judy because of her condition. And Lucy's planning on co-starring her new arrival with herself and Desi Arnaz in their TV show, I Love Lucy . . . Something to marvel at, in early August: Jane Powell's 18-inch waist. The baby's due in early December . . . Lauren Bacall bought herself a fancy Schiaparelli gown to wear after HER baby arrives . . . "Wise heads" have been trying to talk Marilyn Monroe out of a quick marriage to Joe DiMaggio—and this in the face of Joe's and two other marriage proposals. Studio executives were urging her to use all the publicity she's been getting to bounce to top stardom and then, and only then, give a thought to marriage—if she still wants it. Know something? I think she'll take their advice.

WHO'S MAD AT WHO:

Debra Paget was originally announced for the starring role in Evangeline at 20th. Then the part was assigned to Gene Tierney. The gals aren't talking! . . . Ditto Lana Turner and Ginger Rogers. Ginger was all set for Why Should I Cry? at MGM. Then Lana read the script. Lana decided she liked it and got it . . . The stars must be colliding. And if the trouble isn't "horoscopic," maybe it's that rip-roaring earthquake we had out here. Anyway, Betty Hutton had a script argument over Ginger too. The gals were supposed to co-star in Topsy And Eva. Betty didn't want Ginger in the picture—didn't think she was right—and bowed out of her $5,000-a-week contract at Paramount rather than play it! . . . With Hutton and Alan Ladd gone, only two of Par's "Big Four" remain under contract: Bob Hope and Bing Crosby . . . Oh well, at least Betty's happy. Says she of Charlie O'Curran: "He keeps me calm. He treats me like a wife—not like a movie star. I've finally found my man—and it's wonderful." . . .

Rogers

Hutton & O'Curran

Olivia de Havilland and Marcus Goodrich were much more adult about their divorce than Joan Fontaine, Livvie's sister, and Bill Dozier. They put their heads together and worked out the settlement amicably before Livvie filed on grounds of "extreme cruelty" . . . When last heard from, Beetsie Wynn was dating Travis Kleefeld, once Jane Wyman's fiance. But Keenan Wynn, still torching for Beetsie, was hoping she would park her tootsies at the family hearthside when she returned from the Santa Barbara hoss show . . . While (Continued on page 00)

Gary Cooper was discovering Dusty Miller, Rocky Cooper was discovering Manuel Rojas, the Chilean polo player . . . It's reported Errol Flynn's pride was hurt because Clark Gable was dating Princess Ghika, the same doll Errol used to date, in Europe. She promised she would never forget Errol!

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Arlene Dahl and Lex Barker knocked the walls out of the bedroom of their new Bel-Air home to accommodate the 7x7 double bed that accommodates both of them—but mostly Lex's lanky frame . . . And then Lex, who doesn't want to be typed any more in Tarzan pictures, turned around and had all his old Tarzan loincloths made into a rug . . . I ran into Jeanne Crain trundling enough groceries for an army out of the Sunset Boulevard Thriftimart. She told me her feed bills are $60 a week now . . . Liz was shelling out $300 per month for their small apartment, which is why the Wildings have been so eager about finding a house . . . Marty Melcher knows where Doris Day is 24 hours a day. She checks in with his office every hour or so.

Dahl & Barker

A neighbor tells me that Audie Murphy has been complaining to the management of his apartment building about the noise the other tenants make. Audie squawked that he can't spend half the night walking the baby when he has an early studio call . . . Why doesn't Susie Hayward use her influence to get Jess Barker a good role—even if she has to do it over his protests? Her spouse deserves a big break in pictures right about now . . . Bing and Dixie Crosby are building a new home in Palm Springs . . . Jimmy Stewart's twins come down from their home on Roxbury Drive every day to play with Olivia de Havilland's Benjy on the Beverly Hills Hotel lawn. Their pop and his mom were playmates once too—remember?

SEX APPEAL:

Betty Grable was assigned two stand-ins for her bathing scenes in The Farmer Takes A Wife —one wet and one dry!... Marilyn Monroe told me: "I never take a sunbath. I want to feel blonde all over" . . . Movie fans in Italy call Rita Hayworth "The Beautiful Chest" . . . Anne Baxter had to get an okay from the Breen Office before she was permitted to wear a diamond in her navel for her role in My Wife's Best Friend . . . Marie Wilson wore a very sexy gown to a premiere. A fan took one look at her and yelled, "Is she on the outside trying to get in or on the inside trying to get out?"

Hayworth

Vera-Ellen is on a starch diet, trying to fill out those curves. She told me at the Judy Garland dinner she was down to 95 pounds—and she looked it! . . . Margaret O'Brien lost out on the role of Spencer Tracy's daughter in Years Ago after she tested for it. Studio

Are you in the know?

Should a greeny hesitate to date—

☐ A redhead ☐ A Varsity hero ☐ A frosh

Every eye's peeled while you "set" your future rating: a Jezebel? Or doe in the know? Takes grit for a freshman to reject an upperclassman's bid, but it's law, date-wise; guards junior and senior gals' bookings. Stick to the frosh set. On certain days, don't hesitate to meet all eyes—unflinching. The flat pressed ends of Kotex prevent revealing outlines. Further, you're extra comfortable: your new Kotex belt's made with soft-stretch elastic; non-twisting, non-curling.

When it's time to leave, do you—

☐ Linger longer ☐ Dash for the door

Ever insist you "must be going"—then tarry at the door 'til your hostess wilts? Even worse, do you sprint doorward almost without warning? Exit gracefully! After saying goodbye, depart—with poise. But poise at "problem" time often depends on comfort that stays and stays! Choose Kotex. Made to stay soft while you wear it, naturally Kotex holds its shape.

How to intrigue Unpredictable Pete?

☐ Suit yourself ☐ Make like a chameleon

You knock yourself out trying to be sportsy—because he says he likes the athletic type. Then he switches to the shy, so-helpless honeychile! Keep changing your personality to suit his moods? N-O! Be the way that suits you; your independence will interest him! You can suit yourself exactly (re "calendar" needs), with one of the 3 absorbencies of Kotex. Try all 3!

If you have "sandpaper" arms, better—

☐ Hug the TV set ☐ Start scrubbing

You needn't turn down "dance-dress" dates on account of rough spots on your upper arms. Spark your circulation—by scrubbing arms with bath brush, soap, warm water. (Start now, so you can wear your new Fall formals—unembarrassed.) And for extra protection from problem-day embarrassment, count on Kotex (so absorbent!) and that special safety center.

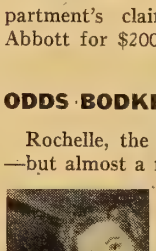
said, "She's too sexy for the role—we need somebody more juvenile, like Debbie Reynolds." Maggie sexy- You won't believe it but she's really developing, this kid! . . . Lana got a boy's haircut. I liked her better as a girl . . . But things can't be too tough for our Lana. She just bought her ninth mink coat.

FINANCIAL PAGE:



Mario Lanza fired his business manager, Sam Weiler. Because Mario went to the bank to buy himself a home, but when he got there his bank account was bare and so poor Mario got none. Mario claims he has been mismanaged. He was so upset he called MGM and cancelled a pre-recording session for The Student Prince at the last minute. Studio had a 46-piece orchestra on hand, waiting for the singer. It cost $5,000 to cancel the date . . . U-I is getting $50,000 from MGM for Ann Blyth's services opposite Mario in this picture. Ann gets to keep $20,000 of that . . . But Stewart Granger hauled down $125,000 for co-starring with Rita Hayworth in Salome—Dance Of The Seven Veils.

Blyth

His quarrel with U-I centered on money, and that's why Tony Curtis is happy about his loan-out to Paramount, where he'll star in Houdini. His good friend Jerry Lewis, a Par star, engineered the deal, and Tony gets a bonus for doing it . . . Then too, Janet Leigh dons that hoped-for maternity frock—at long last. But only for her role in MGM's Steak For Connie . . . Mrs. Francis Taylor is now on MGM's payroll for $500 a week. Liz's mother is a sharp business woman and an ornament at the studio . . . Esther Williams has consolidated all her corporations so that she can have "rock under her feet." She brushes off rumors about a bust-up of her marriage like this: "After you're married awhile and have kids, rumors roll off your back" . . . Lou Costello sold his horses at the Agua Caliente race track to pay the Treasury Department's claim against himself and Bud Abbott for $200,000 back income taxes.

ODDS BODKINS:

Rochelle, the Dale Robertson baby, arrived —but almost a month late! Dale (incidentally, his fan mail is fast creeping up on Betty Grable's at 20th!) said, "I was beginning to wonder where babies came from!" . . . Barbara Stanwyck brought her own champagne and diamond-studded swizzle-stick to Ross Hunter's housewarming. (A swizzle-stick, kiddies, is something you mix drinks with!) Anyway, Barbara said she hates champagne but brought it so she would have a chance to show off the stick, a birthday present from Mary Livingstone. Mary bought it because she couldn't think of anything else to give Barbara, who "has everything" . . . Bob Arthur (the young actor, not the producer) put in a phone call to Jane Wyman. She blasted him up, down and sideways over the phone about something she didn't like in connection with The Will Rogers Story—until he explained he wasn't the Arthur who produced it but the one who played with her in Just For You. I don't think Jane liked her part in the Rogers picture.

Stanwyck

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Mona Freeman's mother arrived from the East to chaperone her daughter and stifle those rumors about Mona and a studio executive . . . Twosomes-of-the-month: Pier Angeli and Kirk Douglas, Ursula Thiess and Bob Taylor, Gloria Grahame and Vincente Minnelli, Lady Sylvia Gable and Roger Davis, the late Fanny Brice's best friend . . . Nicky Hilton is on the water wagon . . . Lana spread her sails for the usual six-week divorce stay in Nevada. Then it's Land Ho, Fernando! . . . Meanwhile, Lydia, Fernando's wife, gets sole custody of their five-year-old Alexandra under terms of the settlement . . . Aldo Ray, who's also in the process of getting a divorce, said he'd like to date Jean Peters. But she said she didn't think she was his type.

Freeman

Another Ray—Johnnie—hasn't been able to cry enough tears to buy his wife, Marilyn, a new white mink stole to replace the one she received as a wedding present from her stepmother, Mary Morrison . . . It must be serious. Bob Wagner introduced his father to Debbie Reynolds' grandmother . . . Ava Gardner and Frankie Sinatra had their biggest battle yet in Las Vegas. But afterwards both got on the long distance phone to friends in Hollywood, cried into every available ear —and then made up!

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Judge Mildred Lillie, who made the decision in the Bergman-Lindstrom court hassle over daughter Pia, apparently felt that Ingrid would be too busy making pictures all summer to devote much time to Pia even if the child went to Rome. It's felt the reunion would have been somewhat strained, in view of Ingrid's new twins (did you know they're calling her Twingrid in Hollywood?)—anyway, it's felt Pia might have felt "shut out," in view of Ingrid's necessary attention to the new babies . . . Strangest note of all is that in Ingrid's new picture, Europe '51, the girl who plays her movie daughter commits suicide because of neglect! . . . Everybody was saying that if Glenn Ford and Eleanor Powell went through with their threatened divorce he would marry a young brunette actress. But then the Fords reconciled.

Bergman

Joe Mankiewicz is responsible for talking Greer Garson and Deborah Kerr into playing the leading femme roles in Julius Caesar, along with Marlon Brando. Remember when these two were rivals for the title of First Lady of MGM? Was a time when the gals wouldn't even speak . . . Jennifer Jones left three teeth marks on Charlton Heston's nose after a breathless kissing scene in Ruby Gentry.

Exiled and believed dead, Ivanhoe returns to England in disguise to rally forces of King Richard, has secret rendezvous with his fiancée.

Rebecca, the daughter of wealthy Jew Isaac, overhears Ivanhoe's plea for money, slips away to his hideout to donate family jewels.

Captured, Rebecca is tried as a witch. To save her, Ivanhoe challenges King John's henchman Bois-Guilbert to bloody death-duel.

IVANHOE

MGM's picturization of Sir Walter Scott's best-read book is one of the finest recent examples of the filming of a famous novel. It is also a heartening answer to the question, posed by Quo Vadis, of what's happening to the spectacle picture. Robert Taylor, in the title part, returns to England after his king and leader, Richard, has been taken prisoner in Europe while on a Crusade and finds that the king's despotic brother, the regent John, has seized power with the help of the Norman part of the populace. In addition, Ivanhoe's Saxon father, who disapproved of his leaving in the first place, has disowned him. But with the moral backing of his father's beautiful ward, the uncrowned Saxon princess Rowena (Joan Fontaine), and the financial backing of Isaac, a Jew whom he has befriended, Ivanhoe sets about an undercover operation to overthrow John and bring Richard back. Isaac's shy young daughter Rebecca gives him further valuable aid. Historical films often offend as large a segment of the audience as they entertain, because many people prefer their drama on a small, human scale, rather than on parade. Ivanhoe, however, offers just about everything for everybody: a richly colorful, elaborately interwoven yet logical melodramatic story that is as historically accurate as Scott's (it is, actually, an excellent condensation of his plot); medieval men and women who seem to be real without appearing overly modern; the full pomp and circumstance of the middle ages' pageantry without any glossing-over of the era's cruel customs; one of the most unusual scenes in a recent motion picture, the besieging of a castle (it is finally taken by sheer force of manpower and bow and arrows); and an honest examination of anti-Semitism, as widespread in that half-Christian, half-barbaric world as in the present. All these elements are so well fused that it is difficult to separate them and divide the credit. Luckily there is plenty to go around, and the few imperfections that appear—such as Elizabeth Taylor's pale, colorless Rebecca—probably show up only by comparison.

DREAMBOAT

Picture Clifton Webb as a prim, precise, super-cultivated college professor. Then take a deep breath and picture him again, this time as a super-lover of the silent screen. That's a lot more difficult, but Webb plays both in Dreamboat and makes it all seem logical, at least for the duration of the show. "Dreamboat" is what Ginger Rogers, as a former film star, dubs him during the commercials as she introduces to the television audience the silent pictures they made many years ago. When the first one appears on TV, it creates an uproar on the campus of conservative old Underhill College, where Clifton is professor of Latin and English Literature. The quiet old codger, it seems, has kept his cinematic past a secret. Clifton's students make his life and that of his motherless daughter, an undergraduate herself and a junior edition of Mr. W., miserable with jokes and innuendoes. The board of trustees is properly shocked to discover that its professor is really the great romancer. So is spinster college president Elsa Lanchester—until she remembers that the actor used to be her secret idol. So Clifton soon finds it necessary to go to New York and fight the showing of his old films, with the threat of a permanent injunction as his main weapon. That means that he must meet up with a slippery agent and with Ginger, his oldtime partner and onetime flame. The fun gets faster and Clifton gets more furious; he can't get away from his fans or those darn commercials. The latter, however, finally provide a hilarious courtroom solution. Dreamboat is Hollywood's first really hard-hitting frontal attack on its new rival, television, and most of it is first-rate farce.

FEARLESS FAGAN

Carleton Carpenter and a friendly, fun-loving animal named Fagan divide the lion's share of the spotlight in this unpretentious little film. It's a picture that's lots of fun, because the people who produced it knew exactly where to begin and where to go with their single novel idea and, most importantly, where to stop. Fearless Fagan begins when a young circus clown, Carleton Carpenter, who is owner of a pet lion is suddenly inducted into the Army. Carpenter doesn't know what to do with the beast he loves so well. It seems that Fagan has no idea that he is a lion and so fails to respond according to pattern when chairs are waved, guns shot off and whips snapped; he answers only to kindness and caresses, loves music and likes to play with his toy duck. Carpenter refuses to give him away and can't let the circus people have him, for they are lion-tamers of the old school and are itching for the chance to prove that Fagan really is as fierce as his fellows. And how many householders want a lion as a temporary household pet? So Fagan comes to camp with his master, unbeknownst, of course, to Army brass, and when Janet Leigh stops by to entertain the troops she inadvertently stumbles onto Private Carpenter's secret. She tells the colonel, and then Carpenter's problem becomes the whole command's. If there are few guffaws in the film, there are a lot of chuckles, and Fagan's playful innocence is a blessed relief after the apparent arrogance of some other animal actors. Carpenter proves an admirable foil, but it is Fagan who steals the scenes.

Cast: Carleton Carpenter, Janet Leigh, Keenan Wynn.—MGM.

THE BIG SKY

Howard Hawks's The Big Sky is a big, sprawling adventure yarn about a little band of fur traders on the Missouri River back in the 1830's, but it's not A. B. Guthrie, Jr.'s story of the same name. Guthrie's novel was notable for its feeling for time, place and people—for the sense of adventure, the trail-blazing force that drove men on into the wilderness and the evil in them that caused them to destroy what they found. The movie, although based on the best-seller, brings the pitch down to a specific plot, seldom implying the spirit behind the story, never showing, as Guthrie does, that for all the good in them the protagonists are basically bad men. This is said only by way of warning that partisans of the picture's sourcebook will find here little of the mood or meaning that overlay the original. This version follows a crew of hard-drinking, brawling boatmen, including Kirk Douglas, Dewey Martin and the latter's uncle, Arthur Hunnicutt, 1200 miles up the uncharted "Big Mo" to bring illegal liquor and guns to the Indians beyond the last fort of the white men. As hostage and protection, they are bringing back to her native Blackfoot tribe an Indian maiden named Teal Eye (Elizabeth Threatt). Her story, and the attraction both the big trapper, Douglas, and his younger friend, Martin, feel for her, is interwoven with the troubles the keelboat crew have with white cargo inspectors and a monopolistic trading company, unfriendly Sioux and the dangerous rapids of the river itself. The scene is a new and interesting one, the action often exciting, the direction slick, so that many moviegoers will be satisfied. Others will resent the fact that Guthrie's powerful book about one of the basic tragedies of America's beginnings should turn up, on the screen, as just another happy-ending outdoor adventure film.

Cast: Kirk Douglas, Dewey Martin, Elizabeth Threatt, Arthur Hunnicutt.—RKO.

AFFAIR IN TRINIDAD

Rita Hayworth's return to the screen is accomplished with minimum fanfare in her new film. Trite and true to all the old clichés of espionage tales, Affair In Trinidad features her as an American café entertainer in Port-of-Spain, whose artist-husband's "suicide" sets off a chain of events in the tracking down of a team of international spies. Kingpin of the ring is wealthy, mysterious Max Fabian (Alexander Scourby). Because he is an admirer of Rita's and was a friend of her late husband, the police give her a chance to clear herself by doing some counter-espionage work for them and discovering what Fabian and his friends are up to. Things begin to get complicated when Glenn Ford, her husband's older brother, arrives from the U.S., first suspects Rita of murder, then falls for her, finally becoming suspicious all over again when he sees her playing up to Fabian. The melodramatic mix-ups come to a climax at a big party given by Fabian. Demanding that Ford leave (she tells him she's having an affair with Fabian so he will depart), Rita proceeds to discover the spy's secret and is herself discovered and imprisoned to be "disposed of later." Although Miss Hayworth isn't called upon to do much acting, she acquits herself well enough, especially in a couple of dance numbers created by Valerie Bettis. Ford's role calls for him to be unhappy most of the time, so he barks his lines truculently, as if to make his opinion of his situation clear. What saves Affair In Trinidad from becoming a mi-

It took three marriages to do it—but Lana's finally learned her lesson. No more midnight elopements, no more playboys. She wants a home for Cheryl, now.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

party girl grows up

■ It has taken 17 long, eventful, hectic, heartbreaking years, but Lana Turner, at 32, has finally come of age.

Refusing steadfastly to be defeated by life, Lana has evolved a sense of values that is intelligent, wholesome, and for her, strangely realistic.

In her present scheme of things, the welfare of her daughter Cheryl comes first, her career comes second, and men come third.

For Lana, this is revolutionary.

Men and love, until now, have been the dominant factors in her life, and as she herself said last year, "My life has been a series of emergencies, in which I have had to take the wheel without knowing where I was going or how to run the machine."

Today, Lana knows better. Figuratively speaking, she realizes that if a girl drives slowly and keeps her eyes on her objective, she won't encounter nearly the number of pitfalls she finds when she races headlong, living each day as though it were her last.

The realization that she must go slow and take stock of what she really wants from life crystalized, I believe, this past summer, when, after finishing The Bad And The Beautiful, Lana took Cheryl and flew to Lake Tahoe for a six-weeks vacation.

Lake Tahoe is an incomparably beautiful body of water, half in Nevada and half in California. Actresses in the market for a divorce usually rent a cottage on the Nevada side of the shore, go to Reno, hire a lawyer, then spend the next six weeks gambling and dancing and dating, going the rounds of the many casinos and night clubs that dot the resort.

That is what everyone thought Lana had in mind, because few people know how much the beauty has changed since Fernando Lamas came into her life and Bob Topping went out.

Lana is no longer the frivolous playgirl of old. "I'm a hard-working actress," she says, "who believes in looking after her daughter and her own business. I also believe, despite previous unfortunate experiences, (Continued on page 101)

■ In a swank Beverly Hills restaurant run by a reformed pretender to the royal Russian crown named Michael Romanoff, there gathers each afternoon a group of wealthy, indolent women who specialize in Hollywood gossip.

These women, who have pipe lines to all the powder rooms in town, can tell you exactly when Judy Garland and Sid Luft expect the baby, what lies behind the ceaseless bickering between Van and Evie Johnson, and why the Liz Taylor-Michael Wilding marriage simply can't endure.

For the past several weeks, this last subject has been their favorite conversational topic, largely because Wilding, with or without his beautiful pregnant bride, has been frequenting the eatery.

I occupied the booth adjoining these hoydens a few weeks ago when Wilding took Liz to lunch just before she started her last MGM picture, The Girl Who Had Everything.

SHELLEY USED TO TALK AND VITTORIO LISTENED. NOW PICTURES SHOW HE'S MORE SELF-ASSURED

Shelley's burned up over rift rumors. And this only makes Hollywood wonder all the more if the Shell-Gass combo has already gone up in smoke.

by Consuelo Anderson

■ Ever since their marriage in Mexico early this year, Shelley Winters and her Italian Casanova, Vittorio Gassmann, have been making the columns, and of late, the items haven't been too favorable.

Supposedly the newlyweds have been battling all over the country, and their chances for a long and happy marriage look mighty slim.

"Shell and Gass had a battle royal in Chasen's Restaurant the other night," one columnist reported a few weeks ago, "and Shell left in tears."

"Shelley Winters and her bridegroom, Vittorio Gassmann," writes another, "should keep their quarrels at home and not out in public."

"Hollywood insiders," opines a third reporter, "say that Shell and Gass won't stay together for a year."

Confronted with these reports when she returned from a trip to Mexico City where Vittorio was making Sombrero on location, and asked for an explanation, the frank and fiery Shelley burst out, "It's disgusting. That's the word for these lies—disgusting. I believe in publicity as much as any actress living, but when they start interfering with my marriage, when they start printing those awful lies, I'm telling you it's disgusting.

"To read those items someone would think that Vittorio and I've been fighting — I mean fighting all the time. If (Continued on page 95)

Junie always wanted stardom . . . and she got it, even though it meant fighting every inch of the way. But now, rumor has it that she's willing to turn her back on the cameras, and retire as plain Housewife. Here's what June says . . .

BY CAROLINE BROOKS

Is June Allyson really quitting?

■ Ever since last December when she completed Girl In White, the rumor has been hushed all over Hollywood that June Allyson is retiring from motion pictures.

When the cute little blonde with the dark blue eyes failed to make a single movie during the first six months of 1952 and announced that "Richard and I expect to spend August and September in Europe," the retirement rumor assumed the proportion of near fact.

Whereupon everyone asked a most sensible question. Why should Junie, a young actress not yet 30, retire during the prime of her career when she is pulling down $3,250 a week?

June's answer is that she doesn't measure happiness in terms of money.

"More than half the year's flown by," she told me. "I haven't made a single picture, and still I'm the happiest woman you ever met. I'm in a wonderful position. I don't ever have to work. I have Richard. And two lovely children, Pam and Rickey. Gee! What more can any girl want?"

I said nothing, but my mind wandered back ten years when a frightened little rabbit named June Allyson first came out to Hollywood. Back then she was one of the most career-conscious youngsters this town has ever seen. Stardom was her sole objective, and the fear of failure constantly nagged her. "I don't want to go back to New York having failed," she used to say. "Not now." And she worked with a willpower and concentration few other young actresses have ever maintained.

She would stop producers on the lot and plead for parts. "Honestly," she'd say, and her eyes would twinkle and at times even grow watery, "I know I can play the part." She would study her lines and rehearse her dance routines as if nothing else mattered. And back then it all seemed pitiful to me, this little bundle of energy trying so hard for success when success seemed earmarked for Gloria De Haven.

Gloria and June broke in at MGM just about the same time. They were cast in Two Girls And A Sailor opposite Van Johnson, and the studio hierarchy was convinced that De Haven would emerge a new and great attraction. But the studio bigshots miscalculated. It was little June Allyson who ran away with the public's fancy when the picture was released.

That taste of success was all Junie needed. It whet her appetite. Career became her obsession. Thoughts of love, men, (Continued on page 91)

Dean and Jerry stick as close together as two newlyweds during the day, but come time to head for home, they get a quick divorce!

two wives – two lives

Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis may act crazy as loons when they're on stage—but these smart cookies know that keeping their private lives apart is what keeps the team together!

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

■ Since the antique days of Damon and Pythias, there have been few double-chum, bosom buddies operating as close together as a couple of fabulously funny boys in Hollywood named Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis.

Some people swear that when Dean takes a drink, Jerry reaps a hangover, that if Lewis gulps down a hotdog, Martin is certain to burp, that a day on the beach for Dino spreads a deep tan over the Little Monster, sitting home in the shade. This impression stems from their superbly synchronized shenanigans, and it's true that in the heat of action there's telepathy between that pair that could put Western Union out of business. Often when Jerry starts a sentence, Dean finishes it. Only the other day, knocking around in rehearsal, the following exchange of dialogue was recorded:

Dean: What do you think?
Jerry: Why not?
Dean: Shall we?
Jerry: Let's!

And they racketed right through a wild new routine which never missed a lick or trick.

This perfectly blended oneness, most

Dean, Jeanne, and Dino, Jr., lead a home life very different from that of Jerry, his wife Patti, and their two sons, Gary and Ronald (right).

critics agree, is a big reason why Martin and Lewis are the greatest double-barrelled hit in the history of show business. It was spontaneous and electric the desperate night six years ago when it blew the fuse and welded Dean and Jerry together at the 500 Club in Atlantic City. Since then it has never dimmed, and the cockeyed wonders have topped every record on the books.

They stayed 18 weeks at Broadway's famous Copacabana where no previous act had lasted more than two. In five quickly-slapped-together Hollywood pictures, their (Continued on next page) producer, Hal Wallis, has grossed over $10,000,000. And there's no telling how high the profits on their two latest Wallis films, Jumping Jacks and The Stooge, will go. In San Francisco, on one theatre appearance, they rang the cash register for $10,000 in popcorn and candy sales alone, more than the previous attraction had collected from admissions. In Minneapolis they pulled in $138,000, more than double the $65,000 mark Bing Crosby had set. In Chicago they were offered $20,000

HE COULDN'T RELAX IF HIS LIFE DEPENDED ON IT

Portraits of himself and Dean, press clippings and scrapbooks, keep reminding Jerry of business even in the privacy of his own living room.

Dean takes his golf as easily as he takes everything else. Here, he, Jeanne, and Dino, Jr., take time off for some putting.

just to show up at a private party tossed by a millionaire. At the Paramount in New York they were paid off at the rate of 70 per cent for Martin and Lewis, 30 per cent for the house—an unheard of profit split. Last March, on a 16½-hour telethon in New York, they raised $1,148,000 for their pet charity, muscular dystrophy. This year, with movies, TV, radio, records, theatre appearances, night clubs and fairs, the beautifully batty boys will gross over $3,000,000.

Georgie Jessel, Mister Show Business himself, summed it up not long ago at a national exhibitors' convention at the Waldorf-Astoria. "Gentlemen," he said, "let's face it. Today there are only two names that will pack them in, good times or bad. Those names are Martin and Lewis."

Throughout this fantasticly successful spree, Dean and Jerry have clung to each other like tipsy revellers who are afraid to let go, lest they both fall on their faces. Financially, it's share and share alike with them, and always has been. Even when Dean sings a recording alone, he insists that Jerry split the proceeds.

Physically, they complement each other. On tour, Jerry, who's a jittery early riser, makes Dean, who's a relaxed sleepyhead, stay in the hay, while he goes to the theatre and rehearses Dean's songs with the band. Dean, who is 170 pounds of muscle, has developed a belligerent, big-brother protectorate over Jerry, who is 130 pounds of skin and bones. (Continued on page 106)

She wants a big, tall somebody!

■ While lunching in the studio commissary some weeks ago, Debra Paget came back with an odd answer when a fellow across the table jokingly asked her if she ever dreamed of men. "Do I have nightmares, you mean?" was her reply.

Eighteen-year-old girls are not ordinarily this leery of the opposite sex, and neither is Debra. But, as she has made very clear, she hates questions alluding to the fact that she doesn't go out (which she gets kidded about a lot), and she doesn't want people to pry into her personal affairs. While working in Stars And Stripes Forever with Bob Wagner, she went into a three-day cutting silence every time he got near her because she thought he had something to do with an item that reported the two of them as a romantic pair. Inasmuch as Bob goes with Debbie Reynolds, it made her look as though she were trying to steal him. But, at the same time, as her mother, Mrs. Margaret Griffin, pointed out, Bob would be slitting his own throat by having anything to do with such a story.

Debra finally saw the sense of this, but here was another tell-tale incident, significant to those who know her well; Debra, in matters of the heart, doesn't care to be taken lightly.

The truth is, in Debra's own words, "No, I don't dream of men when I'm asleep. But I have my dreams when I'm awake. I think there is quite a difference."

The "difference" is, as she explains, that she hopes to meet the one and only "somebody", (Continued on page 64)

my mom

by Tony Curtis

I call her Josephine, Frances or Judith although her name's Helen. She's my No. 1 audience, my oldest fan. My mom's the best—and so is her stuffed cabbage!

■ She's short and plump and hysterical and sweet, and she has one of those faces that advertise she's one of history's greatest cooks. She's the kind of mom every guy should have. When I was a kid, I was properly respectful and called her "mama," but since I got out of the Navy, I've been calling her Josephine, Frances, Judith or Nellie. And although her name is Helen, Mom loves it. She laughs at anything I say. She'd laugh if I told her the house was on fire. She's my greatest audience and the rock of my life.

My first memory of Mom is the time I sat beside her in a theater in New Brunswick, Connecticut. Manny, my father, was in a play given by Hungarian actors, and I was getting a big boot out of the whole thing until some woman in the cast began chasing my pop around the stage, wielding an axe over his head. That set me off into a howl, and I looked up at Mom for support. She was so composed she looked like she was watching somebody bake a cake, instead of some dame trying to scalp her husband. "Shh, Bernie, shush," she said, and I thought she'd gone off her rocker.

I don't remember ever thinking Mom was beautiful, the way guys do in books, but I know now that she must have been very pretty as a young woman. I picture her coming to America when she was a girl, sort of temptingly plump, with that (Continued on page 97)

When Tony first started dating Janet Leigh, his mom was very impressed. And she heard their wedding bells long before they did.

On the outside, Donald and Gwen O'Connor's house is coral and white.

Donald and Gwen O'Connor bought a little house. His career grew bigger and bigger, but they stayed in their little house and changed it instead of their address.

BY MARVA PETERSON

In the Pink (house, that is)

Hollywood rumor recently had "the Battling O'Connors" separating. As we went to press, though, they were still together.

Gwen O'Connor, who is crazy about color, made her interiors exceptionally bright with a coral ceiling in the living room, purple walls, and the sectional couch and drapes repeating the scheme.

The den is small but the effect is spacious, thanks to Gwen's idea of extending the same gray wall-to-wall carpeting all through the house. This creates the optical illusion of much more room.

When Donald bought the house, it had only one bedroom, but Donna changed all that. The five-year-old now has a place of her own with lots of toy room due to Gwen's judicious use of space.

The master bedroom is done in royal blue with accents of red corduroy. One wall is lined with Donald's wardrobe closets. Gwen "enlarged" the room by having all the closet doors mirrored.

■ Donald O'Connor, the hottest young actor in Hollywood today—four major studios are pleading with him to accept $75,000 a picture—was sitting in the MGM commissary the other week, munching a fast sandwich.

Debbie Reynolds, his leading lady in I Love Melvin, sat down beside him.

"Tell me, Don," she said "is it really true about your wife?"

Twenty-six year-old Donald smiled. "You mean about her seven toes?"

"No, silly. I mean about your house."

"I've been told," Debbie continued, "that every few months your wife completely redecorates your house."

"I wouldn't know," Donald cracked. "Gwen and I only love there." (Editor's note: MODERN SCREEN hopes the O'Connor rift rumors, which were circulating recently, have no basis in fact.)

A minute later the irrepressible O'Connor—he is generally conceded to be "the sweetest guy in Hollywood"—turned serious for a few seconds. "I'm the kind of guy, Debbie," he explained, "who believes in hobbies. I collect marbles, bottle tops, films, old cars, records. Gwen's only hobby is redecorating. So long as it keeps her happy, she can re-do the house every Tuesday." (Continued on next page)

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

The den shows touches of Donald's collecting mania. The sketch commemorates Donald's work in the Francis pictures. One of the house's three television sets is in the den.

Gwen bought fewer pieces of furniture and had some of it painted the same color as the walls to make the house look less cluttered. Here the bedroom chests are royal blue.

Donald says, "Gwen won't cook in a kitchen unless it looks like a hospital." To take away the clinical look, Gwen used red and green wallpaper and Pennsylvania dutch furniture.

Gwen O'Connor is a 25-year-old beauty, who first met her husband when he was 13 years old and four feet seven inches tall. They met in the Paramount commissary. Gwen played bit parts in films, and Donald was a graduate of vaudeville who'd been signed to a studio contract.

"It was hate at first sight," Gwen recalls. "Don thought I was nothing, and I thought he was less."

Three years later, Gwen Carter and Donald O'Connor met backstage at a vaudeville show and, through some strange alchemy, their hate turned to love.

One night when Donald was all of 16, he decided to become engaged to Gwen. He took her to a party. At 11 o'clock the lights fortuitously went out for a few minutes. Donald grabbed a girl's hand and slipped a ring on her finger. When the lights went on, he was shocked to discover that instead of giving the ring to Gwen who was sitting on his right, he'd slipped it on the finger of another girl sitting at his left. "I straightened that one out in a hurry," he says.

In 1944, having done very well for Universal in a dozen light comedies, Donald felt his local draft board breathing down his neck.

A week before he was inducted into the Air Corps, the versatile young star decided that the time had come for him to engage in a serious philosophical discussion with Gwen, his red-headed fiancée. Going off to war is a pretty big step. No laughing matter. Especially when you're 18.

That night Don and Gwen discussed life, love, and their future together, and they came to a big decision. "We decided," Gwen says, "not to wait. We climbed into Don's Model A Ford and headed for Tijuana. Naturally, the car broke down, but we managed to get married and enjoy a wonderful honeymoon."

Returning to Hollywood, the newlyweds rented a small, picturesque house that had only one bedroom and one bath.

Despite Don's subsequent rise to fame and riches, this is the very same house the O'Connors now occupy—only today it has two bedrooms but still that same one bath.

For a movie star of Donald's earning capacity—he's good for a cool million within the next seven years—the house is plainly too small. "But there are other points to consider," says Gwen, who along with her fragile beauty also features plenty of common sense. "I wouldn't want to be bothered with a home so large that I needed a staff of servants. You know, like one of those tremendous Bel-Air jobs. The way things are today, it's just too hard to get and keep help. We do very nicely with a young girl who looks after Donna—she's our five-year-old—and I have a maid who comes in five days a week. I do most of the cooking, because I've learned to cook the way Don's mother does. When we want to entertain, throw a big shindig, we have a champagne party out on the lawn.

"Besides, if we had a large house, we wouldn't be able to redecorate every year. This way Alley and I go right ahead, and Don doesn't care."

"Alley" is Allen Kirk, Donald O'Connor's best friend. Years ago Kirk was a shoe salesman (Continued on page 109)

he never took a lesson

■ The door leading to the office of one of the dramatic coaches at Columbia Studio was open about a foot. Inside, a lady stood before a handsome young girl and directed a portion of a scene they were working on. Then the fledgling actress tried it. She turned elegantly, strolled to a large chair, twisted about neatly and sat, being careful to keep the legs straight and the feet in the proper position. Seated, she delivered a line of dialogue, and the coach smiled, pleased.

A young man watched through the space in the doorway, hiding himself from the couple inside. A friend, passing in the hall, slapped him on the back.

"Hi, Aldo," he greeted.

Aldo Ray put his fingers to his lips in a worried shush and tip-toed away from the door.

"What's the matter?" his friend asked when they were out of earshot. "Something wrong?"

"Nah," said Aldo with a grin. "I'm just not supposed to be here, that's all."

"Why not?" asked his friend.

"Well," said Aldo, "they don't want me to take any acting lessons. It's better that nobody should see me looking in there."

And, oddly enough, that's the way it is. Columbia does not want Aldo Ray to take acting lessons, voice coaching or anything else that might change one whit the unique talent that it has uncovered in its newest star. The fellow who waltzed into the co-starrng role with Judy Holliday in The Marrying Kind, and convinced the critics he was an experienced, accomplished actor, has never taken a lesson in his life. And if the company brass has anything to do with it, he never will.

In order to fathom the lad who acts, naturally, and is good enough to get the critical approval of the poobahs who pass on the screen performances of the stars, you'd have to see more of Aldo Ray than you can in a movie or (Continued on page 88)

Fords had absolutely no intention of separating. They'd had a little family spat, and that was all. Everything was bright and sunny again.

On Tuesday Mr. Walter Winchell, who usually knows about such things, ran an item in his column to the effect that Glenn Ford was sweet on Larraine Cugat, the ex-wife of rhumba band-leader Xavier Cugat.

On Wednesday, Miss Cugat, said in an interview with the press, "It's news to me. I've never met Glenn Ford. We've never even been introduced. We happened to go to Europe on the same boat, the Liberté, but I've never even spoken to the guy."

On Thursday another columnist opined that Winchell had the wrong girl in mind, that, in fact, Mr. Glenn Ford wasn't in love with any eastern beauty; the eastern beauty happened to be in love with him. Her name was Geraldine Brooks, the daughter of the president of Brooks, New York's leading theatrical costumers. Geraldine had been Glenn's leading (Continued on page 65)

what Betty Lanza has done for Mario

Hollywood's talking about the new Lanza—a slimmer, trimmer, more simmered-down Mario. And they've got his lovely wife to thank for it!

BY JIM BURTON

When Mario got down to 157 lbs. for Because You're Mine, Betty persuaded him to stay that way.

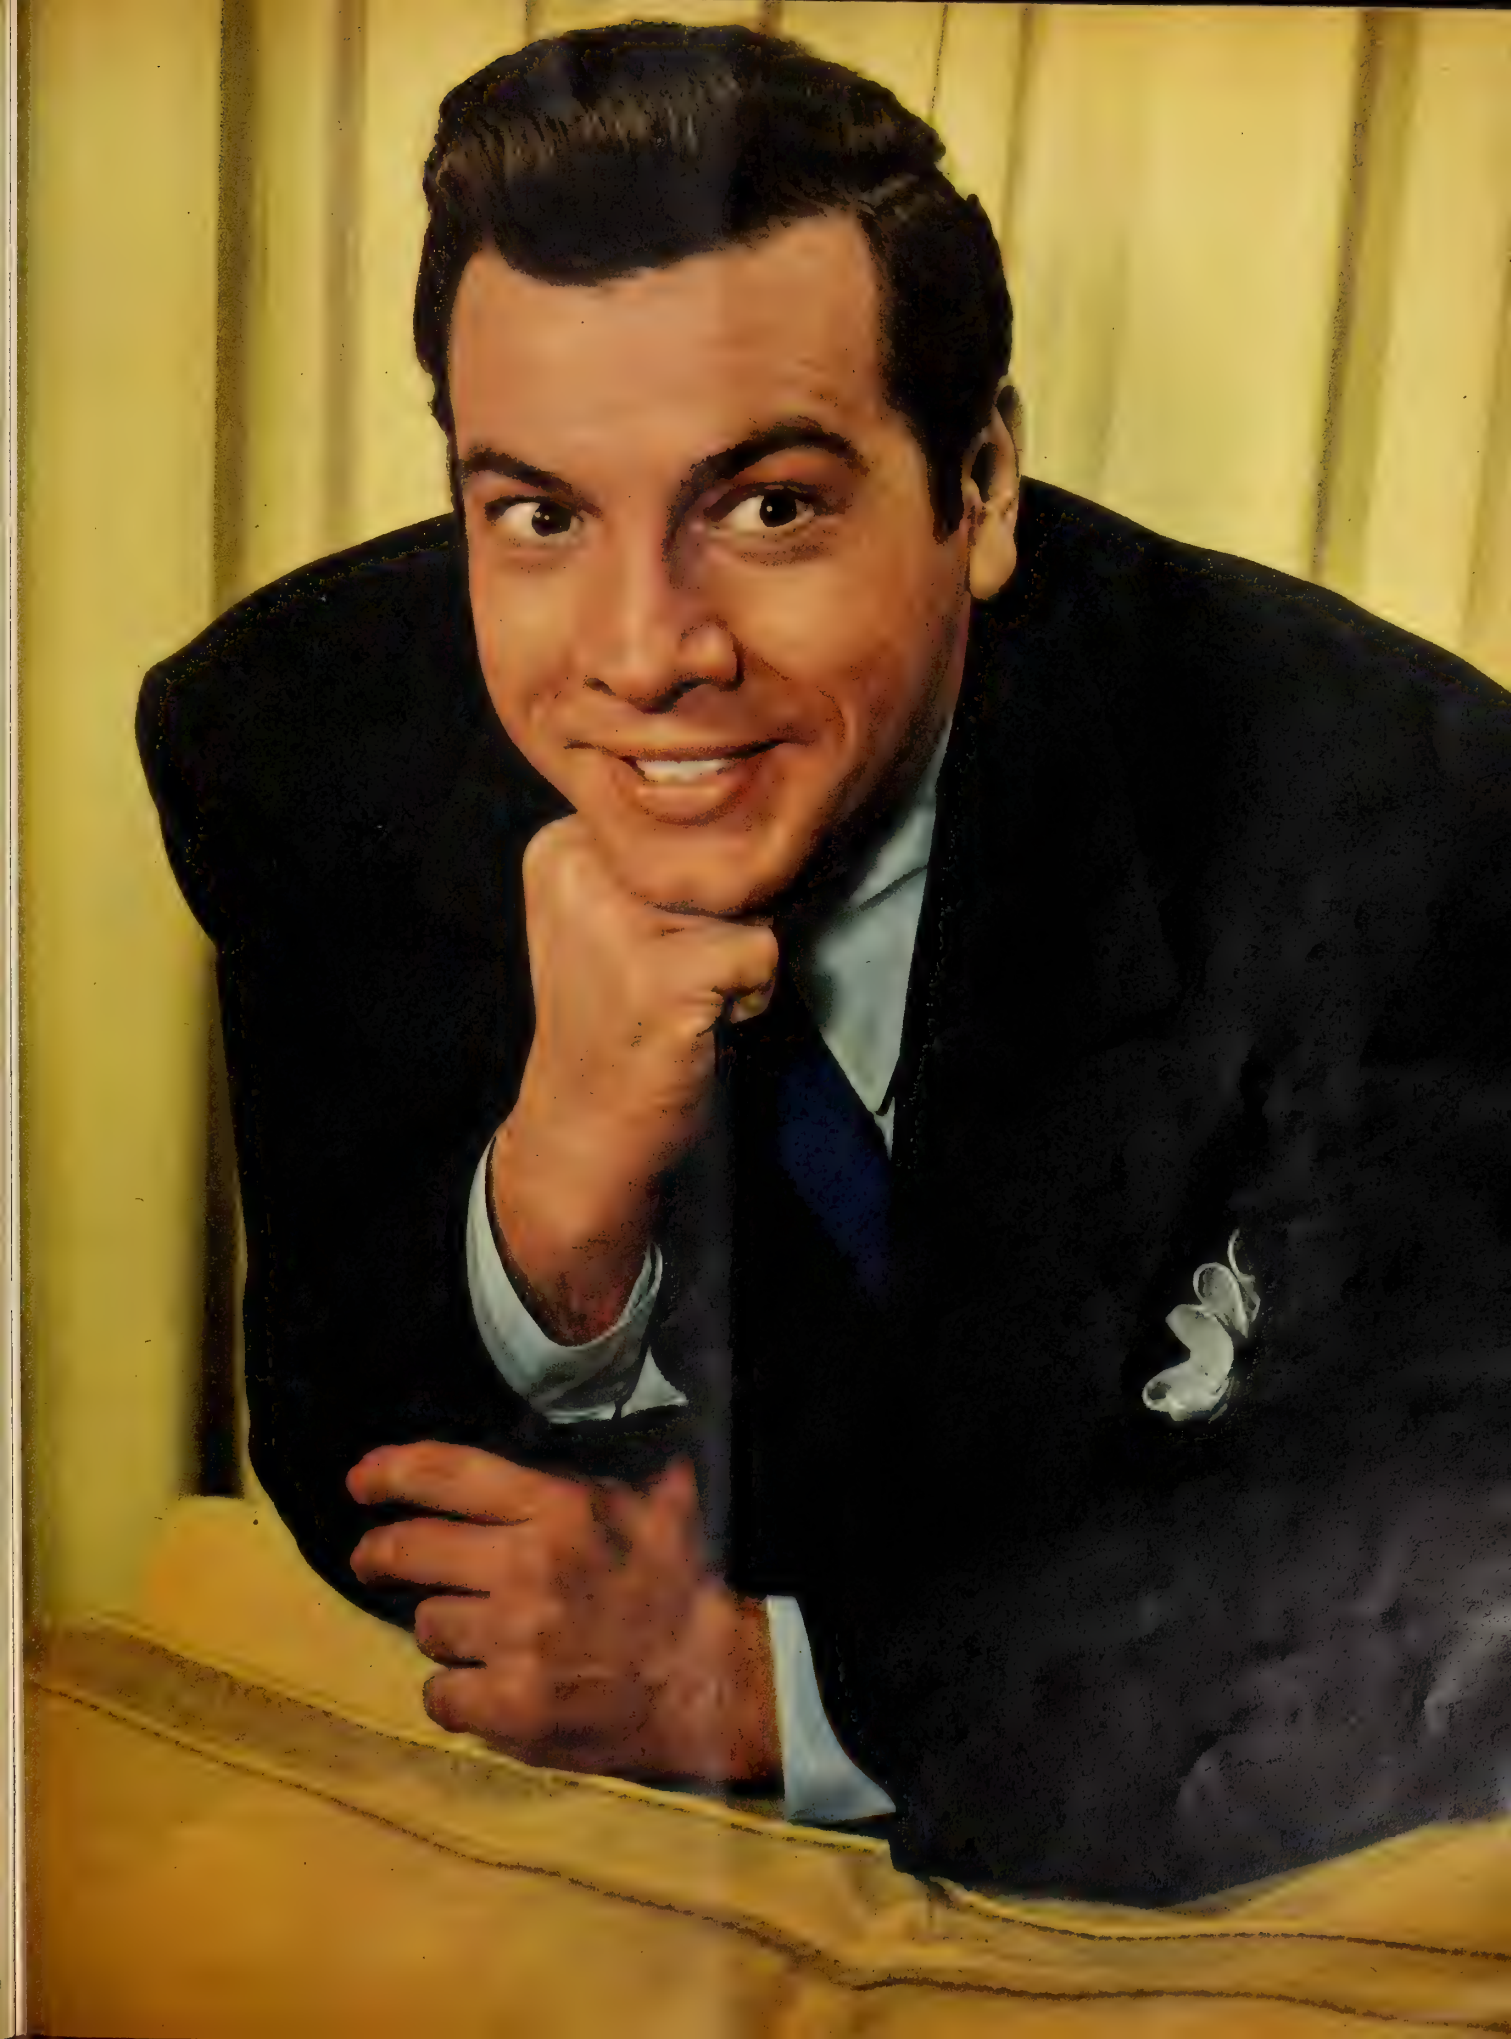
■ Standing there in his producer's office, looking over the preview cards on Because You're Mine, his latest film, Mario Lanza was happy . . . but in a restrained, un-Lanzalike way.

There was no full-throated exuberance, no unbridled enthusiasm. Mario merely picked up one card and smiled as he read, "Lanza has never been in better voice." His grin widened at the second card—"I like this picture even better than Caruso!" And he chuckled quietly over the third, on which a fan had scribbled, "I thought Lanza was supposed to be as heavy as an elephant. He's surprisingly thin."



Mario thumbed through a few others, put them down, said goodbye to Eleanor, Joe Pasternak's secretary, then ambled down the long MGM corridor and out to his car.

He slid into his Cadillac and, humming contentedly, drove to the house he rents for $550 a month in Beverly Hills. It's a preposterous-looking structure, half Gothic, half Moorish, and filled with Oriental furniture originally collected by its owner, a Swedish ambassador to the Far East.

As Mario alighted, he spotted Mrs. X, a small, dumpy woman, somewhere in her fifties, who is undoubtedly the most rabid Lanza fan in the world.

Each afternoon, Mrs. X. drives up to Mario's house and patrols it, walking around and around, watching to see who (Continued on next page)

Mario Lanza's Fabulous Diet

(It will reduce you from 3 to 5 lbs. a week.)

For the past several months Mario Lanza has been eating the following scientifically prepared meals. They consist of foods that satisfy his considerable appetite and still keep him trim. Since going on this basic three-day diet, Lanza has reduced his weight from 237 to the 157 lbs. he weighs today.

FIRST DAY

Breakfast
Tomato Juice (½ cup)
Poached eggs and fatless meat, no salt
Coffee (with skim milk)

Lunch
Pineapple-and-cottage cheese salad
Toast (2 slices)
Skim milk (1 glass)

Dinner
Steak
Baked potato
Spinach
Asparagus
Mixed green salad with low calorie dressing
Piece of fruit
Coffee without sugar

SECOND DAY

Breakfast
Orange juice (½ cup)
Ham and eggs
Coffee

Lunch
Tomato salad
Cold roast chicken
Buttermilk

Dinner
Lamb chops (2)
Peas
Potato
Celery
Cookies (2)
Coffee

THIRD DAY

Breakfast
½ Grapefruit
Poached eggs and meat
Coffee

Lunch
Cold cuts, ham and beef
Orange-and-lettuce salad
Skim milk

Dinner
Roast lamb
Salad bowl of carrots, celery, apple
Baked potato
Cake (1 slice)
Coffee

These meals are nutritionally sound, being extremely low in fat and carbohydrate content and high in protein. Mario is a veteran meat-eater, who must have his meat at least two times a day. He tries to keep his diet salt-free, since this aids the body in ridding the tissues of useless water.

Mario doesn't believe in quack reducing remedies or taking off weight too quickly. "A few pounds each week," he says, "and before you know it you're in wonderful shape."

Between pictures Mario's eating habits used to be hit-or-miss. Now, he sticks to the rules.

LANZA'S DIETING RULES

1. Do not diet without first obtaining your doctor's permission.
2. The only practical way to reduce is to control what you eat.
3. Exercise will change your figure, but it rarely will reduce your weight. If you walk 35 miles, you may lose a pound.
4. Go easy on foods containing starch, fat, and sugar, such as breads, cereals, sweets, etc.
5. Instead of whole milk drink skim milk or buttermilk.
6. Don't skip meals.
7. Don't eat between meals.
8. Eat fresh fruit without sugar.
9. Eat plenty of protein-rich meat without fat.
10. Eat plenty of salads but go easy on the dressing.
11. Drink plenty of water.
12. Sweets between meals will undo a whole day of watchful dieting.
13. When you've dropped enough weight, don't return to your old eating habits. Continue to watch what you eat.

(Continued from page 50) goes in and who goes out, waving to the family from time to time and questioning the visitors about her idol's health.

As Mario dashed up the steps to his front door, Mrs. X ran after him, calling his name. Mario stopped, and the fat little woman dug into her handbag and came up with a necktie.

"It's yours," she announced pridefully. "Your wife threw it out, but I rescued it from the trash can." She clasped the tie to her breast and closed her eyes in rapture. When she opened them, Mario was gone.

Mrs. X. shook her index finger at the closed door. "You naughty, naughty boy," she said. Then she descended the steps and continued her vigil in front of the Lanza residence, to and fro, up and back like a sentry walking guard duty.

Inside the house, Mario walked through the living room into the den. His wife Betty, a beautiful, wide-faced brunette with brown sparkling eyes, rose from the sofa to meet him. He kissed her on the lips. "You see the doctor?" he asked.

Betty nodded.

"How you feeling?"

"Just so-so," Betty said. "My stomach's still upset."

"Sit down," Mario said, "and take it easy."

He walked to his desk, picked up a pile of letters, and began slitting them open.

Suddenly, Betty got up, strode into the kitchen, then returned with a plate of chopped ice which she began chewing.

Mario looked up from his desk. When he saw his wife chewing ice, he leaped out of his chair.

"Oh, no!" he shouted. "No, I can't believe it! Really, Betty? Tell me, really?" He grabbed her by the shoulders, wrapped his arms around her waist, and pulled her to him. "Tell me, Betty. Really?"

"It's never failed before," Betty said smilingly. "Whenever I get the urge to chew ice, I know I'm pregnant."

Mario's eyes sparkled. "I know it's going to be a boy," he said. "A son. It's gotta be a son. Do you hear that, Betty? It's gotta be a son."

Betty laughed. "I haven't seen you this excited for months."

That last sentence best expresses the general (Continued on page 92)

Right at that moment, two lurking speedcops parked on a side road tapped back their kickstands, switched on red lights and roared off in pursuit.

"My, my—what's your hurry, Sis?" asked one, when they'd wailed her down; and the other began, "Right through a stop . . ."

Mrs. Desiderio Alberto Arnaz y De Acha III leaned pugnaciously out over the driver's door, shook her pinkish curls and let them have it.

When Kirby first met Joan, she was 16, and he says, "I found myself . . . with a poised, beautiful, mature young lady." At 18, he finds her the same satisfying adult.

Kirby has made a spectacular financial success in the automobile business. He and Joan have waited two years to marry and are eagerly planning their home together.

For two years Joan and Kirby kept the love that blossomed one New Year's Eve a closely guarded secret. For Joan it's been a long wait, but now, at 18, she has her heart's desire.

BY JIM McCULLA

NOT TOO YOUNG TO LOVE

■ Promptly at 8:30 on the night of May 2nd, 1950, Joan Evans answered the summons of the doorbell at the home she shared with her parents, Katharine Albert and Dale Eunson, high in the Hollywood hills. Joan didn't know it at the time, but this business appointment with Robert Graham Paris, her dramatic coach and long-time friend of the family, was to plunge her into the big romance of her life.

Beside Mr. Paris on this balmy spring evening stood a tall, six-foot, two-inch stranger, tanned, handsome, with dark hair and darker, arresting eyes. As Joan remembers that first meeting in its minute detail, "He was the most striking looking fellow I had ever seen," and Joan had been living for some time in a land where "striking looking fellows" are the rule rather than the exception. "The thought flashed through my mind," Joan recalls, "can this be the man?"

Although Joan met Kirby Wetherly in May of 1950, they didn't have their first kiss until eight months later at a New Year's Eve party.

And as for the handsome stranger, whose name was Kirby Wetherly, he speaks of this initial meeting with something like reverent and shocked surprise, since he had been told by Bob Paris that Joan Evans, with whom he was to rehearse, was still under sixteen. But this electric beauty seemed as completely poised and adult as any girl he'd ever met in his many travels.

Before we hurry on into more details of the truth behind the best-kept romantic secret in Hollywood, it is necessary to identify myself, the writer, for I played a small, but I like to think important, part in this exciting love story. Frankly, as a reporter of police-beat vintage and now dedicated on my daily program to inside stories behind everything from skid row suicides to international intrigue, I look on most Hollywood love making with a jaundiced eye. There are precious few passions in movietown that have a solid foundation.

And that is exactly why I offered to report this story for MODERN SCREEN. Quite by accident, Joan Evans and Kirby Wetherly became friends of mine, and it is important to me that the perennial gossips of Hollywood do not label their romance as a fly-by-night affair between two scatterbrained kids. Instead, it is the remarkable story of a girl, who was wise enough at 16 to pick the man she loved, and to fight through adversity to gain him as a husband. A girl, who at 18, is far better prepared for matrimony than many women ten years her senior. (Continued on page 68)

The five-day-old little charmer on the left is Rochelle Robertson in her first and only photograph—exclusive to MODERN SCREEN! Though she kept her daddy, Dale, waiting an extra month, she's his No. 2 dreamgirl.

BY MARSHA SAUNDERS

Relax, pop, I made it!

■ Ordinarily, Dale Robertson is not a sound sleeper. A basically restless young man, he finds himself thinking at night, sleeps only in fits and starts and usually is up and out of the double bed he shares with his wife by 6:30 A.M.

On the night of July 10th, 1952, however, Robertson was sleeping soundly. He had played a benefit the night before. He'd had a tough day at the studio with Betty Grable in The Farmer Takes A Wife and now he was all done in.

He began to snore what is known as the "buzz saw," a whirring persistent drone that sounds like an electric drill.

Lying beside him, his pregnant wife, Jackie, moved her right elbow into his ribs. "Honey," she said softly.

The only answer was: "Z-z-z-z-z."

Jacqueline Wilson Robertson, the green-eyed little brunette who'd accepted Dale's marriage proposal on their second date, looked at her watch. It was five minutes past 5:00 A.M.

She could feel the child moving within her.

She reached over and ran her hand across Dale's face. "Honey," she said persistently. No answer. Another sharp pain. She waited a moment until that pain had subsided. Then in a loud voice and shaking him simultaneously, "I think this is it, Dale, Wake up, Dale!"

Robertson opened his blue-green eyes. The words, "I think this is it," seemed to penetrate his sleep-befogged mind. He awoke with a start and jumped out of bed.

"Really, Honey? You reckon this is the time?" As if he himself could not believe it.

Jackie nodded.

"I'm calling the (Continued on page 70)

Dale proposed to "Jack", his No. 1 dreamgirl, on their second date and they married soon after, on May 19, 1951. Rochelle arrived this July 10th, just four days before Dale's 29th birthday.

Housewarming!

Peggy King showed up toting a housewarming gift for apartment Barbara shares with Jean MacDonald.

Co-hostesses Barbara and Jean got a big bang out of Bob Horton's gift—a set of colored glasses with humorous sayings and drawings painted on them.

Barbara and Peggy make sure the new house is thoroughly warmed by lighting a fire, and keeping it well supplied with logs all evening.

She knew they were coming so she baked a pie! Hollywood's young set gathered at Barbara's for an old fashioned party full of fun, frolic and food!

■ It was a very special occasion when Hollywood's brightest young lights gathered together under Barbara Ruick's and Jean MacDonald's new roof. For Barbara and Jean it was a happy ending as well as beginning, because their housewarming might never have come to pass if both girls hadn't been having landlord trouble simultaneously a while back. Barbara was practically evicted when she acquired a long-haired spaniel named Blondie and a piano—her landlord took a pretty strong stand against both types of sound. Jean, who is Pete Lawford's steady flame, was in similar straits, so the two of them decided to team up and find new diggings.

The lease had barely been signed one Saturday when preparations got under way for a party the very next evening. Barbara informed her friends that if they wanted the festivities on Sunday they'd have to pitch in and help put things in order.

First to arrive to do his pre-party time, of course, was scenarist Blake Edwards, who takes turns (Continued on page 60)

Dick Anderson picked out a tune on his ukulele, soon got a song fest under way as Barbara and Jean (reflected in the mirror) join in on the chorus.

Barbara's Strawberry-Pineapple Parfait Pie (recipe on next page) made a hit with guests Peggy, Dick, Michael, Mary, Blake, and Bob.

Bob helps his hostess—and co-star—to salad. They became friends on the set of Apache Trail, so Barbara invited Bob and his wife.

Everyone—including Blondie (center) Barbara's cocker spaniel—got into the act when supper was served. Blondie was one of the reasons Barbara had to move!

The next day was a working day—so it was off with the lights and straight to bed for Barbara when the party was over.

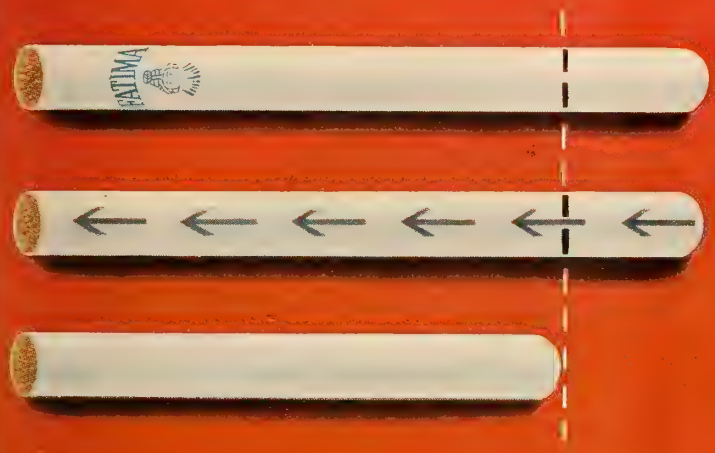
The big day dawned with Jean busily washing windows and fussing over last-minute touches, while Barbara took to the kitchen to plan the buffet supper (cold cuts, baked beans, potato salad, tossed greens and assorted tidbits) and prepare her brand new prize recipe for luscious Strawberry-Pineapple Parfait pie—made with ice cream, yet!

The girls just had time to slip out of slacks when the doorbell began ringing. Everyone came bearing gifts for still-empty shelves, and welcome they were. Especially Bob Horton's gaily colored glasses, which went right into service.

While the girls were greeting their guests, though, the nearest thing to catastrophe was taking place in the kitchen. Blondie and Jean's dachshund had latched onto a serving tray and were just about to eliminate supper when Barbara spied them and sent them packing, luckily, with only one ham-on-pumpernickel under their canine belts.

The two hostesses served from the sheet-covered sawbuck table, and everybody spread around on couch and floor with paper plates.

Later, when the dishes were out of the way, the group naturally gravitated to the piano, and just as naturally, David Holt did the honors.



But at eleven, Barbara announced she had a shooting schedule that began at dawn Monday. "Working folks," she said firmly. "Goodnight so soon, know what I mean?"

They did, and went, all with much happy talk about the lucky break that brought Barbara and Jean to such a beautiful apartment.

"Pianos and dogs," Jean pointed out, "are a girl's best friends." END

THE GOOD MYSTERY

by Jane Powell

In order to know God, Jane believes, you must first learn to know yourself . . . And that is why she wants her children, when they're old enough, to choose their own way of life.

■ You often hear someone say, "I like that man's spirit." To me this is the same thing as saying, "I like that man's religion," because my spirit, that which moves me to act this way or that way, is the basis of my personal religion. I believe in God, but I do not follow any institutional approach to Him. I have a feeling and this guides me in ways that others may think commonplace but which, to me, place me in harmony with my Maker.

My attitude to my life (and from that to all life) is directed by my character, and my character is the product of my will-power, my ability to govern myself. Since this life was given to me, and may, in a sense, still belong to Him who gave it, I feel an inner responsibility to live honorably and graciously that I may dignify it. If that is religion, I am religious; if it is not, it is as close to religiousness as I can honestly come. I work as best I can in the direction I feel is right; after that I do not worry about it.

This is about as far as I have ever gone toward putting my spiritual attitude into words. It is interesting; I have always liked to discuss religion in contrast to those who so often say they never discuss it, but it is a difficult subject for me. That which so many people take for granted, I often do not understand. What my intelligence prevents me from accepting, I find other people accepting through faith and sometimes through faith and intelligence. Often, I find myself envying those who have a defined religion, one that assures them divine recognition and a form of eternity. I wish I could believe in this way. But one just can't say one believes; in this you cannot be dishonest.

My family was originally Methodist. But, as I remember, my (Continued on page 108)

she wants a big, tall somebody

(Continued from page 41) and, until she does, sees no point in wasting her time or distracting herself with boys who are obviously not the one. She says she feels she'll know him without any trouble. She indicates she'll know him sooner if he is tall, but tall or not, there won't be any mistake. Listeners get the impression that even if his stature is not imposing, what he does to Debra will give him all the size he'll ever need in her eyes.

And the boy may change some of her ideas. For instance, one afternoon she said, "I will never give up my career for any man." Yet soon afterward, she admitted hoping that the boy she meets and loves will be the kind she'll want to give it up for! Everybody who heard her got the idea right away—Debra is crazy about her career but she is willing to be reasonable if the boy is willing to be wonderful!

But what she is not willing to do is search for him. "I feel it has to happen, it has to hit me—out of the blue," she says. This is why it's easy for her to say "No" to a fellow who wants a date. Each "No" is just another step in building up to a great big "YES" for the right man.

Debra, after all, has already had some practice meeting tall "somebodies." There was an afternoon three years ago, when she was only 15, she will never forget. She was just finishing her school work at the studio (in which she rarely got grades less than "A," incidentally) when a message came through from the front office that she was to play an Indian maiden in Broken Arrow. Then came a follow-up message that left her weak-kneed — she was cast opposite Jimmy Stewart (then still a bachelor). While she doesn't contend now that the man she wants must be a ringer for Jimmy Stewart, the chances are that she was definite about it that day. She admits she certainly likes the type. "A quiet, easy going character with a cute sense of humor," is the way she describes it.

She met Jimmy a few days later in the office of Delmar Daves, who was to direct the picture (and who, too, she points out dreamily, "is tall . . . tall and sandy haired"). She remembers that when Jimmy walked in he was full of kindness and understanding. "He made things wonderfully easy," she says. "All I could do was to keep saying 'Yes . . . yes . . . no . . . no . . . yes . . . no. . . .' I couldn't think of anything else."

ABOUT a year later, when Jimmy was marrying Gloria McLean, Debra was meeting Mr. Tall-Dark-and-Handsome himself—Louis Jourdan. Of course, Louis was already married, but that didn't keep her from studying the type so that she might know its points if she ever ran across them in the form of a more eligible someone. There was a day when Debra cried real tears while working with Louis, but not for romantic reasons. Her vanity was hurt. Louis tried to pick her up, as required by the script for one scene in the picture, Bird Of Paradise, and complained that he couldn't get her off the floor. The director immediately called for her double and accused Debra of not watching her diet. She ran off the set weeping.

It was all a gag. The night before she had dined with the leading members of the cast and had ordered a steak followed by a banana split for dessert. Everyone warned her, with serious expressions, that this wasn't being fair since she was slated to be carried by Louis the next day. And he was just acting out his part of the gag when he failed to lift her. Her tears were so real, however, that she spoiled everyone's fun.

When Debra meets a new man at the studio, or at her home, to which he may have been invited by someone in the family, he often, and openly, reveals his astonishment at her ideas (which come out because her mother, or her sisters or brother, sometimes kid her about them).

"Never been out, never been kissed except in your pictures?" he asks, and reveals his full disbelief.

But it is true. The first man ever to kiss Debra, kissed her professionally, on the screen. He was Richard Conte, in a scene from Cry Of The City. It was a closeup, and when it was over the cameraman announced that it would have to be shot over again.

"Something went wrong with your eyes," he told Debra. "I've seen girls who kissed eyes open and girls who kissed eyes closed, but yours were jumping open and shut like a yo-yo!"

The way it turned out the scene was left as is. The director decided he liked it. Later on news came that Mr. Zanuck, head of the studio, thought it was a very effective close-up, too. He didn't forget about Debra's kissing during the filming of Stars And Stripes Forever, either. Debra had two kissing scenes with Bob Wagner in this picture. After looking at them in the rushes, Mr. Zanuck ordered three more to be written into the script.

So Debra has been kissed . . . but for 20th Century-Fox, not herself. Even so the critics haven't complained about the lack of realism, and Debra says she always thinks of this gratefully when she happens to meet the kind of men who give out with that old line about, "How can you portray life if you haven't lived yourself; how can you show love if you haven't loved?" She now knows it can be done, and any wolf who tries this one on her finds it thrown coldly back at him.

Debra recently had an interview in which she admitted that she is sort of half-way preparing herself for quite an older man. "It may just turn out this way," she said. "My father was 16 years older than my mother when they married. But, on the other hand, my mother and I are not of a completely similar nature by any means. She says she dated as soon as she could. She met my father when she had just turned 15, would have married him the same day she first saw him if it were possible, and actually did marry him less than a year later." Debra smiled. "And Mother always finishes up by saying triumphantly, 'And I've still got him!'"

Debra loves her home, where she feels able to be herself. Her sisters think Debbie, who's never had a date, has too many old-fashioned ideas.

BUT how does Debra ever expect to meet the boy she wants if she doesn't go out? This, she says, is a question many people ask. One boy even put it to her mother, and her reply was an offhand, "Oh, if she wants to be an old maid, it's up to her." Actually, her mother thinks Debra will change overnight. Debra doesn't. She thinks she makes sense not going out just to go out.

She doesn't advance her ideas as correct for all girls. "I think girls who haven't much chance to meet people have to go out," she says. "But that doesn't describe my situation. I see new faces every day at the studio and new ones as well as familiar ones constantly at my home, which is sometimes like Grand Central Station. Mother is a friendly, gregarious person. Dad in his own way and my sisters in their way are the same. Last Sunday my brother-in-law walked into the house at 7:30 in the morning bringing my sister Teala with him, my brother Frank and his wife Maurice came in soon afterwards, and a dozen other people were in and out during the day. That was a typical week end. I can hardly be classed as a recluse."

Debra loves her home. She feels able to be herself when she meets people there. She says she feels she is learning about people. If she were to go out a lot, she has a hunch she would be so confused about what she was to wear, where she was to go, and what was to happen there, that the boy involved would get lost in the shuffle.

DEBRA had a friend who grew up and studied professionally with her but took a different course altogether when she entered her senior year in high school. She dropped all other interests in order to have time for her school social activities —the proms, parties and other get-togethers. During this same time Debra kept strictly to her studies and her work. By now this other girl has been engaged (and disengaged) four times. Debra hasn't even had a date in her life.

Commenting on this a few months ago, one of her sisters said that Debra had an old-fashioned streak in her. "Maybe," says Debra. "But I think my mind is clearer, my emotional state more stable, and my chances for ultimate happiness much better than if, like my girl friend, I had already known four men well enough to have been promised to them. I mean, how confident could I be in my own seriousness, and in the power of love itself, for that matter, if my heart had already been won that many times? Maybe I confuse easily, but that's just what I would be—as confused as a lot of girls I know who can't imagine being without a boyfriend and seem to go from one to another.

"One thing is peculiar to all these kids, it seems to me. When things are going well I rarely hear from them. But when things go wrong, when they break off, they want a friend and come a-running to talk. Or, I should say, mostly complain. They just can't figure life out. And as sorry as I am for them, I am that much more convinced my course is the right one. Oh, I know, it could happen to me, too. And if it ever does, I'm not the kind to take it lightly. Maybe that's why I want to make sure."

Not long ago one of the girls at the studio asked Debra to go out on a double date with her and got sore when Debra begged off. She got another girl. Two days later these two both confessed they had a miserable evening—meaningless from start to finish. That's exactly the kind of time Debra says she would expect to have if she went out on a date just to date. It isn't the date she wants—it's the man. "I know you can find out about a man on a date, but the best place for this, I think, is to see him against a familiar background—your own home, for instance," she says.

Perhaps one thing should be made clear. Debra Paget hasn't lived a "protected" kind of existence. She is not fearful of reality or trying to shield herself from it. Her mother, in fact her whole family, was on the stage, and she traveled with them from the time she was a baby. But out of all this, she says, she developed a great longing and respect for the kind of life you can live in a home surrounded by those you love and who love you.

On top of this Debra knows her family has worked hard to make her career possible, and she has worked hard at it, too. She doesn't want to toss all this planning and effort aside lightly for any premature and meaningless involvement. She faces life seriously and she wants the same attitude from the boy she loves. If he talks dates or parties or "having a ball," he is not talking her language at all, she says. The boy she wants, "the big bundle of goodness" she is looking for, will sound off in a different way. And she'll know that sound. Her ear is tuned for it every second of the day. END the truth about the fords

(Continued from page 49) lady in The Green Glove, a movie shot in Paris last year; and it was there that the 26-year-old actress had, against her better judgment, fallen in love with the tall, dark, moody, Welsh actor from Santa Monica.

On Friday, a friend who has known Mr. Gwellyn Samuel Newton Ford (Glenn's real name) for many years, told this reporter, "I'm going to level with you. My honest opinion, for what it's worth, is that there's trouble in the household—no doubt about it. Ellie and Glenn haven't been getting along too well, but I don't think it's because of another girl.

"Glenn may be temperamental and spoiled, and Ellie may have pampered him too much, but basically he's an intelligent man. I'm sure he realizes that he couldn't possibly find a better wife than the one he has. For my money, Eleanor Powell is the perfect wife, the kind of dame Myrna Loy used to act in those Thin Man pictures.

"Whatever you do, don't mention my name, but I think the whole thing is mother-in-law trouble. Glenn's mother is a very wonderful woman, only I don't think she should be living in the same house with Glenn and Ellie.

"I realize that Glenn is an only son and that there's a strong tie between these two, but, after all, Ellie's mother lives in a place of her own. I think Mrs. Newton Ford should do the same. I have a feeling that Ellie doesn't regard the house as belonging to her, that Mrs. Ford has stepped in and is running things."

This explanation tallies with the fact that Glenn sailed to Europe last year with his mother and left his wife and son behind in Hollywood.

A press agent, who was asked to comment, said, "Eleanor doesn't want to leave little Peter during the school term. He's their only (Continued on next page)

GREYHOUND

Seven-year-old Peter is the main reason Glenn and Ellie have worked hard to patch things up.

(Continued from preceding page) child, and she won't take him out of school. Besides, Glenn's mother has always wanted to go back to England and visit her relatives. While she's doing that, Glenn will be shooting The Green Glove in Paris."

During the filming of this picture, while Mrs. Newton Ford was visiting in Britain and Mrs. Glenn Ford was overseeing the household in Hollywood, the rumor was being circulated in Paris that Geraldine Brooks and Glenn Ford had struck a spark.

This canard may have been without an ounce of truth, but when Glenn returned to Europe again this year to do Time Bomb in England for MGM, he was again without his wife, and the story was bandied about that Gerry Brooks had called on him in New York.

REGARDLESS of where the trouble lies, the truth is that of late—say the last two years—the once perfect marriage of the Glenn Fords hasn't been running so smoothly.

Choose whatever reason you prefer, the fact remains that the warm poetry that once characterized this entente has chilled to cold prose. And in a way it's a good thing, because, for the first time, Glenn has been able to see and feel firsthand what happens in Hollywood when a marriage begins to founder.

The gossipmongers are like birds of prey who fly about, ready to swoop down and pick the bones.

Bing Crosby learned that two years ago. When he took off for Europe without Dixie, all hallelujah broke loose. Dixie felt strongly that if Bing wanted to travel, he should take his wife along. If he didn't want to take his wife with him, if he preferred to make it a stag affair, then it wasn't very much of a marriage, and by gosh, she was going to see her lawyer. And she did, too. And back in a hurry came Bing. Ever since then the Crosbys have been hitting it off in great style.

Glenn seems to be reacting in the same way. When the divorce announcement was made, when its tragic consequences dawned upon Glenn, when he suddenly realized that he was throwing almost nine years of marriage down the drain, he quickly came to his senses. A denial was issued immediately; and for the next month Glenn hung around home, posing for magazine layouts with Ellie and Peter, trying to convince the public and subconsciously himself that nothing had ever happened, that it had all been a ridiculous mistake.

But in his heart Glenn knows the truth, and the truth is that nothing is worth the risk of endangering the security of his marriage, because in Eleanor Powell he has the kind of wife all men dream about and few are ever lucky enough to get.

Glenn first met Ellie in 1942, thanks to Pat O'Brien. He was 25 at the time, young, insecure, and freshly signed to a Columbia contract. He was making Flight Lieutenant with Pat when the Wisconsin Irishman happened to ask, "What's new in the girl department these days?"

Up until then, Glenn's best girl friend had always been his mother. He merely shrugged his shoulders and said, "Things are slow all over."

"You come out to my place Sunday," Pat countered, "and it won't be so slow. I've got just the girl for you."

O'Brien has always been a frustrated match-maker, so after he got Glenn's okay, he put in a call to Eleanor Powell. "Ellie," he said, "we're having a small swimming party this Sunday. You must come; there's a guy simply nuts to meet you."

So they met and, in a quiet, restrained, refined way, they hit it off.

Two weeks later, Glenn phoned Ellie for a date. "How about having dinner with me?" he asked.

"Love to," Ellie bounced back, "but why don't we do it over here? We've got a wonderful cook and the refrigerator is simply loaded with food."

Right away, Glenn knew he had something special. Under similar circumstances most actresses would dress to the teeth and insist upon making the rounds of all the expensive hot spots. Here was a girl, a star, one of the biggest dancing stars in the history of the cinema, and she wanted to eat at home and enjoy his company, not just use him as an escort.

GLENN fell in love with Ellie, and she with him, but the war was going on, and Glenn had been classified 1A. It was just a question of time before he was called, so they both decided to wait until the hostilities were over before they became man and wife. Only love usually overrules such logical decisions.

Glenn signed up with the Marines, then signed up for life with Ellie.

We had ten days for our honeymoon," Ellie recalls, "then Glenn was transferred to Camp Pendleton near San Diego." It was just about then that Ellie received an offer of $40,000 for a three weeks' appearance at the Radio City Music Hall in New York.

What would you have done?

This is what Eleanor Powell Ford did. She chucked the $40,000 out the window. Instead of accepting the offer, she packed her bags and drove down to La Jolla, a seaside town not far from the Marine Corps base, and for $60 a month she rented the servants' quarters over the garage of a large estate. She did all the cooking, all the washing, all the marketing, and never complained, never griped.

Little Peter was born on February 5, 1945, about the time Glenn was mustered out of service. A son was all that Ellie and Glenn needed to make their marriage perfect. And it was perfect, too, for Ellie had done a remarkable thing.

She had abandoned her motion picture career of her own volition so that Glenn might become the family breadwinner, feel his own importance and occupy the top rung of the ladder.

People said Ellie was crazy to give up a lucrative career in pictures, but Ellie knew what she was doing. "I've been a star," she told friends. "All I want to be now is a wife and mother."

They found a wonderful house, an English-style country home that belonged to musical director Max Steiner. Glenn thought it cost too much. Ellie said she was sure they could swing it. They swung it all right, and Ellie went out on a series of night club engagements to help pay for it. Their first two years in the house were ecstatic, not only because the home life was enjoyable, but also because Glenn's career was going so well. He had developed from an actor of mediocre ability into the finest actor on the Columbia lot and the studio's top leading man. After Gilda with Rita Hayworth, Glenn was in demand by every studio in town.

A FEW years ago, the Fords remodeled their home, and a room was set aside for Glenn's mother, Mrs. Newton Ford. After Mrs. Ford moved in, the rumors of marital discord started. No doubt the timing was pure coincidence.

People started saying that between Ellie's pampering and mother's solicitousness, Glenn was being spoiled rotten.

"Honestly," one friend complained, "I've never seen anything like it. You'd think that Glenn Ford was a King or something. One night a week, you know, is poker night for him. He and Charley Ruggles and a bunch of bachelors get together, and no wives are allowed. Ellie prepares all the hors d'oeuvres and after that she has to beat it for the evening. How do you like that? But she never complains, never a word out of her.

"As for Glenn's mother, well, let's face it. No mother is ever completely happy about giving up her son to another woman. I still think that Glenn hasn't severed the maternal tie. If he were my husband and he went to Europe with his mother and left me behind, I wouldn't be as understanding as Ellie. I'd break a plate over his head and then lay down the law."

In the Ford household at this moment, passion isn't holding sway, but neither is discord the keynote of the marital music. There is rather an air of watchful waiting, of passive serenity, of the battle fought and resolved.

Mr. Gwellyn Samuel Newton Ford, who's nobody's fool, has been smart enough to lay the law down for himself. END

Geraldine Brooks, Glenn's co-star in The Green Glove, was rumored in love with him.

not too young to love

(Continued from page 55) Now back to that first evening. Joan ushered the two men into the living room, where Bob Paris introduced Kirby to her parents. Joan says she was amazed to see what she can only describe as "old world courtliness" in Kirby's manner as he acknowledged the introduction. As Joan puts it, "He had a quality that seemed almost out of vogue; about the only manners I'd observed in fellows around Hollywood was the almost complete lack of manners."

At any rate, during that evening, Joan and Kirby went through several dramatic scenes together. Here again Joan got an inkling of what type of character this handsome stranger was. She says, "I was quite bossy. I felt that I had a lot more experience than Kirby, and as a result I took issue with him over his interpretation of the lines, and in particular, his gestures. But to my irritation he only smiled politely and went about his acting in the way he'd been taught. When the scenes were completed, I was well aware that this was one man I couldn't boss!"

For Kirby's part, he felt only confusion. "I confess it now. First of all, I had expected that Joan would be a mere child. Instead, I found myself matching dialogue with a poised, beautiful, mature young lady. Worse than that, my subconscious kept telling me that this girl was going to mean a lot more to me than just another ingenue with whom I practiced acting."

This statement now appears prophetic. Their romance began slowly enough a week after that first meeting when Kirby came to Joan's home again for another rehearsal session. And then about a week later, Joan's mother, the attractive and understanding Katherine Albert, suggested that Kirby be invited to a beach party the family had planned. Having no particular interest in any boy at the moment, Joan agreed.

It was then that Kirby began to feel that Joan Evans might eventually become more than a casual acting partner. The party took off from Joan's home in several cars, with Joan, Kirby and another young man in Kirby's somewhat dilapidated convertible. During the 30 minute trip to the beach, Kirby remembers that Joan seemed to go out of her way to be attentive to the other boy. He remembers, too, that by the time they reached their destination the other lad was practically "on the ropes." Joan denies that this is so, but the mere fact that neither of them can remember the fellow's name now seems to indicate that they were a bit "on the ropes" themselves.

The following week Kirby called Joan for the first time to invite her to watch a baseball game between the Hollywood Stars and Los Angeles of the Pacific Coast League. Fortified with pop and popcorn, they had their first argument. The game was barely under way when Joan asked, "When will the Hollywood Stars play the New York Yankees?"

Kirby laughed scornfully. "Never, unless maybe in a pre-season exhibition game. Don't you know that we're watching a Coast league game?"

"Huh," Joan retorted. "Why waste our time? I'm only interested in Joe DiMaggio-type ball players."

That did it. For the rest of the evening Kirby, with some heat, tried to explain to this girl of dubious intelligence in such matters the importance of the Hollywood Stars, how the Stars fed future champs to the big leagues, why some day the Stars would be in a top circuit themselves. Joan yawned, huh-huhed, and the evening ended strictly on the down beat.

Abruptly, then, Joan was sent on tour to publicize the Goldwyn production, Our Very Own. She was busy, but not too occupied to realize that she missed Kirby tremendously. This was the first time she had ever missed anyone but her parents, and she kept telling herself that it would be just her luck never to see Kirby again. Then came the high spot of her tour. Not the crowds who packed theaters to see her, or the wonderful notices in the newspapers. The big thrill was a lone and luscious orchid she received from Kirby on her 16th birthday. She was so excited that she can't recall now whether she was in Chicago or Kansas City when the remembrance arrived.

Meantime, Kirby was having important problems of his own. At 24, he had already served three years with the Air Force, a good bit of the time in Europe during World War II. He liked acting, but he was a realist.

And that's another reason your reporter on this story has a particular liking for Kirby Wetherly. He called me one day at my news bureau office at radio station KMPC and we talked over the possibilities of his getting into some facet of the advertising business. This surprised me, because frequently when a young fellow sets out to become an actor, he considers all other means of earning a livelihood as something "for the peasants," and he'll starve, and mooch on friends, before turning in an honest day's work. This Kirby Wetherly was a man of different stripe. By the time Joan Evans returned to Hollywood, he was punching away as a classified ad salesman for the Los Angeles Daily Mirror, reserving nights and weekends for acting.

Steve Cochran's definition of an intellectual snob: Guy who won't start a conversation with a beautiful babe in a club car if he doesn't approve of the book she's reading.

Mike Connolly

It was July, 1950, and Joan was not exactly delighted to discover that she would be home only three days before going back on the road for another six weeks. She wanted to see more of Kirby, and three days seemed like ten minutes.

They made it count, though. Kirby called and picked her up on her second evening at home. They headed for the beach and a seafood restaurant he'd heard about. Oddly enough, they managed to get themselves lost on the way toward Malibu on one of the best four lane highways in California. It wasn't deliberate. It was just that their conversation interfered with the driving and they turned off the highway three times before they found that restaurant.

On the way home, Joan realized for the first time that she was in love. At the same time the determination was born that she wouldn't let Kirby know. If anything was to come of this, he was going to be the aggressor and she would never tell him how she felt unless he spoke first. And all the speaking he did was to promise that he'd write while she was away.

That promise consisted of only three letters in the next six weeks. They were friendly and newsy letters, the kind she'd receive from friends and relatives. This Joan didn't like at all, but there was some hope that he was thinking about her as a "long term situation." One line in his final letter read, "Remember that cute Ford convertible you were so crazy about?

Well, I bought it, and in the same knock-out red shade you thought was out of this world."

Early in September, Joan was back in Hollywood for good. Kirby was invited to dinner. They went to the movies, to friends' homes for swimming. Or they rode horseback and played tennis. All this without one word about love.

Then came New Year's Eve, 1951. Kirby and Joan attended a small party with another couple. When the New Year was rung in, Kirby sought out Joan, and he kissed her for the first time. Joan says, "I remember that moment more vividly than anything that ever happened to me! I had been watching Kirby as the clock began to strike, and I was wishing with all my might that he would kiss me, and only me. As the clock stopped striking, he turned to me, and we kissed. My heart did a flip-flop, and I remember that the music was not the traditional Auld Lang Syne, but Margaret Whiting's recording of Old Devil Moon.

The kiss was almost too much for Kirby. As he held Joan in his arms for the first time, he realized that she was his girl, that this was a whole lot more than fast friendship, and that sooner or later they'd marry, even if it meant a long wait.

Hardly realizing the important implication of the words, although he meant them sincerely, Kirby told Joan what she'd wanted him to say for so long—"Joan, I love you."

Later, in the early morning hours, Joan awakened her mother and dad to tell them that Kirby loved her. Sleepily, they told her that was fine, and they'd see her in the morning. Like many other parents, they attached little importance to Joan's nocturnal announcement. They expected it might happen more than once in her lifetime.

But this casual attitude was short-lived, because Joan wasn't just another girl coming home from a thrilling New Year's eve that would be forgotten in a matter of days. Within two weeks she announced that she and Kirby wanted to be married and they wanted parental approval. Here, for the first time, she met stalwart opposition; the sort of opposition any parent can understand.

Katherine Albert, a keen, discerning writer and an astute student of human nature, was determined that Joan should wait a long time before taking such an important step. And Joan's father, Dale Eunson, who's a playwright, looked on all this as a familiar situation in a young girl's life. Like Joan's mother, with only her daughter's happiness in mind, he was adamant that Joan should wait until some time in the future before entering into marriage.

These reactions were perfectly natural. There was, however, one big fault in their reasoning that Joan was too young to realize exactly what she was doing.

From the time Joan Evans has been old enough to walk and talk, she has been treated by her parents as an absolute equal. As a result, they were not reasoning with an adolescent "going on 17," but with an adult whose wisdom and maturity were far beyond her years.

Suffice it to say that the opposition to this marriage was passive, but it was a conflict of wills in which neither side gave an inch.

Shortly after Joan's 17th birthday, I attended a small party at which Joan and Kirby were also guests, and Joan and I had a quiet talk. Joan was considerably disturbed that her parents would not approve an early wedding, and she asked my advice. I told her that the reaction of her parents was completely normal, although (Continued on next page) perhaps somewhat more pronounced because she was an only child. I pointed out that she had a responsibility to them as well as to herself. At first, Joan was not too receptive to my suggestions, but I felt that I had won my point and that an elopement had been averted, even though I personally was convinced that no matter when they married, they'd make each other happy.

Within a couple of weeks I talked to Kirby again. He told me that he felt that Joan's parents deserved every consideration, and that he and Joan had decided to wait until her 18th birthday, at which time they felt her parents would consent to the marriage. In the meantime, Kirby had given up selling advertising and had gone into the used automobile business. He had concluded, finally, that acting was not for him. Kirby's decision has since been proven a wise one, because after a little more than a year in the automobile business, his success has verged on the spectacular, and he is financially in a bracket most young actors are lucky to achieve after five years of hard work.

ALL this time, Kirby and Joan continued to have only one date a week. Joan went out with other young men, and the Hollywood columnists had no inkling at all of the news that was soon to break; all except one, that is. No one knew how she obtained her information, but it was Louella Parsons who first broke the story that Joan and Kirby might elope on her birthday.

The young couple were aghast, for they felt that this sudden news would make Joan's parents feel that they had not kept faith with their promises. But they immediately went to Katherine and Dale, assuring them that no elopement was intended. All they wanted was parental approval, so they could have a regular wedding. There was no mistaking one fact, however. With or without approval, the marriage would come off.

Sadly enough, although indications at this point were that Joan's parents had reconciled themselves to the marriage, this appeared not to be the case. Joan and Kirby finally went to see Joan's godmother, Joan Crawford, and after talking for several hours, Miss Crawford agreed that they should be married immediately. Miss Crawford arranged for the ceremony in her own home, to be performed by Judge Charles Griffin. Then Miss Crawford called me on the telephone and told me that Joan and Kirby had promised to let me know if there were any change in plans and that she had played an important part in their sudden decision to wed exactly one week after Joan Evans' 18th birthday. Due to a combination of circumstances, family opposition as well as Joan Evans' new picture schedule at Universal to which she had been loaned by Samuel Goldwyn, the young people felt it was now or never. That is why they said their "I do's" five minutes after midnight on the morning of July 25th.

A happy ending? You bet, at least for Joan and Kirby. But for those of you who still may be dubious about the sudden news of Joan's marriage at 18, even after learning the inside story, let me point out that Jeanne Crain and Paul Brinkman wed at a time when her mother was violently opposed to the union. They've been more than ordinarily contented, and have a whole house full of children. And there's Janie Powell, who was very young when she married Geary Steffan. Janie is expecting her second child, and they are an ideal couple.

So, thinking over the story of Joan Evans and Kirby Wetherly, their wholesome courtship and their long, persistent wait to survive the odds that were against them, I felt I needed the answer to one more question. I asked Joan, who is every bit as competent a cook and homemaker as she is an actress (and that's really saying something) when and if she hoped to have children.

Joan looked at me gravely for a moment, and then said, "We've thought about that, too, and we have an answer to your question about our family. We want children — when God wills it." END relax, pop, I made it!

He moved towards the phone.

"Wait a minute," Jackie said. "I want to be sure."

"Want to be sure?" Dale repeated. "Holy cow, Jack! This baby is four weeks late right now. I'm callin' the Doc."

He raced into the living room and phoned Dr. D. S. Mitchelson, one of the crack obstetricians and gynecologists in Los Angeles County.

"Doc," he began. "This is it. This is the time. I know it is. Reckon I better get her there in a hurry, don't you?" The words poured out fast and garbled.

Dr. Mitchelson shook the sleep out of his head. "Who'd you say this was?"

"Holy cow, Man!" Robertson exploded. "This is no time to be horsin' around. This is Dale Robertson. You know, Mrs. Robertson's husband."

"Mr. Robertson," Dr. Mitchelson said calmly. "Fine. How frequent are Mrs. Robertson's pains? Are they coming rhythmically every few minutes?

Dale began to perspire. He ran the sleeve of his pajamas across his brow. "I don't know anything about those pains, Doc. All I know is I'd better take her to the hospital. After all, that baby's four weeks late. You said yourself the other day it could come any minute."

AN old hand with anxious fathers, Dr. Mitchelson sought to calm Dale down. "You take it easy, Mr. Robertson," he said, "and put Mrs. Robertson on the phone."

"I'm tellin' you, Doc." Dale insisted. "We don't have much time to wait. I know that. . ."

"Just let me talk to your wife, please."

Dale put the phone down and sprinted back to the bedroom. "Doc Mitchelson wants to talk to you. I told him everything, but he wants to hear it from you, I reckon."

Jacqueline smiled. "That's as it should be," she said. "Who's having this baby, anyway?" She shuffled into the living room and picked up the phone. She and the doctor discussed her symptoms. When she recradled the receiver, Jackie was very composed.

In the bedroom, she began to add a few last-minute articles to her overnight bag.

"How you feelin'?" Dale asked. "Now you'd better hurry, honey."

"I'm all right," Jacqueline said. "Don't get so excited."

"Who's excited?"

They both dressed, and Dale ran outside and got the car. The sun was just beginning to come up in Reseda, a small valley town where the Robertsons live.

"Now drive slowly," Jacqueline cautioned. "We've got plenty of time."

Dale shifted into first, jammed his foot on the accelerator, and the 1951 Pontiac convertible took off, leaving Robertson Manor, a three-bedroom stucco tract house, far behind.

"You know how to get to the Good Samaritan?" Mrs. Robertson asked.

"Sure, I know," Dale said. "It's down on Wilshire Boulevard, isn't it? How do you feel, honey?"

"Fine, Dale, but I'd like to stop and get something to eat."

Dale turned and looked at his wife incredulously. "You kidding?"

"No," Jackie insisted. "I'm hungry. I'd like to stop for a bite."

Dale applied pressure to the accelerator. The needle on the speedometer shot up to 60. "You're fooling, baby?"

"Honestly, Dale. I'm hungry. Besides, you're driving too fast."

"He just wouldn't let me stop and eat," Mrs. Robertson said later. "He drives real fast, you know, and this time he drove like he was going home to Oklahoma. I think it was about seven when we got to the hospital. I went into labor right away, and they sent me up to the delivery room.

"The doctor had told Dale that the average first delivery usually takes between 12 and 18 hours. There wasn't any point in his waiting around, so he drove to the studio that morning."

They say Dale camouflaged his nervousness pretty well that Thursday his daughter was born. "He's the kind of character who takes things in stride," Betty Grable says, "and we managed to get a good day's work out of him."

While Dale and Betty were working out on the set of The Farmer Takes A Wife, Jacqueline Robertson was on the delivery table. She was given a routine analgesic and then, after six hours of labor, nitrous oxide gas. When she came out of it, she saw her daughter, a red-faced, blue-eyed, black-haired, bawling little girl.

Dr. Mitchelson walked out to the waiting room while Jackie was being wheeled into her room. The doctor told Jackie's sister the good news. Jackie's sister got on the phone and called the studio.

"It's a girl, Dale," she screamed. "A girl, weighs eight pounds, five ounces."

"How's Jackie?" Dale asked.

"Just fine. Here's Dr. Mitchelson. I'll let him tell you."

Dr. Mitchelson got on the phone. "Congratulations! You've got a wonderful daughter, and Mrs. Robertson's doing very well."

"I don't know why we picked that name Rochelle," Jackie says, "except that it seems to go well with Robertson. Sort of sounds nice. Rochelle Robertson."

Rochelle Robertson was born at 3:42 P.M. on July 10th. Four days later, her dad celebrated his 29th birthday, and on the next morning, five days after she first came into the world, Rochelle went home to her little nursery on Darby Place, a bottle baby.

The effect of her birth on her father was one of profound relief.

"I'm tellin' you," Dale says in his characteristic, Oklahoma drawl. "We had some time with that baby. She was scheduled for June 10th. Just waitin' around for something like that—well, it gets on your nerves. I'm glad I was in a picture. Suppose I was on layoff, had nothin' to do. Would have gone plumb out of my head, just waitin'. Course it's different for a girl. They've got patience. Sure hope the second baby's on schedule. We'll never forget that Rochelle was a ten-month baby." END

Edith Head, Para. designer, discusses sketches for Jane's Just For You wardrobe with M.S. Fashion Editor Lillian Farley.

movie musical keynotes new fashions

■ Bing Crosby and Jane Wyman are together again, and better than ever, in Paramount's new Technicolor musical Just For You. It isn't only that these two seem to hit just the right casual, carefree pace together, but also that here's a new Jane—a sleeker, chicer Jane who sings in a warm throaty voice. Pictured on the following pages are clothes designed by Edith Head for Jane's Just For You wardrobe; and adaptations that you can buy. Opposite page, Jane and Bing in the number, "Zing A Little Zong."

Jane wears the original Edith Head evening gown in the movie Just For You. The adaptation of this original—(see photo page 80) has shimmering satin and sequin trim; the corselet bodice, rayon satin and nylon net; the skirt, nylon net over rayon taffeta. Dream blue, Fireman red, Shell pink, black or white.

■ Miss Sarah Jane Folks of St. Joseph, Mo., has never been a timid soul, nor anybody's fool. She's never had a deep-seated inferiority complex to make her a candidate for the psychiatrist's couch. Sarah Jane, before and after she became Jane Wyman, the Hollywood star, is the type variously defined among males as a "luscious doll" and at the same time "a good guy."

And, to top that, she has tackled the tough jobs and the easy ones in movies with a quiet competence, which has been enough to win her all sorts of acting honors, including an Academy Award for Johnny Belinda, and nominations for The Yearling and The Blue Veil.

All of which butters up this girl just about enough. The truth of the matter is that she has one terrible weakness. Her perfect equilibrium is always completely shattered by one man. And that man is Bing Crosby, who drives her right off her rocker!

"I can't exactly explain it," Jane admits. "All the time I have been in movies, I've been able to do such things as walk on a set, and, without previous introduction, fall into the arms of the hero with abandon—so far as the camera is concerned. If a girl can do this, almost nothing should shake her. But with me, it has been Bing Crosby. It was in the beginning; and it still is. The Groaner throws me completely, as in the last five seconds of a well-rehearsed wrestling match."

It happened the first time when Miss Jane Wyman was scheduled to work out in a Floradora sextette number with Bing, Bob Hope and other comics at a charity benefit.

"I am scared to death of Crosby," Jane told her long-time buddy, Pat O'Brien. "I've collected every record he's made for years, and the thought of meeting him makes my little heart palpitate way out of bounds."

"That," O'Brien said, "is the silliest thing I have ever heard, and there is no time like the right now to get acquainted."

So Jane Wyman met Bing Crosby and stifled a sudden inclination to faint dead away. However, she achieved practically the same thing on stage a few minutes later when she completely blew her lines.

"I felt as though the whole world had witnessed my shame," Jane remembers, "but the real truth is that those fellows Hope and Crosby covered for me and the audience never (Continued on page 87)

All bound up in his career as a composer-director, Bing puts off asking star of his show (Jane) to marry him.

When Bing's children—he's a widower—complain they've been neglected, Jane tries to help patch things up.

The wise headmistress of a swank girls' school (Ethel Barrymore) also comes to the aid of the hapless father.

Complications arise when Bing's son falls for Jane. But in the end the relationships are all straightened out.

(Continued from page 53) have gone through anyway. Listen—it's late, it's dark, it's lonely and maybe I'm scared. I've been working all day, I'm tired and I want to get home. And say," she warmed up, "if you boys in blue weren't so busy trapping defenseless females, maybe you'd be around when somebody really needs you. Now I tell you what I want: I want a police escort home!"

And that's exactly what she got, believe it or not, instead of a trip to the pokey. What's more, when the abashed cops delivered her to her gate, they tipped their caps politely and promised, with a brace of grins, that they'd mend their wicked ways.

The spunky Mrs. Desiderio Alberto Arnaz y De Acha III—better known as Lucille Ball—undoubtedly had the nerve of six molars to pull such a counter offensive. But the way she figured, she had a right to feel on the sassy side. When the cops flagged her down, she was fed up, sore and brooding about her domestic fate. She had just left Mr. Desiderio Alberto, Etc.—better known as Desi Arnaz—in a bean patch beside the highway on the Hollywood side of the mountain pass, where as too often happened, they had snatched their brief half hour of home life that day. Desi was on his way to beat a drum with his rhumba band at Ciro's, while Lucille was on her way home from work at MGM. He would tiptoe in and fall asleep when she was almost ready to wake up and hustle back to makeup. So they'd rolled their two cars up together, parked to catch up on the events of each other's day. Then they'd rolled on—in different directions. It was, fumed Mrs. D. A. A. y A., Ltd., in her lonely ranchhouse, one heck of a way to live a marriage. "There are going to be," she swore grimly that night, "some changes made."

By now there have been—some very important changes. Barely more than a year ago, Lucille stopped making movies one after the other and Desi dropped his baton with the band. Together, as everyone knows, the Arnazs joined up for a family television project, and today, as everyone also knows, I Love Lucy is the top show on the video waves and looks like it will be for a long, long time. While Mr. and Mrs. Desiderio A. Arnaz, Inc., are still working, they leave for work together, spend the day together, and come home together to Desilu Ranch—and "home" is the exact word. In fact, it's very appropriate that her great new success brings Lucille Ball, as a housewife, right into the homes of over 35,000,000 people who view her each week. While I Love Lucy is making the Arnaz family richer than they ever dreamed they'd be, that's only money. Their greatest reward for the gamble that paid off (by a lot of talent, guts and hard work) is not their astronomically soaring income but the family life these two home-happy people desperately wanted and were denied for ten long years.

To a whole lot of people, conditioned by Lucille Ball's movie roles (55 in the past 20 years), it may sound slightly out of character to tack a home-sweet-home frame around a star whose wisecracking, hard-cooked screen personality suggests a dame who'd be more likely to pinch your roll in a clip joint. Just as a fireside portrait of Desi Arnaz seems far removed from a frenetic Latin rapping a conga drum in a night club.

But as everyone ought to know by now, in Hollywood things are seldom as they seem. Actually, Lucy Ball has been a frustrated home (Continued on page 81)

(Continued from page 79) girl and Desi Arnaz, a thwarted householder, and both were painfully postponed parents until just recently. That all of these private blessings finally came to them is one of the nicest happy ending-beginning stories Hollywood has had to tell in years. And it couldn't have happened to two nicer people.

It was one Saturday afternoon back in 1940 that Desi loved Lucy so much that he raced up to a five-and-dime store in Greenwich, Conn., and hammered on the glass so hard that the proprietor, closed for the day, finally opened up to sell him a ten cent "gold" ring with which to make her Mrs. Desiderio Alberto, etc. It was a typical hurried show business wedding in that typical Broadway Gretna Green. No veil, no orange blossoms, no bridesmaids or ushers. Just a justice of the peace reciting the civil ceremony. No honeymoon either, not even to Niagara Falls up the line. You can't get to Niagara and back between shows. "We spent our honeymoon," Lucille recalls, "in Desi's dressing room at the Roxy." When the groom's engagement was over there, the newlyweds flew back to Hollywood, to an apartment that immediately made them both feel restless and cheated every time they rode up in the elevator.

There were good reasons for this. Both Lucille and Desi had been riding in elevators, dressing out of suitcases, hemmed in by hotel and apartment walls too much of their young lives. Both had racketed around without anchors for too long.

Description of a dumb actor: "He's ambidextrous. He can use either head."

Mike Connolly

Lucille Ball was the daughter of a telephone lineman, and as a toddler, traveled all around the country wherever his rambling jobs took him. Henry Ball died when Lucille was four and with her mother Desirée, little brother Fred, and sister Cleo, Lucy grew up in Jamestown, New York. The widow Ball had to work to support her brood. She was often sick and so was Lucille, who spent three years of her girlhood in a wheelchair with rheumatic fever. They moved around from one rented place to another and life was always tough. Lucille left high school at 14, tackled New York for a job a year later. When she finally got one, her life as a chorus girl in Broadway musicals, and sometime fashion model, didn't provide her with any real security. Even in Hollywood, where she first came as a leggy Goldwyn Girl, life for Lucy for a long time was strictly catch-as-catch-can. Its precariousness was impressed on her unforgettably by an incident which occurred when she was still a "starlet."

On an RKO set one day, a fresh makeup man insulted Lucille and she promptly heaved a cup of cold coffee in her hand right at him. It missed, and splattered all over the glamorous person of Miss Katharine Hepburn, then Queen of the RKO lot. Proud Kate huffed immediately off the set, the picture stopped and RKO lost thousands of dollars. This wild pitch dropped Lucille Ball's stock almost out of sight. She was more than in the doghouse, she was practically in Hollywood's death row. In fact, "You might as well leave town, dear," an extra advised her. But Lucy didn't. Ginger Rogers backed her up through the hassle that followed, and she went on to bigger and better things than ever. But even then she never trusted her luck long enough to tie it down to a home. Besides, in Lucy Ball's dreams, what was the use of a home without a husband? Hotels, apartments—that was her shifting life until she met Desi Arnaz. (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) Desi's a Cuban, the son of a distinguished Cuban family. His father was a mayor and his uncle a senator. But they have revolutions in Cuba and in one of those Senor Arnaz got tossed in jail, all his wealth was confiscated, and Desi was spirited off to Florida with his mother for safe keeping. Transplanted here, an alien in a foreign land, he too started out early on the restless seas of show business, riding on the wave of a rhumba and conga madness that swept the U. S., but never sure just when it would suddenly wash out and dump him flat on the beach. Most of that time he was a hall room boy and a fugitive from bellhops, too. Like his bride, Desi thought that wedded bliss spelled something different.

So, on the rainy Saturday that marked their first month's wedding "anniversary," Lucille and Desi celebrated by driving over Caheunga Pass to the San Fernando Valley. They pulled up before a real estate office bearing the sign, "BOB'S GOOD EARTH." They entered and told the salesman, "We want to look at some land."

The startled realtor, who expected no prospects that sodden day, buttoned on his slicker and drove them to a flat five acres on Devonshire Boulevard in the northern neck of the Valley. "This is for sale," he announced and added bravely, "You could make it a dream place."

It didn't look so dreamy. Except for a tiny house and three drooping trees, all the eager pair could see was a soaked but barren stretch of Bob's good earth. When they stepped out of the car they couldn't see that. The sky suddenly cracked open with a cat-and-dog cloudburst that blotted out what view there was. But they stood there enchanted, until Desi's dark head looked like a seal's and the pink-orange mop of his bride resembled a Raggedy Ann doll drowned in a bathtub.

"We'll take it," they told the amazed salesman and got back in the car. But before they did, Lucy stooped down to the ground.

She was still clenching her fist driving home when her husband asked, "What you got in your hand?" So she opened it. "Why," he exclaimed, "it's just mud!"

"Uh-uh," Lucille corrected. "It isn't just mud. It's our mud!"

That's the deeply possessive way Lucille Ball has felt about Desilu Ranch from the beginning—just as she's felt about the "gold" wedding ring, which soon wore as thin as the rim of the dime that bought it, and finally landed sentimentally in cotton batting lest it disintegrate entirely. But the erosion of time didn't affect Desilu Ranch that way. On the contrary, before long their piece of bare earth blossomed into a garden spot.

A famous architect built a rambling ranch house around the tiny shack that was there. A grove of olive trees and 350 orange trees grew to greenery and shade. A heart-shaped pool soon shimmered in the midst of an emerald lawn. Desi built a bohio (a Cuban hut) and after that a big rock barbecue, a tea room, a playhouse. Shrubs filled corners, flowers lined walks, vines climbed over trellises. Inside the house, Lucy spotted her grandma's antiques carefully around and furnished the rest with comfortable, colorful things with the suppressed talent for homemaking that had been storing up inside her all those homeless years.

Outside she collected a group of titled personages to people their five acres—The Duchess of Devonshire, a cow; the Duke, a pig; Sir Thomas of Chatsworth, Pinto the Great and Captain Dandy, a trio of cockers; numerous Princes and Princesses Northridge, all cats; and a court of 500 chickens. From the beginning, Desilu Ranch has been the center of the world for Lucy and Desi Arnaz. Yet, until recently, it's not been entirely the dream place the salesman promised. Something was missing, something called home life, a family, kids. And there were reasons for that, too.

For five of the first ten years of their marriage Desi was away on band tours, coming home for too brief stays, then off again for long weeks at hotels, theaters and night clubs. For three and a half years he served in the army. But in all that time, Lucy stuck determinedly by her piece of ground even if it was 22 miles from the studio. Even if she was lonesome and sometimes scared, she never weakened and moved into town. Except for the trips she made entertaining GI's, Lucy never left her home, not after she once got one. During the war she held the fort alone, and that's not exactly a figure of speech.

There was the night, for instance, when the spotter she often sat with on a rocky Chatsworth knob at the Valley's gateway woke her up in the middle of the night. "Lucy?" she breathed tensely. "A Jap Zero just passed over, headed right for your house!"

Sure enough, there was the queer sounding motor she'd been trained to spot coming right for the ranch house roof. Lucy dived for the light switch and sat up the rest of the night with Desi's rusty .22, the only artillery she could find at the place. In the morning, dozing fitfully with no bombs as yet, she was roused by a jabber of commands in a foreign tongue, looked out the window to see brown skinned, khaki clad men piling out of trucks. That's when Mrs. D. Arnaz raised her cannon and resolved to sell her life dearly in defense of Desilu Ranch. Only—to her surprise and immense relief—the jabbering foreigners headed right into the orange groves across the road and were soon happily plucking golden balls from the limbs. The invading "Japs" were only Mexican fruit pickers, but the Zero was a Zero all right. One the Yanks had captured and were flying home to take apart and study.

That's just a sample of the memories which swirl about Desilu Ranch for Lucille Ball. There are thousands more—gay ones and sad ones. Funny ones and ones not so funny. Festive homecomings and teary goodbyes. Endless projects started and sometimes finished. Happy humming parties—and lonely nights. All in all, the years have forged Desilu Ranch into the symbol of marriage for Desi and Lucille. All the good things have happened when they were there, most of the bad ones when they were away. That's why when Lucy's at the ranch—with Desi—she's living. And that's why the Arnaz's are living there today. They're there—thanks to TV—together at long last, along with the royal descendants of all their livestock, and a certain chubby, black haired princess with sparkling eyes named Lucie Desirée, their daughter.

For ten long years Lucille and Desi Arnaz longed in vain for a baby; although the elementary facts of biology were against them. It's hard to be a mother when your husband's away three-fourths of the time. But Lucy never gave up hope. All those barren years she studied every book she could find on babies, listened with recording ears to the talk of her girl friends who had them until she became an expert. Just the other day her pediatrician called her. "Say," he inquired, "have you changed doctors or something?"

"Why no," she assured him, "of course not. Why?"

"I just wondered," he explained. "You haven't called me for almost a year and most new mothers phone every hour on the hour."

"Well for one thing," Mrs. Arnaz replied, "there's nothing wrong with my little girl. And for another," she added honestly, "I know an awful lot about babies."

After the war, when Desi started hopping around the country again, Lucille cut down her picture schedule and joined up. They played for a while as a vaudeville team—anything to stick together—and one morning in Chicago she woke up feeling woozy. There was a morning rehearsal, though, and she went on to the theatre. But before the evening show, she had an examination, and she learned the news she had been praying for all her life. Lucille Ball was a trouper; that night and all week she went on with the act. It was a strenuous one, with comic belly flops and high kicks. And she lost that baby.

After that Lucille quit travelling and the next time the funny feeling arrived she dropped everything, sat at Desilu Ranch in a big chair by the fireplace for months until she knew her baby was safe. Lucie Desirée wasn't born right on Desilu Ranch, of course. The event occurred at the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital in Hollywood, but the same syllables occur in her name and since her arrival, Lucille's roots have spread even deeper into "our mud."

While it's true that the terrific success of I Love Lucy has finally permitted the Master and Mistress of Desilu Ranch to spend their free time there in the home grown way they like, Desi and Lucy aren't a couple of vegetables rusticating sluggishly in the soil or anything like that. If you've seen that rib-cracking Desilu TV production on your set Monday nights, you know that with Ricky and Lucy Ricardo almost anything can happen and invariably does. It's the same with Desi and Lucille on the ranch or wherever they are. In fact, as their script writer, Jess Oppenheimer admits, "We're always raiding the private life of Dez and Lucille for ideas." That's perfectly okay with both parties concerned, because Desilu Productions is a family affair. Besides costarring as the hectic householders, Desi's the president and Lucille's the veep.

Desi and Lucille in person make a perfect pattern to (Continued on page 111)

Take my word for it

by JANET LEIGH; star columnist for October

I love driving my car with the top down.

Blue's my color; I'm a sucker for it.

I know just what I want when we shop.

Love, it's wonderful! Just ask us!

SIGN THAT A GIRL'S in love: her favorite color is blue, yet she gets a kick out of noticing, in every mirror she passes, that she is dressed in black and white. It's a question of preference versus certainty. She knows she will please him, and isn't that why colors were born? Sign that a boy is in love: he's so pleased with her in black and white that he eats all his vegetables like a good little Tony.

Sign that a girl's a girl: she loves and eats sweets but drinks her coffee black, sans cream, sans sugar, sans saccharine. She likes to drive with her top down, then wraps a bubushka round her head, so that no more of her face is visible than if she wore an Eskimo's parka. When she annoys friends, it's with her good habits—like being too neat. (And that she is going to quit. She is tired of friends always insisting that they use their cars for a trip because they know she'll go through the car and clean it like she does a house.) She has never cooked on anything but a gas range, but she can't wait until she can get an electric stove!

I wonder why I'm never in a hurry, or don't think I am, until I find myself behind one of those idle drivers inching along looking for a place to park. Sometimes they're not looking for a place to park—they're just window shopping from the car. I can show you dozens of them in Beverly Hills any afternoon. If it's a woman driver (and I'm sorry to say it invariably is), I can even look ahead and pick the shops where she will slow down for a better look. They tell me the Beverly Hills merchants are thinking of using giant price tags that can be read from the traffic lanes. Oh, well, maybe I'm in a rebellious mood. I have just finished reading two books that stirred my blood—"The Caine Mutiny" and "Catcher In The Rye."

Oh, I shop, too. But I know just what I'm going to get and where I'll look for it and how much I'm prepared to pay and what I'll accept as a substitute if I can't get what I start out to find. If it's a dress I want, there is no trouble. I go right to Amelia Gray's in Beverly Hills; not only because she carries lines I like, Claire McCardle, Ceil Chapman and Carrie Munse dresses, but because she has an understanding head on her shoulders. If I get a certain dress and maybe Liz Taylor, or Cyd Charisse or Janie Powell come in and want the same one, she'll steer them away from it. She'll steer me away from it, if any other girl in the studios has bought the same model. On the other hand, if any of the society group drop in, she will sell the same dress because she knows there is little likelihood of a conflict. We all know this and appreciate her thoughtfulness. Once I liked a cocktail dress so much I bought it anyway, even though she warned me that Nancy Davis had one like it. Mine, though, was in a different color. Just the same, when Amelia heard of an important cocktail party both Nancy and I were very likely to attend, she phoned and reminded me about the similarity and that Nancy might wear her dress. That's service! I'm an Amelia Gray patron from now on.

I LIKE TO WEAR SHOES that match my dresses, and since that isn't always easy to accomplish, I buy reasonably priced shoes in linen or chambray that can be dyed to match. Generally, I can find what I want in Chandler shoes, and either they do the dyeing for me or a little man I know does the job. And so . . . when I make my entrance at the party, there I am in blue from head to toe—oh, I beg your pardon! I mean, in black and white from head to toe.

But before the party, there is a lot more to do. My hair, for instance. If I can, I slip down to Saks where Al Paul gives me a mint shampoo, sets it, pins it up in curls, and the sun dries it out on my way home. I like my hair washed twice a week. But it would be too costly to get it done outside both times, so every other time I do it myself. Generally I use a cream shampoo, and I will wash my hair at least every third day if I'm working in a picture in order to keep it fluffy and with good highlights.

But if one is going out, one must worry about more than just face, hair and hands, mustn't one? Still, that isn't much trouble. For my hands I very often use Revlon's Aquamarine Lotion, and then I keep right on going and use the same stuff all over my body. If it is a formal party and I am going to be svelte, I hope, I shall commence with the basic in such cases—just a panty girdle. But if, by chance, I am to wear a straight dress, I will very likely slip into a light girdle. I think it gives one a smoother look, no matter how small one's hips. There are always the bumps that are much better de-bumped.

LIPSTICK: sometimes the plain red, sometimes with the blue in it (after all, I have to get that blue in somewhere!). There will be mascara, too. I will use powder, a little, and if I am not tanned, I will use rouge. If I am tanned, no rouge. Next, my little Glycene bracelet wristwatch, probably (Continued on next page) proves Zonite's absolute safety to body tissues in feminine hygiene

Rabbit eye tests produce Sensational Results

The vital need of feminine hygiene (including vaginal cleanliness) is fully recognized today. This wholesome practice is approved among doctors. A wise wife knows how a cleansing, deodorizing douche helps keep her dainty, sweet and desirable. She knows how necessary a germicidal douche is for her HEALTH, WELL BEING and MARRIED HAPPINESS.

The important question is what to use. What antiseptic is powerfully effective, deodorizing yet absolutely safe to body tissues? A perfect solution is ZONITE!

No other type liquid antiseptic-germicide for the douche of all those tested is SO POWERFUL yet SAFE to tissues as ZONITE.

ZONITE is positively non-poisonous, non-irritating.

Here's ABSOLUTE PROOF

The membranes of a rabbit's eye are even more sensitive than membranes in the vaginal tract. Laboratory tests show that ZONITE as used in the douche was put twice daily for three months into rabbits' eyes. NOT THE SLIGHTEST IRRITATION APPEARED AT ANY TIME. ZONITE'S completely safe qualities have also been proved in clinical tests by a famous surgeon and scientist and in actual use by thousands of women for over thirty years. ZONITE has brought self-confidence, poise and serenity to women by the thousands.

ZONITE'S 'Miracle Working' Action

ZONITE completely deodorizes. Yet it never leaves an odor of its own. It helps prevent infection. ZONITE is so powerful —no germs of any kind tested have ever been found that it will not kill on contact. It's not always possible to reach all the germs in the tract, but you can be sure ZONITE kills every reachable germ. ZONITE leaves you feeling so clean, dainty and refreshed.

Always use as directed.

my little basket of pearls (cultured) that hangs from my neck, and my gold and pearl engagement ring. My platinum-design-over-gold-band wedding ring I already have on, so into the dress and . . . Now, where's that man who's been yelling all this time? He has fallen strangely silent. Has he wandered into the kitchen? Yes. Are all the drawers and cabinet doors hanging half open, or at least not properly closed, showing where he has been snooping around for something to munch on? Yes. Has he found something to his liking and has he got a mouthful of it? You bet. As soon as I pop a bit of it into my own mouth, we'll be all ready to go.

I like small hats—the kind I pick up at Saks' hat bar. I'm not so crazy about small furs, but I do like my ranch mink stole. But what's the difference? I've been just as happy in pedal pushers as in mink.

Steaks are great but one of my nicest dinner memories is of myself reaching a fork into Tony's can of Heinz beans.

ONE OF MY FAVORITE movie roles was the one I had in Red Danube, but not for reasons you might guess. I had to go on a diet in order to look properly refugee-ish and drawn; no bread, no potatoes, no desserts, no cream in my coffee, et cetera. What do you know . . . I found I didn't dislike the diet at all, and, with some changes, it has become a habit with me. The biggest change had to do with desserts. I have never lost my love for them. And sweets. I, for instance, just can't enjoy a movie unless I'm nibbling at something. I don't wait for the lights to go on to go to the candy counter —I sneak out in the middle of the picture.

This reminds me of something Tony and I did during the trip we made recently. We had been wined and dined in New York and Washington, and, when we got to Boston, we found a couple of free hours had been allotted to us. It took us two seconds to plan the evening; we got hold of some chocolate-covered raisins and went to a movie! Worse—when the personal appearance tour was over and we were back in Hollywood, we went on a regular movie rampage—movies every night. I guess I'm a pigeon for movies. Tony says I'm the type that even screams when the villain shows up in a Disney cartoon!

It was a nice trip, except when a button came off Tony's overcoat and I tried to sew it on. I sewed it so flat to the cloth that he couldn't get it into the buttonhole. Was I the embarrassed young wife when he had to cut it off and resew it . . . something that he does well. To console myself I went out on a shopping spree. Then I came home with a nice headache, took three aspirins and went to bed.

TO SHOW HOW SILLY A GIRL CAN BE, I have suffered from headaches for several years and never thought to have my eyes looked at. Almost any day which I had to devote to script study or any evening when I went to see a picture I would find my temples begin to throb. The other afternoon I went to an oculist and discovered I had an astigmatic fault. Glasses were made up, which I only have to use while driving or reading or studying, and I have gone several weeks now without head pains. It's such a pleasure not to have to worry about it any more. Why, I used to figure on a headache when I planned my day's activities—where would I be and what would I be doing when it started up, and should I even go out at all? Was I too vain to think of glasses?

WHEN I HAVE CHILDREN, I am going to teach them the pitfalls of vanity. I won't teach them too much. I don't believe in overtraining children . . . you know, where they figuratively click their heels and say the right things at the right time like little automatons. I want them comfortably between "well trained" and sloppy. I don't want them like a little girl Tony and I once met who peremptorily ordered us, "You move over there! I want to take your picture!"

If I have a little girl, I will tell her that she can go anywhere in the world and move in any company if she can retain a spirit of naturalness. I think I was an average girl when I broke into the movies and found myself in social circles that were a bit over my head. I made the mistake when I first went out of trying to act like a "personality" and flopped. I didn't realize that nobody expects you to be anything but your assured self, and to achieve this you need not say anything or do anything special.

I will tell her that you can win almost anyone's liking with an honest approach. I was dishonest when I attended a smart dinner in a Long Island home one evening and pretended that a weird looking dessert, consisting of fruit-like ice cream in a giant pineapple half, was nothing new to me. So I reached up to the tray the butler held and lifted the whole business onto my plate, instead of just dipping out some of the ice cream. Was I stuck, sitting there with something as big as a football in front of me . . . not to speak of the horror that filled me when I realized that in this monstrosity was everybody else's dessert as well!

It is well-known in Hollywood that you never know what goes with Bing Crosby. He may act as though no one else is alive, and then he may abruptly do the opposite, as he did with Jane.

One night her telephone rang. It was Mr. Crosby, who said, "How'd you like to do a record for Decca?"

When Jane recovered her breath, she allowed as how she'd like it very much. Uncle Bing, as he is known to quite a few around Hollywood, is likely to call people whose talent he respects and say to them, "Plum (or any name he may think of on the spur of the moment), how's about getting together for a small routine?"

And this means a business routine—not soft lights and sweet music. In this case, Jane dropped around to the Decca studios a few nights later, and in an hour they knocked off that Number One on the Hit Parade called "In The Cool, Cool, Cool Of The Evening."

Jane still doesn't quite believe it. "I started out as a singer in small clubs," she'll tell you, "and I had a fair voice. I can't read music. I don't know one note from another. If you can figure it out, what I mean is that I can't sing, but I know how to sing."

Now, the truth of the matter is that Jane Wyman and Bing Crosby are what is known as "set friends." Ever since Here Comes The Groom, which launched them as occasional singing partners, they have enjoyed frolicking in front of the cameras together.

"The prospect of playing golf with Bing (Jane is a fair to middling feminine clubber with a 19 handicap) is something I wouldn't want to face," she says. "And the only time we have seen each other socially is the recent occasion on which I was invited to a surprise party and, by coincidence, arrived at the Crosby home at the same time Bing showed up, fresh from the set of Road To Bali.

But no two people could ever be closer, tunefully speaking, than the harmony that has resulted from their latest picture collision in Just For You. There's a great song in that epic, and quite a story behind the song.

Mr. Crosby was not on the set the day that Jane arrived and was told by Paramount's musical genius, Joe Lilley, that the time had come for her to do "a bit of a number" with Bing.

"Then Joe flashed eight yards of sheet music on me," Jane says. "I took one look and the only thing it resembled was the board at the New York stock exchange. Why, thank you very much, Joe, I said. Seeing that I can't read music, I can pick this up as fast as I can learn to speak Portuguese. Why, you musical bone picker, why don't you write a simple song for a change?"

"You got me wrong," Joe retorted. "Warren and Robin wrote this song. I merely arranged it, and if you'll drop over to my office, we'll run through it a couple of times. It's simple, once you get the hang of it."

Sure, it's simple. "Zing A Little Zong" sounds like two crazy people with not a care in the world, harmonizing over a beer in the kitchen at two in the morning. But the truth is that, even to professionals, it's no more simple than the newest Einstein theory.

So Jane went to work on the song that changes keys twice in the middle with no warning, and in a week, she was fairly well prepared to get even with Crosby for all the tummy fluttering he'd caused every time she stepped up to a mike with the old master.

Bing strolled onto the set one morning and said, "H'ya—how's the golf? Anything great?"

"I gotta learn to putt," Jane said.

"Well," Bing assured her, "it'll come to you. Now, how's for knocking off this "Zing" number?"

"I'm nervous," Janie replied, "I'll never make it."

"Huh," Bing retorted, "you'll do it. Know anything about it?"

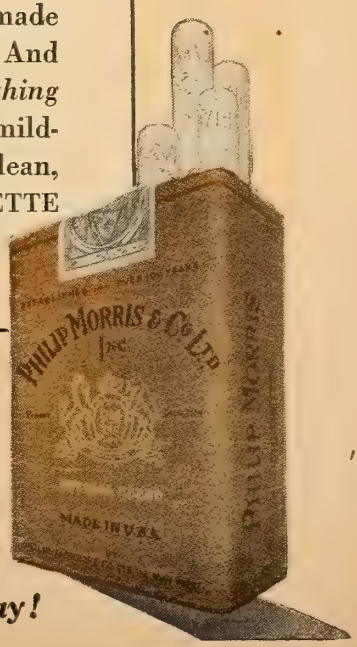
"Nothing," Jane said, "except like you say, it's so simple."

So they adjourned to the music department, where Joe Lilley handed the Groaner his part.

"You should have seen it," Jane says, repressing a chortle. "Just like handing the guy an anvil. 'What's this now?' Bing asked, looking a little confused.

"'Why it's nothing,' I told him, 'Nothing to a Big Music Man like you'."

"'Let's not overdo it,'" Bing growled, and retired to a distant corner, with enough sheet music to make costumes for all his kids.



"And that's about the all of it," Jane says. "My ego was almost completely repaired, even though in 15 minutes he mastered what it took me a week to figure out. By the time we recorded to the rhythm of Van Cleave's band, my buck fever had at last disappeared. An hour later, Bing picked up his hat and shuffled out the door.

"We'd knocked the whole thing off in a little over an hour—we'd Zung A Little Zong, and, instead of reveling in a moment of triumph watching the great Crosby break down, they panned to a stuffed owl, which was me." END

he never took a lesson

(Continued from page 47) the photographs that appear in the newspapers and magazines. If you were lucky enough to see him in person on one of the tours he made with the picture, you have an inkling of what makes him look like a veteran. But the best way is to see him in person, off-guard, and observe the most uninhibited fellow ever to come to Hollywood—a lad without a spiked ego, but without a shade of shyness or a shred of a feeling of incompetence.

Aldo Ray is a big man, better than six feet tall, and he nudges 200 pounds. He has hands like hams and arms like a weight lifter. When he wears a suit, he appears to be in constant danger of bursting out of it. And his face, even in repose, is strong, with eyes that can grow cold and a mouth that is thin and determined. His voice is soft, only because it is hoarse, and comes out a whisper, but his speech is strong and his words, on almost any subject, very official. In contrast, he is gentle in his thinking, extremely friendly in his associations and gives the impression that he would be hard to anger. Although he is blond, he is very Italian. His mannerisms and language are studded with Italian gestures and idiom, and he talks a good deal like a Saroyan or Steinbeck character, simply and straightforwardly.

The course of Aldo Ray's rise to picture stardom is a source of wonder to everyone but Aldo himself. All Hollywood considers his rise phenomenal, a Cinderella story about a guy. But to Aldo, it was just a natural series of events that followed a fluke meeting with a movie director. He sees little that is unusual in what happened, except, possibly, that it was Hollywood that finally got him and not Washington. He always knew he would be a big man—but he figured it would be in politics.

ALDO Ray's background was about as simple as a man's past can be, and purely American. He was born in Pen Argyl, Pennsylvania, in 1926, the oldest of six sons. His father and mother, Silvio and Maria DaRe, are Italian immigrants. The DaRe's moved to Crockett, California, a small town 30 miles north of San Francisco when Aldo was three years old, and his father found a job as a laborer with the C&H Sugar Company, Crockett's only industry. He has worked there ever since.

All of Aldo Ray's life had to do with Crockett. Until he was literally drafted into the movies, he had no idea that he would make his home anywhere else. Though his family were poor, they were well thought of in Crockett. And Aldo, who is at heart a family man and a small town boy, used to dream that he would one day find fame and fortune, but that he'd find it in Crockett, not have to go out and seek it.

The DaRes are a strong family unit. Mario and Silvio DaRe are old-country Italians who speak very little English. Consequently, the family speaks Italian at home. Aldo, who couldn't speak a word of English when he started school, was proud as a peacock at lunch one day recently.

"Look," he crowed. "I just got a letter from my mother. In English!"

As a small boy, Aldo Ray had few of the ordinary luxuries small boys have come to expect. The DaRe family was too busy keeping its head above water. They lived for many years in a small, four-room house, practically sleeping in shifts. Mama was the boss. She ruled with an iron hand, but with love, and as they grew up, the older children took on the duties of supervising the younger. Papa just earned the money. Aldo says he can't remember him ever raising his voice to any of them.

Just before the war, an old house in Crockett was put up for auction. It was a huge place with many rooms and had at one time years before been the home of a millionaire. Mario and Silvio DaRe went to the auction and bid the place in for $3,100. Then the entire family went to work on the home as laborers—building partitions, painting, papering, even digging a cellar. One of Aldo's sharpest recollections of his boyhood is the building he did, it seemed for years, until the house was at last completed to Mama's satisfaction.

Twenty-four hours after he finished high school, Aldo was snatched up by the Navy V-5 program and shipped off to Memphis to the Naval Air Station there. Weight, which has been a problem with him all along, was a stumbling block then and he had to take off 13 pounds on the trip to make the entrance requirements. The Navy, however, was not destined to have him as an air ace, for he was promptly transferred to seaman duty.

As Aldo himself tells it, he had little to do in the war. But if you press him for details, he will admit that he was a Frogman, that part of his duty was to swim into enemy harbors ahead of the ships and spot hazards, and then swim back to his ship with this vital information. One of his chores in this dangerous work was to check the waters off Okinawa at the time of the invasion. He spent 23 months in the service and then came back to Crockett and to school.

A trick knee kept Aldo from becoming a great football player, which is what he wanted to be. He had a scholarship to the University of California at Berkeley, but when he learned that the doctors wouldn't let him play football, he transferred to Vallejo Junior College. He promptly became a big man on the Vallejo campus and was elected president of the student body before he was in school a month. As he stood on a rostrum explaining to the fellows and girls why he would be the best man for the job, he got such a thrill that he made up his mind he'd become a public official, maybe a congressman as soon as he got out into the world.

IN June, 1948, Aldo married a girl he had known all of his life. He was in his senior year, back in Berkeley again, and casting about for suitable employment when he learned there was to be an election for constable back in Crockett.

Utilizing all of the tried and true gimmicks, such as street corner speeches, talks before ladies luncheon groups and service clubs and hanging posters on his friends' cars, Aldo pitched into the fray. He promised that he would give clean policing to the community and would have a telephone installed next to his bed, so his constituents could have 24-hour service—something his opponent said couldn't be done by one man. Aldo spent his entire hoard of $400 on the campaign and waged, according to older politicos in Crockett, a brilliant fight for the office.

If he hadn't been talked into taking a drive down to San Francisco one day by his brother Guido, he might still be the up-and-coming young civic light of his home town.

Guido brought a San Francisco paper to Aldo one day and showed him an ad asking that football players interested in appearing in a movie apply at a local hotel for interviews that afternoon. Guido wanted to go but had no transportation. Aldo didn't want to make the trip but, possibly with a vote in mind, agreed to if Guido would pay for the gasoline and the bridge toll. They joined a large group of huskies in the living room of the hotel suite some time later, and Aldo settled down to read while his brother was given the once over. He personally thought the whole thing was silly.

When the other lads had been through the mill, a studio man motioned Aldo to go into the other room for his interview. Aldo told him he wasn't interested, something the Hollywood man refused to believe. Rather than argue about it, Aldo went in. Director David Miller sat behind a desk, and an assistant handed Aldo a page of script to read. Aldo took a look at it and refused again, stating that he wasn't an actor, just a chauffeur. This enchanted Miller to the extent that he insisted on Aldo remaining and talking about a part in the picture. When Aldo said he was occupied running for constable at the moment, Miller asked him to deliver a campaign address. This was something Aldo felt he could get his teeth into, and besides he needed the practice, so he stood in the center of the room and made an impassioned plea that the group of Hollywoodites elect him constable of Crockett.

When the speech was over, everyone made a dive for contract forms, trying to be the first to get the young politician's name on paper. The man's personality, husky voice and oddly handsome appearance was not the usual in a movie actor, but Miller and his aides were canny enough to know they'd be appealing. Because the money was good, and the studio people assured him they would not let their schedule interfere with his police duties if he got elected, Aldo signed. Then he had to walk out into the other room and face his brother, who had not been snapped up so readily. To this day Guido still has a feeling that fate betrayed him.

AFTER Saturday's Hero was completed, Aldo Ray was elected constable. He had had his taste of the movies and was now happy to stay at home. While he was constable, juvenile delinquency dropped to zero. The kids of the town didn't want to blacken Aldo's record, so they took their mischief to nearby communities.

Meanwhile there was much conversation at Columbia Studio about Aldo. Some of the executives were very high on him. Others pointed out that there were obvious limitations to the activities of an actor who had permanent laryngitis and had had no experience. If it hadn't been for The Marrying Kind, the discussions would no doubt have petered out and been forgotten. But somebody brought Aldo to the attention of director George Cukor, who had been assigned to the picture. And soon Max Arnow, the casting director, got Aldo on the phone and asked him to come to Hollywood for a test. Aldo said no. He was a cop, and headed for big things in politics. But Arnow finally won, and Aldo took a couple of days off and showed up at Columbia.

Twentieth Century-Fox has photographed Marilyn Monroe in a gunny sack just to prove that she looks perfect in everything.

The treatment he got in the next couple of days is more than likely what changed his mind. He was driven to Cukor's home in a limousine. He was wined and dined and invited to dip into the pool between sessions on the script. He was being considered for one of the minor parts in the picture, but all aspirants were to be tested reading the leading male role. Then, after a few days of high living, he tested and went back home.

Weeks went by and one day Arnow called again.

"You're too fat, Aldo," he said.

"Not for a constable," said Ray.

"Lose some weight," said Arnow, "and you're in the movie."

"I'll think about it," Aldo said.

He thought about it, and then went on one of those diets he specializes in and that only he can stand. He chews celery all day and eats a steak at night. In five days he lost 20 pounds, went back to Columbia, tested again, and returned to Crockett. A week later Arnow called again.

"You looked great, Aldo," said Arnow.

"The only reason I'm interested," said Aldo, "is that I might be able to pick up a little money in a picture once in a while to add to my income here."

"You'll have to forget that, Aldo," said Arnow. "They want you to play the lead —opposite Judy Holliday."

"What does that mean?" Aldo asked.

"It means you'll have to quit up there, sign a contract with Columbia, and come to Hollywood to live."

"I'll think about it," Aldo said.

Aldo thought some more. His marriage was on the rocks. He was discovering that a constable's salary was just a mite less than he needed. He liked acting, and he could always get back into politics if thing went wrong in Hollywood. He called up the city fathers and resigned. (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) You saw him in The Marrying Kind, and later in Pat And Mike. He is being hailed as the freshest thing to hit the films since Harold Lloyd. Columbia, shy on male stars, is planning to star him in its most ambitious movie to date, From Here To Eternity.

The life that Aldo Ray lives today is far different from the one he was living—and had planned to live—when Guido asked him to drive to San Francisco, just a couple of years ago. He has a small house above a rocky section of the coast of the Pacific Ocean, where one or more of his family is generally found visiting him. He doesn't go out with girls much because his divorce is not final, something he takes more seriously than most men in the movies. Still, the girls in Hollywood are chasing him as though he were a prize. He wears fine clothes, and buys a lot of presents for his mother.

And Aldo takes his work seriously, now that he is really interested in it. An amusing incident that took place in New York shortly after The Marrying Kind was released testifies to that. Aldo was in Manhattan on a personal appearance tour and happened to pick up Time Magazine which carried a review he considered not fair or accurate. Aldo phoned the studio's New York publicity chief.

"I would like," he said, "to have a talk with the guy who wrote that review in Time."

"Nobody knows who writes those reviews," said the press agent. "Time has a staff of movie men."

"How many?" asked Aldo.

"Three, I think," said the press agent.

"Then I'd like to talk to all of them," said Aldo.

Because he'd never heard of it happening before, the studio man arranged a lunch at the Stork Club. Aldo sat down and pulled a copy of the review from his pocket.

"Okay, you guys," he said, "I'm going to take this thing apart and show you where you're all full of baloney . . ."

And he did. And the Time men sat and listened, because Aldo Ray is a determined man and they didn't know what he might do if they didn't.

Constable Aldo Ray is not going very much farther in his political career. But you can take the word of everyone in Hollywood that he's going far in the movies. Farther than a young man who took lessons could ever go. END is june allyson really quitting?

Joe Pasternak, the MGM producer, recalls Junie's behavior very well before she became Mrs. Richard Powell. "She was a persistent little devil," Joe says. "Wherever I went I'd find myself bumping into her—on the elevator, in the commissary, even in the projection rooms. I remember one time when we were casting Music For Millions, a picture Junie wanted a part in very badly. I phoned her that morning and asked her how she was. 'Bad, Joe,' she sniffled. 'I've got a cold in my nose.'

"'Sorry,' I said. 'I was thinking of you in connection with Music For Millions.' Next morning, June was in my office before I was."

But, as I say, that was nine or ten years ago, before June Allyson had waded neck-deep in success, getting to know all its glories, responsibilities, and demands.

TODAY, Junie sits back weighing a critical decision, wondering what to do.

Her contract at MGM expires in September of 1953. She loves the studio very much. Except for one serious fight last year when she didn't want to star in Girl In White, "because I just didn't think it was right for me," her relationship with MGM has been almost a father-daughter one. The studio is responsible for the enviable position she occupies today, and June is the first to admit it. Yet she is determined to sit out the balance of her contract, unless she can play roles she considers fitting.

Unfortunately, Junie is not a very good judge of scripts. For example, she was chary about starring with Jimmy Stewart in The Stratton Story; and yet that picture made a fortune and established her as a dramatic actress of the highest degree.

In reply to the question: "Is there any truth about your retirement?" June's answer was, "No. I'm not retiring at all. I love to act. All I want is a good story. I'm sure the studio is looking and will come up with one. I talk about retiring all the time, and maybe that's how the rumor got started. You see, ever since the children came I've been satisfied to stay at home and look after them. With Richard beside me, I don't need anything else. My career doesn't seem as important as it once did."

"I can remember," I said, "when it seemed like the beginning and the end of everything to you."

June nodded. "The best part of the hunt is the chase," she said in that froggy voice of hers. "When you're very young, you set your sights on something. Then when you achieve it, you realize that the enthusiasm is what made it so worthwhile. Sure, I used to be career-crazy. But then I met Richard. Right away my objectives became—what's the word?—diffused. I wanted a career and a husband, too. I've been very lucky. I've been able to blend the two. That's because Richard's been so understanding. He never minded my working, and I loved it, because after all, it's not too much fun hanging around the house when your husband's away all day and you've got someone to do the housework.

"But then Pam and Rickie came along. And I guess it's the maternal instinct in all of us girls that gets us in the end. Honestly, it's not easy to tear yourself away from your babies six days a week."

IT WAS about that time that the studio asked June to star in a few pictures she felt were not for her. There were minor bickerings, protestations, and suddenly the wonderful realization by Junie that she didn't have to work if she didn't want to.

I say this was a wonderful realization because Junie's had to work ever since she was 15 in order to support herself. Working became such an integral part of her life that when it suddenly dawned upon her that she could stop entirely with no drastic result, she was awe-stricken.

"I can stop working tomorrow," she says. "I can go off salary and not work at any other motion picture studio until a year from September. But who wants it? Still, I don't see any point in going to work to be unhappy. The only time I would quit motion pictures would be if I had to do a lot of things I didn't want to. When that day comes, little Junie is quitting, but not before."

"There's a lot of talk," I said, "that after your MGM contract expires, you and Dick will make films for television like Desi and Lucille Ball."

June shook her lovely blonde head. "Actually, I haven't thought very much about it. Richard is the business man in the family, and he knows all about those things. As a matter of fact, he was talking a lot about Desi and Lucille the other night. They own their television films, you know, and I guess they can sell them over and over again to thousands of TV stations. All I know is that I haven't worked since December, and I love it. Yet, years ago it would've driven me crazy. I don't (Continued on next page)

I LOOKED back over my notes. They didn't seem to add up. "A funny thing, Junie," I said. "Everytime I interview you, I leave with the feeling that I've gotten a lot of information. Then I go home and read my notes and find it's nothing but the greatest collection of double talk in the world, and I really don't know how you stand about things. Just for the record, let's get this retirement talk straight. You're not quitting and you're not on suspension, but you haven't worked since December? Is that right?"

Junie laughed that throaty laugh everyone has come to love.

"It's really very simple," she explained. "The first three months of this year I was on layoff. (Studio contracts call for employment of a star 40 out of 52 weeks per year.) After that I technically went back to work; that is, I went back on salary. I just haven't made any pictures. Maybe by the time this article comes out, I'll be working. Only," and she giggled again, "I don't think so, because Richard and I are planning a vacation in Europe, and I guess I can do that on my layoff, too. As soon as the studio has a good story for me, I'll come running. I love making pictures.

"The point I was trying to get across, however, is that I no longer have to make them to be happy. My life is full enough without them. Maybe I'm kidding myself, but I honestly think I could quit tomorrow and never miss the business."

That's the way June Allyson talks. Any attempt to pin her down to a definite statement of fact is destined to failure, because Junie herself is never definite or clear in her own mind concerning plans, desires, or intentions. Or, if she is, she's a master at camouflage.

On one point, however, she is fairly clear. She is determined not to act in any film except one that she is completely sold on. She will undoubtedly take a suspension and go off salary before she enacts a role that rubs her the wrong way.

People who know her well say that what she'll probably do when her MGM contract expires next year is sign again for one film a year on a non-exclusive basis.

If Richard deems it advisable, she will go into television or make motion pictures of her own choosing at other studios on a free lance basis.

In the meantime she is ecstatically happy with her husband, her two children, and her golf, in that order. The direction of her career seems of small interest to her at this moment.

A woman who once worked as June's housekeeper has the best explanation of her attitude. "It's very simple," this woman (who prefers to remain nameless) points out. "Junie's not a child any more. She's a grown woman. She's got a different sense of values. She's looked around town, and mind you, she's learned a few things. Most important of all, she's learned that a career is a very wonderful thing—only you can't kiss it on the lips at night. There are actresses in Hollywood who have the most wonderful careers. Well, Barbara Stanwyck is one. But, what's the good of a career if you don't have a husband and children to share it with? I think Junie knows; she's learned which things come first. The husband and the children. Those are the most important things in a young woman's life."

AN MGM director who's put Junie through her paces in several films, had this to say when I asked him if he thought the Allyson retirement appeared imminent: "Imminent, shimminent! This girl earns about 125 grand a year. Her husband does just about as well. Under the present tax setup, most of one yearly income is confiscated—so right away, you can dispense with the financial incentive. I mean most of what June earns goes to the government.

"As for other incentives, such as fame and success, well, my opinion is that right now June's getting a great big thrill out of being a mother. It's something new. You can't compare it to making pictures, because for June that's something old.

"Let the kids grow up and start going off to school, and right away June's going to have some time on her hands. All this talk about retirement will evaporate. I have a theory that's been proven many times. When you've had a strong hunger for fame, it never disappears entirely. Ever know a champion who quit at the height of his success and never tried his hand again? Gene Tunney's the only one I can think of offhand.

"Junie can say anything she wants to. But the fame has gotten into her blood. Allyson's gonna be around in this racket for a long time." END

what betty lanza has done for mario

(Continued from page 52) Hollywood consensus on Mario Lanza: the young man has calmed down, doesn't get so excited any more, doesn't blow his top, seems to have matured to the point where he takes everything in stride—everything, that is, except his wife's latest pregnancy.

Moderation seems the keynote in the new Lanza behavior pattern.

Take food, for example, Lanza's traditional bugaboo. Before Mario hit Hollywood, he used to weigh anywhere from 200 to 287 lbs. Buddies who were with him in the Air Force during the war recall him as "the beer barrel who looked like a man."

"Everything about the poor guy was bloated," one corporal remembers. "His face, his neck, his stomach. He hated the military life, but once he was transferred to Special Services and began singing again, food meant less to him. I think in one month of entertaining at army camps he dropped more than 40 pounds."

Mario's great trouble has always been his tendency to gain weight between pictures. Before he made That Midnight Kiss, he dropped from 225 to 169. When that one was over, he shot back to 215. For The Toast Of New Orleans, he cut his weight down to 165. For Caruso, he weighed in at 175. After Caruso, Mario went on an eating spree, devouring tremendous orders of pizza, ravioli, spaghetti, and steak. His weight shot up to 240, and MGM burst a corporate blood vessel when it couldn't start Because You're Mine until Mario reduced to a point where the fans would recognize him.

Mario went up to Oregon and began dieting (you'll find the diet he used on page 50), and in less than three months the pride of Philadelphia was down to 157 pounds.

He returned to Hollywood and raced through the picture without the slightest trace of trouble or temperament.

When Because You're Mine was finished, everyone expected Mario to take off on one of his customary eating sprees, when he's been known to polish off 20 or 30 pieces of fried chicken at one sitting. Only this time they didn't reckon with Betty Lanza. The wife stepped in.

"Look, Mario," she explained, "there's no point in going through this off-again, on-again routine. We've been through it half a dozen times and you know what a job it is. Now that your weight is down, let's keep it that way. You start Student Prince in a couple of months, and we don't want a big hassle. So let's just continue with the same eating habits, okay?"

Friends point out that in her sweet, subtle way, Mario's wife is teaching her husband how to exercise self-control.

"She's done a wonderful job," an intimate confides, "and frankly, I don't see how. I remember when Betty and Mario first came out to Hollywood four years ago. Betty was five months pregnant, and she and Mario wanted to rent a house or an apartment in Beverly Hills. Well, that was right after the war. It was disgraceful, but everywhere they went in Beverly, the landlords would take a look at Betty and say, 'Sorry, no dogs or children allowed in these apartments.'

"You should've heard Mario. He screamed like a stuck pig. He denounced and threatened and swore, but Betty always calmed him down."

Betty herself recalls that period in her married life very well.

"Mario and I," she says, "finally rented a house in North Hollywood. An old-time comedy actor owned it. He was going out on tour. Our rent was $250 a month, and I'm telling you that's the hottest house we ever lived in. In the summer the temperature went up to 108. After Colleen was born, I wouldn't go back there. By that time, some of the apartment house owners in Beverly Hills realized that children were people, too. Mario rented a duplex apartment on Spalding Drive. Then we moved to this house."

Frankly, Betty Lanza hates the house she's currently occupying. "It's a sore spot," she says, "and I'm disgusted with it. I'm trying to find another one, but I don't like to bother Mario about it, because when he gets angry he blows his top and you can hear him in Glendale.

"I must say this, and I think it's very important. Mario has learned self-restraint. Nowadays he doesn't blow his top unless he has a good reason. And they've learned that at the studio, too. They used to think that Mario was just being temperamental. But he's not. If he gets angry, he has a reason. If he wants a certain musical conductor, it's because he knows that with that conductor the picture will turn out so much better."

Lanza is the first to admit that he isn't a diplomat. He still believes in speaking his mind, honestly, quickly, and forthrightly, but today you could never get him to say some of the things he said two years ago or even last year.

Samuel Goldwyn was persuaded to attend a competitor's picture that starred a dashing young movie hero, the idol of millions of bobby-soxers. "Wasn't it a swashbuckling performance?" the competitor asked at its conclusion.

"Yes," agreed Goldwyn, "but it buckled where it should have swashed."

Bennett Cerf in This Week

By way of illustration, he told a reporter last summer that "at my age, Caruso was nowhere, nohow, nothing. I don't think I'm as great a singer as Caruso, because you never think you're as good as your idol, even though others may say you're better. But at 29, Caruso used to crack on a high B-flat, and I have a record to prove it . . . Sure, I haven't sung in the Met (Metropolitan Opera House) yet. But the day I do, all hell will break loose the way it did in pictures. The world hasn't heard from me yet. Wait till I develop."

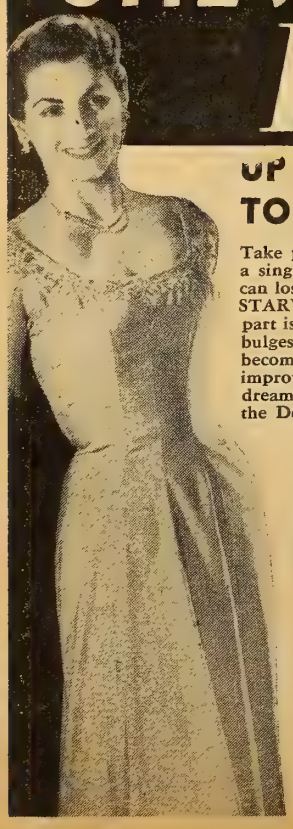
The Mario Lanza of 1952 doesn't talk that way any more. He's lost none of his confidence, none of his faith in the greatness of his future, but he realizes that he's far from the perfect singer he hopes to be.

"Nobody knows better than I," he says, "how far I have to go. I know I'm not ready yet, and I know all about the different criticisms concerning my voice. They say I punch too much, that I force the tones, that I have a tendency to swallow some of the notes, and that sometimes the tones lack resonance.

"A singer can go nuts listening to all this stuff. What I try to do is follow the advice of musicians I respect, of conductors and great voice teachers.

"After I finish The Student Prince I have two more pictures to do. Then I hope to go to Italy to study and tour with an opera company."

The plain truth is that Mario Lanza does not regard himself as a motion picture star. In his own eyes he is a tenor who has had the God-given opportunity of popularizing operatic themes for the masses.



Some of his enemies insist that he places himself above advice, but as Betty says, "He listens every minute, even though he gives the impression that his mind is in Philadelphia." (Continued on next page)

Last year, Dr. Peter Herman Adler, the conductor of The Great Caruso score, was asked how he felt about Lanza.

"Mario went to Hollywood," he said, "and Hollywood has been his Frankenstein. The pressure he is under is tremendous, always having to put up a front. His voice is not settled yet. He knows he has come up too fast, and he feels insecure. For this he overcompensates by boasting and showing off. There is still time. Ten years with the right opera company and no one could compare with him. But who can expect him, after being a star, to go back to learning?"

But Mario Lanza has gone back to learning. Five nights a week you can find him at home, studying and singing the rare and neglected operas of Verdi, Bizet, and Wagner. And always, of course, there's the woman behind his work.

As for the boasting and showing off and battling, those, too, are rapidly disappearing from Mario's conduct. So far this year, the only serious argument he's had has been with Nicky Brodsky, the Hungarian composer of "Be My Love."

Nicky composed some new tunes for The Student Prince, one of which is entitled, "I Walk With God." Mario didn't like certain passages and asked Nicky to change them. And though they're old friends, they fought bitterly.

Betty was the peacemaker as usual. "Now this is just childish," she said. "You're both like a couple of stubborn brats. Mario isn't trying to ruin your song, Nicky. You know better than that. And really, Mario, how can you say you won't sing it. Why, it's a beautiful song."

They finally agreed to compromise. When you hear Mario sing "I Walk With God," you'll know that it was Betty's tact that saved the tune.

Since Mario has developed this new maturity, there has been much talk that MGM will never let him go, that the studio will dangle such a lucrative contract in front of his pen that Mario will find it irresistible, sign on the dotted line, and never get to Italy.

Mario's original contract, as you probably know, called for him to receive $15,000 for his first picture, $25,000 for his second, and $35,000 for the third, and so on up the ladder until he reached a maximum of $75,000 per film.

Instead of paying him $15,000 for his first film, That Midnight Kiss, MGM paid him $25,000. He got $50,000 for his second, and $100,000 for The Great Caruso, which will probably gross $19,000,000.

Money doesn't mean very much to Mario. "I love to sing. I would sing if no one ever paid me a red cent. I'm determined to go to Europe and study. When I make my debut at the Met, I want to be prepared."

The Monday-morning quarterbacks, however, still insist, despite Mario's talk, that he will never leave Hollywood.

"When his contract is up," one producer says, "they'll tell Lanza to name his own figure. They'll point out to him that through motion pictures he can make the world more opera-conscious than ever before. They'll tell him that once he leaves the country, his following will taper off. I agree that the guy has settled down of late. But let's face it. It takes will power to give up a million bucks a year. And I don't think that Mario at this point is ready to assume the role of the mature artist who knows where he's headed."

What this producer forgets is that Mario Lanza has a wife who knows very well where her husband is going in life.

"A year or so after our third baby is born," Betty says, "we'll be on our way to Italy. You can count on that." END disenchanted so soon?

(Continued from page 33) we're happy, that's not news. They gotta have news, so right away our marriage is on the rocks. Don't you believe a single word of those lies.

"We've had a few disagreements, which to my way of thinking is a very good thing for any marriage. You get to understand your husband that way. He speaks his mind, and I speak mine. Vittorio is no Casper Milquetoast. He says what he feels like saying. So do I. Suppose we don't see eye to eye about something. Right away, does that have to become a Federal case? All right, we did have an argument in a restaurant. So what? Wasn't anything serious. I don't even know what it was all about.

"I think this phony report about our marriage got started because of what took place at MGM before Vittorio left for Mexico.

"I'm going to tell you the truth. So help me! You can check with anyone. This is what happened. The day before Vittorio was scheduled to leave for Cuernavaca with the Sombrero company, I came on the lot. I don't have to tell you how anxious I was to go to Mexico with him. I even took a suspension. I turned down The Number over at 20th on a loan-out.

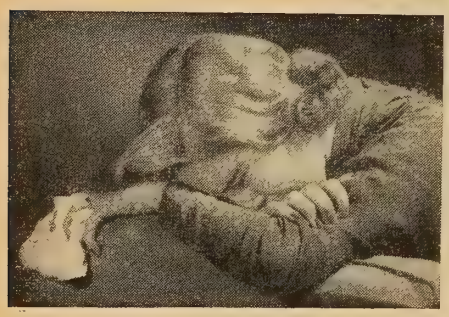
"Anyway, I was on the set watching him. Someone came over and told me that Farley Granger was next door, on the set across the street. They were shooting I Love Melvin with Farley and Debbie Reynolds. I hadn't seen Farley for some time, so I said to Vittorio, 'I'm going over to say hello to Farley.' And I went.

"I guess Vittorio blew his top. 'I'm going to Mexico tomorrow,' he said, 'and my wife has to visit some other man.' He was angry and that's how the story started that everything was busting up. It's ridiculous."

Not too ridiculous, because deep down Vittorio Gassmann has the feeling that Shelley Winters and Farley Granger once cared for each other. Shelley herself helped foster this impression when she and Farley went together steadily for publicity purposes.

Shelley says now that she and Farley were never even engaged, that the ring Farley gave her while they were making Behave Yourself together was only a cocktail ring, "and let's face it, Jerry Wald announced our engagement. I never said anything except that Farl and I were pals. We're still pals, but certainly, we were never in love with each other."

Lots of people read the newspapers, even in Italy, and when Shelley flew into Rome last year, Vittorio Gassmann, along with thousands of others, was under the impression that she had promised herself to Farley.



As a matter of fact, when Vittorio began dating Shelley, taking her on long automobile rides outside of Rome, sending her three dozen yellow roses at a clip, dining and wining her at famous restaurants along the Tiber, his conscience began to ache like a drilled tooth.

After he brought her home and introduced her to his mother and sister, he knew he was falling in love with the American beauty, and he insisted upon doing what he thought was the honest thing. "Now," he said in his broken English, "I think only one thing to do. We must fly to Paris. Together we explain to your fiance what has happened between us." (Continued on next page)

Forgotten Anniversary?

could be YOUR FAULT!

If your husband's neglect is making you miserable, the reason may be so simple that you haven't realized it could be so serious. Carelessness about intimate feminine hygiene can bring doubt, uncertainty—even definite "coolness"—into an otherwise happy marriage, and what a shame to let this happen to you . . . when effective precaution is as simple as douching with "Lysol." It couldn't be easier!

"Lysol" has a medical background! This proved disinfectant, used in a douche, completely cleanses the vaginal canal—even in the presence of mucous matter. It kills germ life quickly, on contact. Yet, "Lysol" is non-caustic and gentle. It will not harm delicate tissues!

You need never again be guilty of offending—even unknowingly—if you remember that complete internal cleanliness is the way to counteract unpleasant odor. "Lysol" does this, helps keep you dainty!

Get "Lysol" today, at your drug counter. Use it in your douche. Be sure of yourself—secure in your marriage!

"What fiance?" Shelley asked.

"Mr. Farley Granger," Vittorio said.

"Are you kidding?" Shelley asked. "He's not my fiance."

"But in all the newspapers," the puzzled Vittorio continued, "it says that you and Farley. . . ."

Because she had by then fallen in love, Shell told Vittorio the truth. She and Farley were friends. Nothing more. They had common interests. They both loved dramatics. But as regards marriage, it was simply out of the question. She was three years older than Farley. He didn't love her, and she didn't love him. Their engagement was a publicity gimmick.

Vittorio didn't understand the meaning of the word, "gimmick."

"A device," Shelley explained, "a method to get publicity."

Vittorio nodded, and Shelley thought he was convinced. Now after the episode at MGM, she's wondering if all the free publicity she garnered with Farley hasn't become a boomerang. Certainly her husband was furious when she walked off his set onto Farley's.

The reason for this is that Vittorio is genuinely in love with Shelley.

Many of Shelley's enemies insist this is an impossibility. "How can anyone be in love with Shelley Winters?" they ask, viciously. "She talks so much that no self-respecting man would put up with her." They imply that Vittorio married her because she could get him into America and serve as his entree into Hollywood.

This is a bare-faced lie born of jealousy and envy. Shelley did not get Vittorio his motion picture contract at MGM, and he married her for only one reason. "I agree she is not a diplomat," Vittorio says, "but she is honest and to my eyes beautiful and she has a wonderful soul and a good heart and I love her; and that is why I make her my wife."

VITTORIO GASSMANN was signed to an MGM contract because he happens to be a fine actor, one of the best actors Italy has turned out in years. As a matter of fact, after Bitter Rice, the film he had made in Italy with Sylvana Mangano, was shown in the U. S., Paramount cabled one of its officials in Rome for a report on Vittorio.

The report said: "Vittorio Gassmann, age 29, six feet two, thin, 165 lbs., wavy brown hair, brown eyes, speaks broken English, other Latin languages well; father Enrico Gassmann, mother Luisa Doscana; born in Genoa, is married but separated from daughter of Italian actor Renzo Ricci; has one child, girl Paula age 7; home address # 19 Via Corsica; attended grade and intermediate schools at Tasso, studied at Roman Dramatic Academy; is best known as stage actor; has repertory company; good reputation, to date; involved in no scandals; photographs well; if overcomes language difficulty would make good character actor; opinion as to his sex appeal divided; has been married nine years; can test over here although plenty film footage available."

Once Shelley fell in love with him, Vittorio not only had a fiancee but, in addition, one of the greatest natural press agents in Hollywood. When he arrived on the West Coast to visit Shelley, the Italian actor suddenly found himself catapulted from the position of a comparative unknown to that of a celebrity.

For his part, Vittorio said little. He apologized for his scant knowledge of English—it turned out to be not so scant. He could understand pretty nearly anything he wanted to, and in turn, could always make himself understood.

When Sydney Chaplin invited Shelley to bring Vittorio over to the Chaplin Studios where his father, Charles, was making his latest film, Vittorio was grateful and courteous. He let Shelley do all the talking. At the Tyrone Power party where he was informally presented to Hollywood society, Vittorio was again shy, reserved, and polite.

After they were married and Vittorio flew to New York to star in Maxwell Shane's independent production of The Glass Wall, Gassmann, feeling more acclimated to America, more confident in his ability to earn a living here, began to assert himself.

When he felt Shelley was wrong about something, he openly disagreed. Shelley loves to argue if only for argument's sake. These forensic debates immediately gave rise to rumors that these newlyweds were unhappy.

Shelley insists, "It's a lie. What" she asks, "do we have to be unhappy about? We have a few problems. Certainly! All married people have problems. I've been married before, so has Vittorio. We know. Right now, we have two problems. One, we're trying to find a house; and two, Vittorio is afraid that his repertory company in Italy is breaking up."

A FEW months ago, Shelley and Vittorio found what they considered the house of their dreams, a small place not very far from where Betty Grable lives. "We offered $35,000 for it," Shelley says. "They wanted $42,000. We couldn't swing the deal. Just didn't have the money. Funny the way people think because you're working in Hollywood, you're making a fortune. I've been working for years, six pictures last year. Who knows how many this year? Where's the fortune?

"Anyway, let me tell you about this house. Just what we wanted but too much money. Maybe now we can swing it. You know Vittorio has a funny kind of deal over at MGM. Two pictures by the end of October. After that he goes back to Italy and does stage work with his company. Well, while he was down in Mexico on Sombrero, the studio told him that for his second picture they were going to star him in Cry, The Hunted. It's a wonderful script. I read it myself. He plays a gangster. When he got that notice, he also got notices from these actors and actresses in his Italian stock company. They wrote and said, 'You are now a big Hollywood star. We don't think you are coming back, so I guess we will find other jobs.'

"Poor Vittorio. His first love is the stage, and when he got those letters, he almost went crazy. There I was, sick. You knew, of course, that I flew down to Mexico to be with him. I did a real stupid thing. I drank some water out of a tap. You're not supposed to do that in Mexico unless you've been living there a long time. I got real sick, virus, dysentery, headaches, stomach trouble, everything. Well, there I was, and he was worried over me. Then these notices came, and he said, 'I've just got to fly to Italy. Please tell Benny Thau (MGM executive) that I only want a week off, just enough to get to Rome and back. I have to explain to these actors that I am serious about coming back.' He was all upset. I was all upset. I'm telling you, it was a hassle. I caught the plane and came back a few days ahead of him. He's flying in Tuesday, and then we're going to try to fly to Rome and back."

When Vittorio Gassmann arrived from Mexico City, following the completion of his role in Sombrero, I asked him how his marriage was holding up.

"It is in excellent condition," he said flatly. "Anything else you read, well, it is just a publicity gimmick." END

(Continued from page 42) Ella Cinders haircut, infectious giggle and an accent you couldn't slice with a bread knife. No wonder Manny thought she was a cute dish.

They'd been married a little more than a year when I was born, and two years later came my brother Julius. Pop couldn't go on acting in the United States as he had in Budapest, because nobody, not even the citizens of Brooklyn, could understand him. So he took up tailoring, and it was a rough road. We moved all the time, and Mom was always in there pitching, helping Manny in the shop. Yet she always had time to talk to us, to explain things the way a mother should.

Because I was the oldest, I was responsible for Julius, and I was all the time losing him. After I'd gone out and found him bawling on some street corner, I'd bring him home and get my hide tanned, but good. Mom was the heavy of the family and always went for the hairbrush when I committed little sins. She couldn't stand it if I didn't obey her, or if I talked back, and she kept at me about manners like she thought I was going to grow up to be president of a bank. Pop took over when I was either dishonest or careless—these were two things he wouldn't tolerate. When I lost my jacket, when I misplaced some money a customer had given me, he whipped me in a pretty manly fashion. And when I threw away the library book rather than pay the dues I owed, I thought I'd never be able to sit down again.

Spanking never bothered me too much, in a physical way. I was too used to getting my head cracked on sidewalks by the neighborhood gangs to let a little thing like a razor strap upset me. But what got me was Mom after she'd slapped me. She used to go off somewhere and cry, and even now, when Mom's talking about some punishment she had ladled out to me, she gets tears in her eyes. "I shouldn't have done it," she laments. "I should never have been so strict with you. You were so good, such a good little boy."

Poor Mom. She never knew. I was the kind of kid every neighbor wanted to kick, and in school I was a regular momzer, or goniff, which politely translated into English means a first-class jerk. Six days a week I was in trouble and on the seventh I was too tired from fighting to move. I never told Mom about the fighting; it was my carefully guarded secret. Somehow my face usually escaped getting scarred, so she didn't notice, but when I got undressed at night, my body was covered with rips and bruises. It was only a couple of years ago that Mom found out about it, when magazines first started printing stories about me. Then she cornered me. "Bernie, what is all this about all this fighting. Why do you tell people these things? You never used to fight. You were such a good boy."

Mom didn't know from nothing about me when I was a kid. If you ask her now, she'll tell you how the teachers used to stop her on the street and tell her what a model pupil I was, and how the neighbors used to remark how obedient I was. I'll tell you what she's thinking of. I'd been at a new school for two days when one teacher, who hadn't had the displeasure of my company for more than that time, met Mom at the market and, probably for lack of something better to say, told her I was a small angel. Once when I was little. Mom called me to follow her. I did it, and Mrs. Shoemaker who ran the (Continued on next page)

Reputable Products Since 1884

(Continued from preceding page) grocery store asked Mom how she trained me so well. That's Mom for you. She remembers those things, but forgets the bad things.

She doesn't tell about the time (and I've never mentioned it to her since) that she walked into a room when I had just snitched a nickel out of her purse. For a split second I had that awful clammy fear you get when you've been caught, but I decided to play it real innocent. "Hi, Mom," I said, and smiled like a cherub. When she started toward me, I braced myself for a rap across the face, and when, instead, she ran a hand over my hair and smiled at me, I turned to jelly inside. I went out afterward and bought an ice cream cone with the nickel. But I hadn't eaten any more than a couple of licks when it began to taste like acid, and I threw it into the gutter.

She conveniently forgets the times she took me to visit my rich aunt in the Bronx. I used to sit in a straight chair as long as I could stand it, while the women talked about the neighborhood. Then I'd begin whistling. It was only an introduction to my next act—a bit that used to drive Mom nuts. I'd reach out from my chair and finger the expensive ashtrays, the statuettes and the fancy lampshades that Mom thought so elegant, and pretty soon she'd stop in the middle of a sentence about Mrs. Cohen's new baby and look daggers at me. "Go on, go on, get out of here." I'd slip happily out into the streets, which for me had a charm all their own, with the summer sun baking brick and asphalt and adventure always around the corner. Later, at dinner, she'd shake her head when she told Pop what a trouble I was, and then she'd serve me a double stack of potato pancakes and stuffed cabbage.

I THINK Mom always wanted to spoil me but could never quite bring herself to it. She had a humor and a softness that I loved. I used to wake up early in the morning, sneak into their bedroom and jab Mom in the ribs, then jerk my thumb in the direction of the bed. She'd smile and motion me in. And when I jumped up and down on the saggy springs until Pop started to grumble, it was always Mom who laughed like a schoolgirl. My parents' bed in the morning was the warm sanctuary of my childhood. It was a place where no one could reach out to strike me, a place where, for a little while, I was surrounded by love.

I guess I always did have love, at home. When Christmas drew near each year, Manny and Mom split themselves wide open trying to save up enough money to buy Julie and me nice gifts. I remember the year Mom collected green stamps, box tops, orange cards, all sorts of those merchandise credit things, and finally went downtown one day and bought a complete set of electric trains. It turned out on Christmas morning that the trains were AC and our current was DC. When we plugged the cord in and the whole room filled with smoke, Mom was sorrier than we were. She just sat down in Pop's chair and held her hands over her eyes. "I'm sorry, I'm sorry," she kept saying.

Mom always was affectionate, and I reacted to it like all kids do. I remember one night they took me to a dance at the lodge. When Mom and Pop wanted to dance, I felt a twinge of jealousy. I didn't want them to leave me, but I guess, to be honest, I didn't want Mom off gallivanting around the floor, having a good time without me. I was only about three, but I sounded a lot louder than that when I hung on to her skirts and howled my protest.

MOM was always my champion and would go to any lengths to protect me. I remember when she and Pop came up to camp to visit me one summer when I was a counselor there for the Boy Scouts. Nobody was there to meet them at the railroad station, so they stood around pretty miserable for a while until I got there. I walked all the way into town from camp to meet them, because there was no car available at the time. It was a hot day, and although Mom was wearing high heels, she was game for the long hike back to camp. But before we got through town, which was little more than the railroad station itself, the local cop stopped us. "What're you doing, running around in bathing trunks?" he wanted to know. The trunks I was wearing were a lot more decent than an 1890 bathing suit, but this cop evidently had got out of the wrong side of bed that morning. He soaked me ten bucks, which was one-half of my monthly salary. Mom was standing there livid with rage. She had too much respect for the law to say anything, but if looks could have killed, that cop would have been laid out in his pine box the next day.

It hadn't been easy for Mom or Pop all along, and then we began having one trouble after another. First Julie was hit by a car and, although he wasn't hurt badly, he got a pretty good crack on the head and his lower lip and eyes were swollen for weeks. Pop's business wasn't good, like everybody else's during those years. We were living on Second Avenue between 72nd and 73rd Streets when we were dispossessed. It isn't pleasant, being dispossessed. You stand there with your mother and father and brother, out on the freezing streets, and one after another your possessions are thrown out on the pavement beside you. The crowd gathers, and your stinging humiliation makes you hate everybody. There we were, lined up on the sidewalk, Pop looking hurt and beaten and Mom's eyes blazing with defiance. I remember Julie was holding our dog and looking bewildered, and I was full of loathing for the staring crowds until somebody—I think it was the woman who ran the store next door—came up to us and said gently, "Would you like something to eat?"

I did a complete flip then, and bawled my eyes out. I hadn't known people were good like that. We were new in the neighborhood, and nobody knew us or had paid any attention to us, but, now that we were in trouble, I realized they were all reaching out to us in sympathetic understanding. I remember looking at Mom as I dabbed at my eyes, and she was standing there with a tight little smile around her mouth nodding at me as if to say, "You see, son? You see, my boy?"

AND then we moved into a condemned building down the street. Pop had his shop in the front and we lived in back. Mom and Pop slept on the bed and Julie and I on the couch. One night we were wakened by footsteps coming down the rickety stairs from the top of the building. Pop knew right away what it was. A "protection agency" had been around the week before to get money from him and he'd refused. Now they were after him. He picked up the clopper, the board used for pressing, and shouted at the top of his lungs. The thug went away, but it had us all scared. Mom was almost hysterical.

Then came the very worst. One summer evening Julius and I were vaulting the iron railings when a parade came by. We followed it, like we always did. I remember it turned off on 76th Street. I guess that's when I lost track of Julius. When I got home, Mom wanted to know where he was.

"Isn't he home yet?" I said, and something turned all cold inside me. Pop went looking in one direction and I in another, and one of Pop's friends took off, too. He came back 15 minutes later and told Mom a boy had been hit by a car between 1st and 78th.

I went with a cop to the hospital where they'd taken Julius. They wanted me to identify him, and I knew that Mom and Pop couldn't. They just couldn't. It was Julie—I was able to tell by the tooth that had been chipped when some kid had slammed his face down over the drinking fountain at school a few weeks ago. The next morning I looked after the store while Mom and Pop went to the hospital, and I was standing out in front when I saw them coming down the street. I knew then, before they were close enough to tell me, before they were even close enough for me to see their faces. I knew it from the slump of their shoulders.

From then on Mom was doubly intense in her love for me. Sometimes she'd do funny things. She'd fly off the handle if I was five minutes late. Over little things she'd get upset beyond reason. I'm glad I had sense enough to understand she was tied up inside with baling wires.

I guess if Bobby hadn't come along before I went into the Navy, it would have been just too much for Mom. But then she had another baby to care for, and it wasn't so bad when I came home on my 18th birthday and told her I'd registered. It was bad enough, though. She and Pop and the little guy came to the Simpson Street station in the Bronx to see me off. I looked out the window as long as I could see them, and Mom was still standing there, waving with one hand and stuffing a handkerchief into her mouth with the other. Mom always thought it was bad manners to show emotion in public. She'd have done anything rather than cry in front of strangers.

I was away a long time. When we were loading the sub's torpedoes near Guam and the chain snapped and hit me in the back, I couldn't write for five weeks. I didn't mention the incident in my first letter after I got well. Mom was worried enough as it was. I waited until later and then mentioned it sort of casually.

Sometimes kids do awful things to their parents, I guess. Like when I got back to New York and was finally processed out on Long Island. I went into Manhattan and phoned Mom that I was at 48th Street and that I'd be home as soon as I got a haircut. A haircut, yet. I wanted to look decent, but it never occurred to me that Mom was in a frenzy, almost hysterical, and that she wouldn't have cared if my hair was tucked in my shoes. It was a cold morning—December 19th—and it was snowing. When I rounded the corner, there she was, standing outside the store, the snow falling on the shawl over her hair. As soon as she saw me she started to scream, and I ran down the street to her and held her tight. "Mom, take it easy, Mom!" I said. She's so sensitive that sometimes I think she'll snap in two.

Then Bobby and Pop came out, too, and Pop was almost as bad as Mom, but Bobby just stood there and giggled. He was five then and I guess the strain was too much for him. "What's the matter with him?" I said, and we all laughed and felt better. (Continued on next page)

Housework Easy Without Nagging Backache

Nagging backache, loss of pep and energy, headaches and dizziness may be due to slowdown of kidney function. Doctors say good kidney function is very important to good health. When some everyday condition, such as stress and strain, causes this important function to slow down, many folks suffer nagging backache—feel miserable. Minor bladder irritations due to cold or wrong diet may cause getting up nights or frequent passages.

Don't neglect your kidneys if these conditions bother you. Try Doan's Pills—a mild diuretic. Used successfully by millions for over 50 years. It's amazing how many times Doan's give happy relief from these discomforts—help the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters flush out waste. Get Doan's Pills today!

(Continued from preceding page) Mom couldn't understand it when I took up acting. She and Pop came to see me in some of the shows, and when I'd go home at night, she'd shake her head. "Why this acting?" she used to say. "You work too hard. I don't think it's worth it all."

She almost fell apart when she learned I was going to Hollywood, and 20 times a day would ask to see my contract. She bragged to all the neighbors until I was ashamed to show my face, and she'd have gone on a lot longer if I hadn't insisted that the family come out to Hollywood to live.

They got a big bang out of my being a movie actor, and couldn't get over the fact I was meeting people they'd seen in movies back in New York. Before I met Janet, I was gradually overcoming the idea that girls were for the birds, and once in a while I'd bring one of the Hollywood dolls home with me to meet Mom and Pop.

I remember the day I mentioned to Mom that I was dating Janet. Her eyes grew wide. "Janet Leigh!" she said. "So pretty! I remember her in that picture where Glenn Ford was a doctor. Such a pretty girl. My Bernie taking out Janet Leigh!"

I didn't tell Mom right away how I felt about Janet. I didn't have to. One night Janet and I were there for dinner, and Pop had gone in the other room to take a nap. Mom looked at us for a minute and then she smiled. "Why don't you two get married?" she said.

"Josephine!" I said, and gave her my grim look. Janet made little embarrassed noises, and there was a long silence.

But Mom was undaunted. "I said, why don't you two get married? You'd be good for each other."

Writer to producer: "You're a jerk —and that's retroactive!"

Mike Connolly

When Janet and I planned to be married back east, I phoned Mom a week before to tell her. "So," she said. "That's good." She sounded like I had interrupted her ironing and that I was wasting my money anyway, as she'd known it all along.

Mom still tells about the time Janet phoned her after the wedding and said, "Mrs. Schwartz? This is Mrs. Schwartz." They get along fine, my wife and my Mom. When Manny had his heart attack not long after we were married, Janet stayed with Mom until I could get back from New York. You might think they were sisters; they're giggling together all the time. Mom insists on telling Janet all about my school crushes, about the night I took out Connie and switched to Sid Schulman's girl. Heaven knows what else she tells her. They went together to see Flesh And Fury and had to borrow each other's handkerchiefs. Mom told me they cried not so much because the picture was sad, but because they had to watch me getting belted in the ring. Janet said every time my opponent landed a punch, Mom would exhale a little puff of air along with a grunt.

I understand the only member of my family who was upset about my marrying Janet was Bobby. When Mom told him about it after my phone call from New York, he just glared. Mom tells me he thought if I got married it meant I was gone forever to some far off shore, that my family would never see me again. Fat chance, with Manny and Bobby there, and Mom's stuffed cabbage—and Mom.

FROM THE MOVIES

JUST FOR YOU—I'll Si-Si Ya In Bahia by Henry Jerome (MGM).

ONE MINUTE TO ZERO—When I Fall In Love by Doris Day* (Columbia).
Victor Young wrote this melody as the musical theme for the score of the film, and the lyrics are by Eddie Heyman, who set words to Body And Soul. It's Doris' first record in collaboration with Percy Faith, that fine conductor and arranger, who does an excellent job of teaming with her both on this side and on the coupling, the 20-year-old hit from Germany Take Me In Your Arms.

SLAUGHTER ON TENTH AVENUE—Ray Anthony* (Capitol).
This double-sided version of the famous Richard Rodgers composition is an expert, colorful performance. By the way, the MGM album entitled Slaughter On Tenth Avenue And Other Ballet Music From Motion Pictures is now available on both 45 r.p.m. and LP discs.

SUDDEN FEAR—Title song by Steve Lawrence* (King)

POPULAR

PEGGY LEE—*Just One Of Those Things (Decca)
Peggy's star is rising again; her collaboration with Gordon Jenkins and the first big hit record that they produced, Lover, was followed by the news that she's been signed to play opposite Danny Thomas in The Jazz Singer, a role originally set for Doris Day. Chances are that within a year Peggy will be one of the top stars both for Decca and for Warner Bros.

SAUTER-FINEGAN ORCHESTRA—Doodletown Fifers (Victor).
Here's one of the most original and exciting new bands in a long time. Bill Finegan has written many of Tommy Dorsey's most popular arrangements, while Eddie Sauter performed similar chores for Benny Goodman. Now they've formed their own band to express some completely new ideas—unusual sounds, such as piccolo, odd percussion and other effects that you don't hear in a regular dance band.
The most striking of their first four tunes is Doodletown Fifers, based on a traditional melody (originally called Kingdom Come). But you'll probably be delighted with the other side, an unusual and very pretty version of Azure-Te.
Another release by the band is Stop! Sit Down! Relax! Think!, an odd little ditty, paired with an old song called Rain. With more original ideas like those of Sauter and Finegan, perhaps the bands will really come back to the place of eminence now monopolized by the singers.

FRANK SINATRA—*Tennessee Newsboy (Columbia).
This is a fast-tempoed, exciting side by Frankie, one of his best records.

When Lana arrived on the Nevada side of Lake Tahoe early in July, she said, "Cheryl and I are just up here for a vacation. I have six weeks off between pictures. Then I'm going back to work." And with that she rented the lakeside cottage belonging to Justice of the Peace McCleery.

She said nothing at all about a divorce from Bob Topping, merely moved into the cottage with Cheryl and a maid, and the very next day took off with her daughter for a little fishing.

In order to prevent unwanted visitors and the usual bevy of curiosity-seekers from invading her privacy, Lana had a sign put by the road which read: "Justice of the Peace no longer lives here. Has moved into Zephyr Cove."

This didn't stop the newspaper boys however, from calling on Lana to see if she had actually come to the lake to fish.

"By God!" one reporter recalls. "She was fishing, baiting her own hooks, too. Didn't look like a movie star. In fact, with that haircut, didn't even look like Turner. I asked her who her lawyer was, and she said, 'I don't have any.' I thought she was kidding, but you know what? She was on the level. I checked all the lawyers in Reno, and they said no, they weren't handling her divorce. Of course, she could have some lawyer in Las Vegas. Clark Gable tried that, but we found out about it. No, she was on the level with us. Surprised the devil out of me, too, because we'd been warned that she was very uncooperative with the press."

But that was the old Lana.

Take, for example, the terrible impression the actress created in England a few years ago when she sailed to Europe on her honeymoon trip with Bob Topping.

When the Mauretania docked at Southampton, the British reporters called on Lana, and she came up with such ridiculous remarks as, "I am a woman with a price on my head. You've no idea how ghastly it has all been. I have been the target of malicious gossip. I guess I know why. It is a result of the war and all this talk about Communism. People wanted something else to talk about and so they turned to me. . . I don't see why all this should be the price of fame."

Then David Lewin of The London Daily Express asked Lana if it were true that she had spent $30,000 on her trousseau. "Just a few dresses," Lana explained. "That's all. Maybe ten dresses and four suits and perhaps ten pairs of shoes. You see, Mr. Lewin, this is all an exciting holiday for me. I shall just love seeing your England, all the history and all that."

The day after Lana hit London, a press conference was held at the Savoy Hotel. Through no fault of her own, Lana was an hour late. When she finally arrived, she didn't know what to say. "I love the English country," she began. "The grass and trees are wonderfully green, and the tulips particularly. And all the flowers are terribly beautiful."

The following day the British Press Association issued a statement denouncing Lana's interview as "the strangest and most humiliating press conference yet held in Britain."

There was no one to explain to the English reporters that Lana was scared stiff, inwardly terrified, that here was a girl who knew precious little about English history, who, in her own awkward way, was trying to act in a manner she felt was expected of her.

So they took her over the coals. But let Lana return to England in the future, and she'll have the press eating out of her hand. Because, in four years, Mrs. Turner's little girl has come a long, long way.

Up at Tahoe, by way of illustration, she greeted the reporters graciously, said, "What can I do for you, boys?"

When the photographers asked for a few pictures, she posed cooperatively.

When they said, "How about you and this Lamas fellow?" she said frankly and honestly, "We're interested in each other, of course, but he's still married and so am I. I can't talk about wedding dates or anything like that."

"When do you plan to sue for divorce?"

IT HAPPENED TO ME

My sister and I were shopping in a Pittsburgh department store and I saw an article I liked which had no price tag. So I asked a man (who I thought was a clerk) talking with some girls near the cash register, if he could tell me the price of it. He said, "No, I couldn't, honey," and everyone started laughing. To my surprise, I was addressing Donald O'Connor.

"Isn't that why you're up here? To get a divorce?"

"No, I came up with my daughter for a vacation. I've been working hard this year, finished The Merry Widow and . . ."

"Is that the one with Lamas?"

"Yes, and also The Bad And The Beautiful, and then I go back to Culver City in August to start another one."

"Who's your lawyer?"

"Neal McCarthy."

"I mean your lawyer in Reno."

"I don't have one in Reno."

"Is that on the level?"

"On the level, boys."

"But that doesn't mean you can't stay up here at the lake for six weeks, establish your legal Nevada residence, then hire a lawyer to sue for you later. You can do that, can't you? Like Rita Hayworth. She was up here for six weeks. Even though she went back and made a picture, she can come up here again and get her divorce in half an hour. You can do the same thing."

Lana admitted the possibility of killing two birds with one stone, of enjoying a six weeks' vacation and simultaneously establishing a legal Nevada residence.

"There's a story out," one reporter said, "to the effect that your husband Bob Topping got a divorce in Mexico and is secretly married to some model. Any truth to that?"

"Not that I know of," Lana said. "And I'm sure I would have known."

When the interview was over, the newsmen agreed unanimously that Lana was a plain-talking, straight-shooting girl, nothing phony, no affectation, no hedging—a welcome contrast to Maureen O'Hara, another Lake Tahoe visitor who refused to discuss her divorce with any member of the press, a welcome contrast, in fact, to the Lana Turner of the Topping era.

LANA also used her vacation as a time for reflection. Many afternoons, when Cheryl wandered down the beach at Zephyr Cove to the old Dixie Show Boat moored a hundred yards away, Lana flopped down on the porch, looked out at the lake and the scenic snow-capped Sierras beyond and meditated on her past and her future.

One afternoon an old friend dropped by for a visit. He asked the little actress—Lana's not very tall, only five three—to explain her bad luck with men.

Lana has said many times that when she was Hollywood's night club queen, "I liked the boys and the boys liked me... I liked Victor Mature and Greg Bautzer and Tony Martin and Peter Lawford and Tyrone Power and Turhan Bey and Howard Hughes and Bob Hutton. I liked dancing with them and partying with them and, sometimes, kissing them."

The friend knew all this, but he wondered why, with all of Lana's experience, she had succumbed to such unstable characters as Artie Shaw, Steve Crane, and Bob Topping.

Lana smiled and shrugged. "Where husbands are concerned," she said, "I just haven't been a very good picker." But as she spoke, a serious look came into her eyes as if to say, "But I'll be darned if I make that same mistake again."

It is strange that after so many millions of words have been written about Lana's marriages, so few people really know the truth. Perhaps it's because the truth is so unbelievable.

Lana, for example, married Artie Shaw, her first husband, because Greg Bautzer, her fiance, broke a date. Lana was only 19 at the time, and Bautzer was supposed to take her out on a birthday party. He broke the date, however, whereupon Artie Shaw who had never been out with Lana in his life, phoned and asked for the pleasure of her company. In a fit of pique, Lana said yes. A few hours later she was Mrs. Artie Shaw. After the ceremony, Shaw kissed her for the first time.

The marriage was a catastrophe. Four months with Artie and Lana wound up in a Santa Monica hospital with an A-number-one nervous breakdown.

You would have thought Lana had learned her lesson. But as she herself says, "I'm lonely unless I have someone to love."

Next, it was Steve Crane with whom she eloped. This was tragic, because at the time Lana married Steve, the tall, dark, wavy-haired lover was still married to a girl named Carol Kurtz, so that his marriage to Lana was illegal.

You all know the story. Lana quickly had the marriage annulled, then found herself pregnant. Six months later she and Crane drove down to Mexico and got remarried in order to legalize the birth of their child.

To date, the only richness Lana has had from her many ill-advised love affairs, the only reward, the only anodyne to all her heartbreak has been her nine-year-old daughter, Cheryl, who happens to look very much like her father.

WHATEVER charge may be made against Lana, and many have been made, no one has ever cast any doubt about her ability as a mother. Lana is a wonderful mother, and between her and Cheryl exists an understanding that is rare in the annals of mother-daughter relationships.

Lana never talks down to Cheryl. She treats her as an equal. "Cheryl," she would say up at Tahoe. "What do you think about fishing this afternoon?" or "Cheryl, why don't we just sit around and gab?" or

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Last year my husband took me to the Puerto Rican legislature to see the ceremony in honor of José Ferrer. José had come to his beloved Puerto Rico to receive from our Governor the Oscar he had been awarded by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences for 1951.

The Senate and House of Representatives paid homage to José, interrupting their work to greet him in the name of the Puerto Rican people. The President of the House made a beautiful speech which he dramatically ended with these words:

"José Ferrer: Let me open the doors of the soul of this family and allow me to take your hand and deposit it in the heart of the people of Puerto Rico."

José rose, his features contracted with emotion. As he shook hands with the President, thunderous waves of applause filled the Capitol. The audience rose and clapped for several minutes.

It was a great moment for José. The great actor of America could not act at this moment, nor could he hide his feelings. He burst into tears, covered his face with both hands and dropped into his chair, sobbing like a little boy.

Elsie Alcaraz de Irizarry

"What do you think of this dress, Cheryl?"

Some of Lana's friends say that, unwittingly, the actress is spoiling her daughter by being overly protective and by showering her with affection and gifts.

This is partly true, but it's most understandable when you realize that the chances are very slim that Lana will ever successfully give birth to another child.

She has no RH factor in her bloodstream, or what the doctors call RH negative. Most men are RH positive. A pregnancy under these circumstances nearly always results in a miscarriage. While living with Bob Topping, Lana suffered two miscarriages.

One of the reasons for Lana's breakup with Bob Topping was his inability to get along with Cheryl.

"I'm sure he likes her," she used to explain, "only Bob just doesn't know how to approach the child. They can't seem to find a common level. Bob's a reserved sort of person. Cheryl's like me. She needs love and affection. Bob just can't bring himself to be understanding with her."

There are many other reasons, of course, but one main reason why Lana loves Fernando Lamas is because Fernando and Cheryl manage to hit it off. Lamas has a daughter of his own in South America.

FOR a while everyone expected that Lana, Fernando and Cheryl would spend the summer vacation together.

Only something very important happened. Nicholas Schenck, president of Loew's Inc., had a talk with Lamas and asked the studio officials why the young man couldn't be cast in the gangster role opposite Elizabeth Taylor in The Girl Who Had Everything.

"His English isn't too good," Schenck was told. "He talks with an accent. He comes from Argentina. The gangster in this picture is an American."

Schenck thought for a few minutes. "You fellows ever heard of Frank Costello?" he asked. "He comes from Italy, and he talks with an accent. That's no handicap for someone who's supposed to play a gangster."

Nicholas Schenck is the major domo at MGM. His suggestions carry the weight of law. In a matter of minutes, Fernando Lamas was called and came rushing to the studio.

"Fernando," he was told. "You're off suspension. We're putting you in one of the best dramatic roles of the year. This is a great opportunity. You're going to star with Elizabeth Taylor in The Girl Who Had Everything.

Ever since he finished The Merry Widow, the film in which he met and fell in love with Lana, Fernando has been afraid that MGM would limit him to musicals. Here was the meaty dramatic role he'd been clamoring for. He couldn't possibly resist it. He accepted at once. That night he got through to Lana on the phone. He explained what had happened, how he couldn't possibly visit her.

"I understand," Lana said. "And I'm very happy for you, darling." And she meant it, too, because Lana wants Fernando to develop into a movie star of great magnitude. She realizes the very obvious danger to a marriage that exists when the wife is so much more successful than the husband. "The more successful Fernando is," she says, "the happier I will be."

Lana and Fernando planned to get married in September and then honeymoon in South America, where Lana would meet Fernando's folks and his daughter.

These plans were predicated on the assumption that Lamas would be able to secure an annulment—a divorce is difficult since he and his wife are both Catholics—and Lana would be able to shed Topping.

The schedule hasn't run true to form. To begin with, Lana is determined to regain some of the money she claims to have sunk into her marriage with Topping. "I was a patsy for that one," she declares, "but I'm not going to get stuck."

The chances are, of course, that she will. Topping's in no hurry to get a divorce. He can hold out until Doomsday.

Lana, on the other hand, may go ahead with her divorce, should Fernando succeed in obtaining his annulment, regardless of the financial settlement. She is certainly in no position to sue Topping for divorce on any other grounds but mental cruelty.

So, willy-nilly, she finds herself in the embarrassing position of being a victim. She's had to pay over $100,000 for the doubtful privilege of having a very unhappy marriage. She will also have to pay for the divorce.

GRANTED that Lana somehow secures her freedom from Topping and marries Fernando Lamas, how good are the chances that this marriage—it will be Lana's fifth in 13 years—will succeed?

The chances are even-money, fifty-fifty, which are the best odds Lana has ever had.

Fernando Lamas is a Catholic who regards matrimony as a very holy and lasting institution. Lana has never been married in a church before, so that in the eyes of the Catholic Church she has never been really married. Lana was baptized a Protestant, but as a little girl in Sacramento she was sent to a parochial school run by the Dominican Sisters, and for a while she actually insisted that she wanted to become a nun. "I considered myself a Catholic," she confided to friends.

In all probability, Lana and Fernando will tie the knot in some Catholic rectory after the priest obtains the proper dispensation for the marriage of a Catholic with a non-Catholic.

I predict that such a marriage, if it comes into being, will last, unless the husband wants it to be dissolved. If this marriage goes on the rocks, it will not be Lana's fault. Here's a girl who is determined to make her next marriage her last. She has seen through the folly of being a night club queen, a party girl and a Hedonist. She knows that elopements rarely work out, that marriages have to be carefully planned, that living with a husband calls for tact and understanding.

All that Lana wants out of life right now is a happy home. She has a healthy, well-adjusted daughter, a successful, rewarding career. All that's missing is a loving, lasting husband.

In Fernando Lamas, it's even-money that he'll fit the bill. That is, if he and Lana can arrange to get together matrimonially. The odds on that are also even-money.

END

In Warner's Technicolor film version of Where's Charley all the principals take part in a cute routine at the end of which there is what amounts to their coming out for bows, with their names flashing on the screen. Warners years ago used to do something like this at the end of every one of its pictures, and I think the audiences liked it. Very often you take a liking to a particular performer and would go to see him again in another movie, if you knew who he was. This is a simple and satisfying way of building new screen personalities, and it is a definite service to the audience.

so, in order to get into a motion picture studio, he took a job as an extra. That was 19 years ago. The first day on the job he met another extra, a tall, rugged exhibitionist named Jimmy Stewart, who was later to change his name to Stewart Granger. These two became fast friends. "Oh! We used to have a gay time of it," Wilding recalls. "Jimmy was bitten by the acting bug and went off to a drama school in Birmingham. He became a leading man in a repertory company, while I got a job in a chorus in London. Eventually, Jimmy moved to London where we used to play a little poker together. He taught me about hunting and yachting, and I became godfather to his son, Jamie. I was also his best man when he was married to Jean Simmons."

Mike Wilding first came to the serious attention of American movie-goers by virtue of his roles in Under Capricorn with Ingrid Bergman and Stage Fright with Jane Wyman.

Actually, Wilding had first met Liz when she came over to London to co-star with Robert Taylor in The Conspirators. "She was very lovely even back then," Mike says, "and I was shocked to learn that she was only 16. I said to myself, 'That's a pretty precocious girl for 16.' There she was playing marriage scenes and carrying them off magnificently. 'They must grow up very quickly in America.' That's what I thought."

Henny Youngman says a near tragedy befell Dorothy Lamour when she went on a Navy battleship in her sarong. She visited the galley and a near-sighted sailor reached for a dish towel.

Earl Wilson in The New York Post

Last Summer Liz returned to England to star in Ivanhoe. "You've no idea," Wilding says, "how much she'd matured during the interim." Mike, who was separated from his wife, fell in love with the brunette beauty. He kept telling himself that she was much too young for him, but each time he took her out he was startled to discover that Liz was much more profound, had much more erudition, was just as much interested in art (her father is an art dealer) as he was.

When Herbert Wilcox and Anna Neagle, for whom he'd made The Lady With The Lamp in London, asked Mike to exploit the film in the U. S., he grabbed at the chance. He flew to Hollywood, checked in with the Stewart Grangers as a house guest and for the next six weeks paid Liz Taylor ardent court.

Mike Wilding is a man who's made and spent a lot of money in his day. He has a few British pounds salted away for a rainy day, but governmental restrictions limit him to 35 pounds when he leaves Great Britain.

While he was wooing Liz in California, Wilding, by his own admission, was "dead broke." "I could hardly afford," he recalls, "to buy Liz a hot dog and a coke, much less buy her an expensive engagement ring. One evening when we were out somewhere in Bel-Air, I cupped her face in my hands and said, 'You know, darling, you should wear sapphires to match your eyes.' The following day she rang me up and asked me to meet her at the jewelers. She asked me to choose between two sapphire rings. I told her which one I liked best and she bought it. After her divorce became final, she announced our engagement.

"It's a funny thing, you know, but Liz is very much like Jean Simmons. They could be mistaken for sisters. I remember one time, when I was at the Granger house, I saw a girl I was sure was Liz. I sneaked up behind her and put my hands over her eyes. It wasn't Liz at all. It was Jean. They both have the same kind of girlish beauty, and they're both extremely intelligent."

After Liz and Mike were married, much was made of the fact that Liz who had paid for her engagement ring, had also paid for the honeymoon. Here again, Wilding was limited to 35 pounds by his Government, a little more than $100, for his Continental honeymoon.

"There's absolutely nothing I can do about Government restrictions," Wilding says. "We used Liz's dollars. When we got back to London, I naturally took care of all the expenses. Yes, I realize that there's been a good deal of talk about our marriage, but I guess that's the case with most show people. Many persons think Liz and I are mis-mated, that I'm an adult and she's a spoiled, self-centered child. Either they don't know or don't realize that Liz has crossed the Atlantic Ocean 32 times. She's a very well-traveled young lady and very worldly, too. I don't see how anyone can hold her youth against her. Most of her life has been spent in the company of adults. Her knowledge of art, for example, is surprising, and she's actually been to places most other girls only read about."

IMMEDIATELY after their marriage, it looked very much as if the Wildings had a large problem to face. Liz earned her living in Hollywood, and Mike worked in England. That one was resolved very neatly when MGM signed Liz to a spanking new contract at $5,000 a week, $500 of which goes to her mother, and then, because the studio knew that Liz would never leave London without her husband, offered Mike a contract at $3,000 a week.

When Liz signed her contract, she was two months pregnant. She returned to Hollywood alone because Mike wanted to enter the U. S. as a resident alien with a quota number, which means he can stay here indefinitely.

Mike arrived in Hollywood a few weeks after Liz did and moved into her apartment on Wilshire Boulevard. "Almost immediately," he says, "Liz and I began searching for a house. They're expensive in California, aren't they? Everyone wants $90,000 or $100,000. Who has that kind of money? Certainly I don't. Liz and I've been looking everywhere, but then she had to stop when they began shooting her picture. I'm searching around myself, and I do hope I come across a good buy. Liz wants to get into a house and prepare everything before the baby comes. . . . Becoming a father scares me. I mean babies are so small, and they're always gasping and carrying on. I'm sure we'll get used to it though. I haven't signed my contract at the studio yet, but I will any day now. This is a wonderful country and Liz and I hope to live in it for many, many years. We're very happy."

So much for Mike Wilding. As for his bride, she is at the moment of this writing hard at work with Lana Turner's boy, Fernando Lamas, on The Girl Who Had Everything. By the time this article appears in print, the picture will have been finished, and Liz will be living in a house of her own.

Undoubtedly her health will be better, too. During the first few months of her pregnancy, Liz was intermittently ill. She has just bought a half dozen maternity dresses, and in her own words, "I've never been happier in my life. Michael and I love each other very much and no matter what anyone says, this marriage will last and last and last." END

two wives—two lives

By now, it's impossible to imagine Dean Martin working without Jerry Lewis, as impossible as it would be to conceive of—say—a Martini without gin. For eight hours or more out of every day, they are more than a comedy team, they are irrevocably wedded in show business.

Yet every night, when their separate Cadillacs roll away from whatever Hollywood studio is recording their latest antics, Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin get a divorce. They go home to private lives that are as far apart as their professional ones are close. Until they meet again next morning you'd hardly suspect that Jerry and Dean knew each other.

Their homes are only eight miles apart, but there are no ruts worn in the road between. The Martins and the Lewises don't mix socially. When they show up in public, it's such a Hollywood surprise that, as Patti laughs, "You should see the flashbulbs pop!" They have a completely separate circle of friends. In fact, recently when a certain Hollywood couple who liked all four started showing up at both places, Patti Lewis and Jeanne Martin told them frankly, in effect, "One of us or the other."

ALL of this is suspicious and baffling to a town like Hollywood, where studio and social lives are normally as wrapped up together as worms in a can. So naturally, there have been repeated rumors of glacial relations between the Martin and Lewis households, and there probably always will be.

Actually, however, Jerry and Patti Lewis and Dean and Jeanne Martin are all extremely fond of each other. The point is that they want to stay that way. The curtain which separates their personal existence is in part an instinctive reaction to their thick-as-thieves career partnership. Also, it's deliberate, a harkening to advice given them long ago by Olsen and Johnson, the famous Broadway team of zanies. "You boys have a great future," O. and J. promised them, "if you remember just one thing—keep your wives apart!" Luckily, Dean and Jerry remembered that counsel and luckily, too, they married girls with heads level enough to realize its wisdom.

But there's another reason why Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis, close as freckles on a redhead's nose at work, lead private lives as far apart as the poles. Outside of the fact that both are family men, and like golf, they have almost nothing in common. In tastes, interests and temperaments, Dean and Jerry are strangers. In every way you can think of, the terrific twins are a study in contrasts. And nowhere are those contrasts so striking as in the two different homes and home lives they head for when the day's funny business is over.

Dean Martin's house is a white modern colonial on the Beverly Hills side of Westwood. The Martin manse could be the residence of a successful banker, lawyer or business man. Inside, it is formally and somewhat impersonally decorated; there is nothing whatever to suggest that its owner is half of Hollywood's Number One Box-Office team. The lone momento of fame Dean treasures is a worn clipping, which testifies that he and Bob Crosby once won a minor golf tournament at Bel-Air.

On the other hand, the rambling, ranch-type Lewis place, out in Pacific Palisades, could belong to nobody but Jerry. It's cluttered with records and trophies of his career. In his study, on floor-to-ceiling bookcases and in cupboards, is parked a collection of every script, every still, every radio transcription, recording, magazine article, newspaper clipping and ad concerning Martin and Lewis, carefully preserved since they began.

Its main value is a reassuring reminder for Jerry Lewis that what has happened is all actually true. Jerry needs reassurance, every day, every hour. On his desk sits a pen stand, modestly engraved, "To Jerry—the nicest guy I know—Jerry Lewis." And beside that rests a miniature ivory monster, with toad face, lizard arms and shell back. Beneath it the question: "Am I for real?"

DEAN MARTIN has no such agonizing questions, and that is the essential difference between the two screwball partners. Dean, a true Italian, lets life run through him. His motto is, "What's to be will be." Jerry, with all his sensitivity, drive, glooms and elations, is as restless and skittery as a water spider, while Dean's as relaxed as a tabby cat.

When Dean comes home from work, he peels down to his shorts, stretches out on the living room carpet, props his head on a pillow and stares at television until he decides it's time for a leisurely shower. Then he's ready for whatever the evening offers, and that is rarely planned. If it turns out to be an Italian dinner at Guy and Angela Crocetti's, his dad and mom's house, a session of poker with Sheila and Gordon MacRae, Desi Arnaz and Lucille Ball, or the Hollywood Legion prizefights, he's not worked up about it or in a rush. To Dean his home is a haven, a place to relax, eat and sleep and enjoy his family.

Jerry, by contrast, never leaves his work. He even keeps a notepad on the dashboard of his Cadillac and busily scribbles memos driving to and from work. At home he's constantly on the phone about this and that studio matter. He writes everything down methodically and worries about it until it gets done. Sometimes he lets Patti stretch him out on the sofa and massage his feet, and that's as near as he ever comes to relaxing while awake. Usually he gulps a handfull of vitamin tablets, eats a fast dinner, and plunges into some project. That's what home is to Jerry—a perpetual project. He's forever making something, collecting something or correcting something. And he's fussy as an old maid about it all. Everything around his house has to be in apple pie order.

Jerry's favorite pastime takes place in an elaborate playhouse which, with his swimming pool, swallows up most of his back yard. Over the door hangs a sign, "The Gar-Ron Playhouse" (named after his two sons, Gary and Ronnie). Inside is one of the most completely equipped fun areas in Hollywood—a combination night club, movie theatre and luxury lounge. Deep stuffed chairs and spacious sofas are scattered about a huge fireplace. In one corner there's a glittering cafe-size bar, with every known glass on the shelves and every kind of drink, hard and soft. There's a projection booth [illegible] a screen that appears and disappears at [illegible] touch of a button. Tucked away in wall cupboards are all sorts of games.

There are television sets, record machines, a piano and full set of drums—even a slot machine. But all of this—except the screen and projector—Jerry himself seldom uses. What he heads for every free hour is a miniature film laboratory behind the play room. There, with the best cameras, the fanciest lenses, cutting and recording machines—$25,000 worth—he makes movies; he writes, acts, directs, photographs, cuts, splices and dubs. And he's happy as a clam at it.

The Gar-Ron productions have already put out three terrific parodies of Hollywood hits—The Reinforcer (The Enforcer), Fairfax Avenue (Sunset Boulevard) and A Spot In The Shade (A Place In The Sun). They're so good that Hal Wallis wants Jerry to make some for commercial release. Nothing would please him more. He'll make a movie at the drop of a suggestion. For Dean's last birthday, he filmed one called Happy Birthday To A Beautiful Bambino.

On this project Jerry has the help of the Gar-Ron group, the hub of the Lewises' social life. It includes Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh, Marge and Jeff Chandler, Danny Arnold, Mona Freeman, and a host of studio and business associates. It does not include Dean Martin. He's never been in a Gar-Ron movie, turned a crank, or shifted a stick of scenery.

QUIZZING THE STARS

What are your innermost convictions about women and cosmetics, perfumes, etc.?

SCOTT BRADY: Like perfume—no makeup.

KIRK DOUGLAS: Wonderful in their place. But even a lily can be overgilded, and this a girl should avoid.

ROBERT STACK: Take these easy, girl.

OBVIOUSLY, opposites like Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin require two different types of wives to keep them happy. Patti Lewis and Jeanne Martin are both smart, attractive women, but hardly sisters under the skin. Jeanne has flaxen hair, alabaster skin and blue eyes, revealing her German-Norwegian ancestry. Her features are cameo-cut and delicate, her manner serene. She looks best in high style, striking clothes. She could step right out of the pages of Vogue and, in fact, once was a model.

Patti, on the other hand, is cute, tanned, brown-eyed, with poodle trimmed black hair. She's vivacious, high humored and bubbling. Patti, who has a tomboy figure, looks swell in tennis shorts, blouse and a jaunty cap. On a Westwood street near UCLA you'd spot her for a campus co-ed. Yet she never went to college. Her original name was Esther Calonico and she was the daughter of an Italian coal miner. She grew up in Detroit, sang and strolled with an accordion for ten years before NBC and then Ted Fiorito spotted her. She was with Ted's band when this crazy, comic kid named Jerry Lewis came to the Fox-Downtown Theatre, too. He courted her by scrawling "I LOVE YOU" all over her mirror with her own lipstick when she was out of her dressing room. He proposed by leaving a pair of carved soap baby shoes on her table with the note, "Let's fill these!"

Besides love, a home and children, Patti Lewis has given and still gives Jerry a vitally needed confidence and assurance of reality. A line from the song, "Patti," which Mack David and Jerry Livingston wrote for Jerry and his best girl, expresses it: "When I take off my greasepaint and put the mask down, I return to a world that is real . . ." Jerry Lewis' real world is Patti.

Her function as Mrs. Lewis is more than being a wife. Patti is Jerry's chum, sweetheart, sister, mother and coach combined. Without her he'd flop around like a kite without a string. Because, in contrast to Dean, Jerry's dependent. He's a woman's man—or boy, rather.

He calls Patti "Mommy" and she calls him "Booby." She bakes chocolate chip cookies for him to steal. She sends clear back East for air-expressed cartons of "fudgecicles," a frozen confection he can't buy in California. Patti always has to go to the doctor with Jerry, who's a confirmed hypochondriac. She recently held his hand through $7,000 worth of dental work, a marathon ordeal, because she knew he'd run out of the place without her. Jerry shows off for Patti like a boy does for his mom. When a $20 bill was big money with him, Jerry used to change it into singles, so he'd have a roll to flash for Patti. He won't sleep in a room alone anywhere and begs pathetically for Patti to accompany him on every trip. Because she knows how much he needs her, she usually goes.

Jeanne Martin has a far less complex role to play as Dean's wife. Jeanne is purely and simply a man's woman, the decorative feminine complement to an uncomplicated man's man. She's only 22, while Dean is 35. Four and a half years ago she was Jeanne Biegger, a Miami, Florida girl. She was attending the University of Miami and was chosen, because of her striking beauty, as Orange Bowl Queen. In fact, it was while celebrating this annual Miami festival that she met Dean, who was singing at the Beachcomber, and their romance began. Jeanne then was barely 18.

UNLIKE the two-babes-in-show-business marriage of Patti and Jerry, Jeanne and Dean's romance was simply the case of a young girl falling head over heels for an older man. At first Dean scared Jeanne, and her family and friends. To them he looked like a "big, suave gangster, even to the slick, black hair and suede shoes." He had a past. He'd been a croupier in gambling palaces, a prizefighter and knockabout crooner. He was still married and the father of four children. But there was no questioning once Jeanne and Dean fell in love. She came to California with her mother and stayed until Dean got his divorce from Betty, his first wife. In those days, when they stepped out on the dance floors around Hollywood, Jeanne well knew gossips were whispering about the cradle-robber with the wife and four kids at home. But it didn't seem to matter. Their love wasn't the moonlight-and-roses kind. And when things were all straightened out amicably all around, they were married.

The Martins entertain in a big way only about twice a year. When they do, all Dean worries about is if there's enough to eat and drink in the house. Where Jerry Lewis makes "a production" of almost everything, Dean makes no fuss about anything. For example, Jeanne found the house they own today and brought Dean around to inspect it. He took a quick look. "You like it?" he asked. Jeanne said she did. "Swell. Buy it," said Dean. That was the week before the Martin's baby boy, Dino, Jr., was born. Jeanne took on all the confusion of moving in the face of that impending ordeal, then calmly entered the hospital.

By now Dino is heading for his first birthday cake and is a husky, relaxed, beautiful bambino, just like his dad. With "Cap," their giant German shepherd, that's the extent of the Martin family, although (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) Dean's four children, ten, seven, six and four, live only three blocks away with his ex-wife. Recently they moved there from Hollywood so Dean could see them more often. All four are thriving, perfectly adjusted children, and relations between the two households couldn't be more amicable.

JERRY's every bit as devoted a father as Dean, but, being Jerry, he's a very different type—the anxious, fretting kind of dad. Both his sons, Gary, seven, and Ronald, almost four, are thriving specimens (Gary's a small carbon copy of his pop and Ronnie, their adopted boy, has the map of Ireland in his face). But Jerry always finds something to get anxious about, even if it's only a haircut. Recently Patti had the barber crop Gary's mop down to a summer butch. It upset Jerry terribly. "I have to wear a crew," he said. "You don't want him to look like me, do you?"

Gary's an honor cadet at Black-Foxe Military Academy, where Jerry now goes every free Friday to watch him in dress parade, nibbling his nails lest Gary fall out of step. Gary also plays a red hot set of drums, sings like a boy Crosby, and idolizes his dad. But a while back he developed a slight nervous facial twitch. That gave Jerry something real to worry about, and one night at dinner, frayed after a hard day's work, Gary twitched and Jerry forgot himself. "Stop that!" he shouted. Gary burst into tears. Jerry turned white as a sheet and ran out of the house.

Four hours later a friend called Patti. Jerry was there, he said, and out like a light on the sofa, exhausted and fast asleep. He stayed all night, ashamed to come home. Next day he called Patti. "Bring Gary to the studio, please," he begged, "I've just got to see him. I could cut my tongue out for what happened last night."

But Jerry was more than just contrite. He went to the doctor and found something he hadn't remotely suspected. His boy was suffering from emotional insecurity. "He idolizes you," said the child expert, "but he's afraid of you. You're too busy with your own affairs. You shut him out. He's got to see more of his dad, got to pal around with you. Oddly enough, it was almost the exact story of one of Jerry Lewis' pictures, That's My Boy.

Since then Jerry has been working hard—at relaxing—for his son's sake. Baseball bats and mitts, boxing gloves, BB guns, and all sorts of things clutter up the once tidy back yard out on Amalfi Drive. The therapy has worked wonders with Gary, and it's making a new man of his old man, too. Jerry's started a softball team with Dean, supported by Tony Curtis, Jeff Chandler and a few other Hollywood diamond flashes, called, of all things, "The Martin and Lewis Aristocrats," and Gary's the mascot.

WHILE professionally Martin and Lewis still loom as indissoluble as Gibraltar's rock, whenever they start to buddy up as a foursome, well . . .

One weekend last winter Patti and Jerry and Jeanne and Dean tossed caution to the winds and all drove up to Apple Valley. Bright and early Jerry, who'd brought his guns along, talked Dean into a hunting hike in the bleak hills. Jeanne and Patti stayed behind at the inn.

But the sight of two specks scrambling recklessly among the distant rocks made them curious. "Let's go see what the boys are doing," suggested Patti. So they mounted some nags and jolted up the trail. Just as they got there, Jerry cried "What's that?" and pointed his artillery at a rustle in the sage.

"Hey—don't shoot!" yelled Dean, "The horses . . ." But it was too late. A report like a block-buster shattered the air, and rocks flew in all directions. Patti and Jeanne's horses not only bolted, they bucked all the way downhill to the inn with the girls hanging around their necks for dear life.

Dean couldn't hear for two days and Jerry nursed a sprained shoulder for a whole week. As for the big game? All that remained of him was a spot of grease and a few hairs. It had been only a scared cottontail rabbit.

Something like that always seems to happen whenever the Martins and the Lewises get together. So maybe they're smart to keep strictly apart — if only as a measure of self-defense. END

the good mystery

(Continued from page 63) my family felt as I feel now. My own family, the family which I am starting, is a divided one, you might say, yet we are not conscious of it. My husband, Geary Steffen, is a Catholic. A devout Catholic. My little boy, Geary, will be brought up as a Catholic and so will the baby I am now expecting. There was no quarrel about this, not even a lengthy discussion. I reasoned that since I didn't have any particular religion, but rather an attitude towards life and the origin of life, why should I be selfish and deny my husband the satisfaction of having his children brought up in a manner which would give him peace of mind? It does not disturb me at all that they will be Catholics. It would disturb him if they were not. That's all there is to it.

We agreed that when the children are old enough, they could decide for themselves, but actually such an agreement is never necessary. When anyone gets old enough to think and feel in a mature way, he or she must come to many decisions; our children will come to theirs whether Geary and I want them to or not.

I am grateful to Geary for his understanding way with me and I know he appreciates I can only be as I am. Some mornings when he gets up at dawn for an early mass I forget myself and shake my head sleepily as if to ask, "How can you do it?" He laughs and always adds, "I'll say a little prayer for you anyway." And after he leaves, I may lie half-awake and direct inward accusations. "Maybe you just don't like to get up and go to church, that's what your whole philosophy amounts to," I tell myself. And then I may very seriously go over the whole matter again. The answer is always the same. I cannot be a Catholic. I cannot be a Methodist. I cannot be a Hebrew or a Buddhist or a Mohammedan. There is a Someone or a Something working toward an unknown goal, and in this I believe.

It must not be thought that I was kept from religion as a child by my family, or prevented from going to church. On the contrary, I was permitted to go to any church, and I went to a number of them. I went to many different Sunday schools. I found that I liked them all and was really disturbed by only one thing—by any sermon or quotation which tended to indicate that only this or that church was the true one. This would always make me think of the people I had seen in other churches and fear for them. To this day I cannot bring myself to accept the thesis that any people are denied God, no matter how they seek Him.

I have some Catholic friends, and because my children will be Catholics, I was disturbed one evening when these friends held that since Catholicism was the first Christian religion, it represented the only true sacred path. But by luck, I happened to meet their own priest one day and in a discussion with him was happy to learn that he did not feel this way at all. I do not remember his exact words now, but they were roughly these: "If you are a believer, you are a believer. If you believe in only a table, for instance, it is something. And if a table is all you can believe in to the best of your belief, then it is everything. And remember it is as you believe that is important, not only what you believe."

I don't know where I am going, but I do believe we can all go, and I do feel that we should act here and now as if there is a place to go . . . and we should try to be good enough to deserve a welcome.

When I was a little girl going to Sunday School I learned to pray, of course. I still pray. My prayer is usually the one everybody knows from childhood, "Now I lay me down to sleep . . ." When I first learned this prayer I was under the delusion that Jesus Christ and God were one "man." Later on I learned that they were "different" men. And still later on (and comparatively recently at that), I finally understood them as they are defined in the Bible. It may be that these changes in identification which I had to keep making may have had something to do with my present thinking. I am not sure. It was disturbing. I never stopped my habit of praying, but I know this about my prayers today: I never pray in a crisis, I just pray every night because I have always done so. Indefinite as such prayers may seem, they mean something to me and I am certain I will never stop praying.

There is a man I have known for some time who used to try to convert me to Catholicism. In a number of talks we came to no conclusion more overwhelming than that I could not take any such step. He knew this when he left me. Shortly afterwards he sent me a beautiful crystal rosary. I was deeply pleased. Whether I was right or wrong about my beliefs, the sending of this gift indicated that he considered them worthy ones. At least this is how I interpreted the gesture and I feel it was what he meant. By my thoughts I had pleased him; by his thoughts he had pleased me. I might not, to his way of looking at things, have proper faith, but he wanted to show that he, at least, had faith in me.

ONE day I was driving home feeling worried and annoyed about some personal matters, and in order to get my mind off them, turned on the car radio. Five minutes later, as so often happens, I suddenly realized that I was still wrapped up in my troubles and hadn't paid the slightest attention to the radio. Now I listened, and it seemed to me that a minister was delivering a sermon. But he was making no divine references . . . he was talking of people. He was saying that we have it within us to overcome fear and worry and we can overcome it only from within—not by distraction (as I had attempted to do), not by seeking amusement (as I had also attempted to do), nor by turning on a switch (which I had certainly tried to do by flicking on my radio). The puzzle of happiness, he said, is no puzzle; it is solved simply by learning to live with ourselves.

He went on in this quiet and strangely comforting way, and I realized that almost all he said applied directly to me. What had bothered me before was something I could do nothing about; even the slightest brooding about it was not only needless but took up time and thinking that might better be applied to personal questions and situations I could do something about. This is no new and startling piece of philosophy, I know. But it is surprising how we can all do with refresher courses on even the most elemental rules of living. And as I thought about this, I was struck by the fact that my help had come from a man who, while dedicated to show people the way to know God, realized that they must first learn the way to know themselves.

This is perhaps what I am doing now—learning to know myself. If I do it, well, maybe I will get to know Him . . . and I am sure that if He is the Good Mystery I sometimes feel He must be, He will forgive my doing it my own way. END

(Continued from page 46) back East. On one occasion, when Don went stone broke, Kirk loaned him a few dollars. Aware that Alley was a talented but frustrated decorator, Donald promised that if ever he should hit the big time, one of his first moves would be to hire Kirk as a decorator.

Donald's been true to his word.

A few months ago, for example, he came home from the studio one night and found Gwen and Alley with their heads together in earnest conversation.

"Well, kids," Donald asked with a patience born of experience. "What's it gonna be this time?"

Gwen thought for a moment. "We think we'll keep the furniture," she explained. "But the color scheme in the house just has to go. We're changing it to match my hair."

For the next six weeks, Gwen supervised the redecoration while Alley contributed his professional help.

As usual it was a question of mind over mess. Donald did his best to ignore the painters and upholsterers who swarmed through his little six-room house. He overlooked the fact that chairs had been moved, draperies pulled down, whole rooms re-arranged. When Gwen and Alley started yakking about valences and louvers, the conversation got too enigmatic for the versatile song-and-dance man, and he spent the rest of the afternoon swimming in the pool that he and his brother, Jack, built.

"It's rough while they're redecorating," O'Connor admits, "but once the job is done, I can breathe easily—at least for a few weeks."

"That's an exaggeration," Gwen protests, "and you know it. We've only changed the decor in this house five times in the last six years."

To friends, however, Gwen O'Connor confides, "our poor piano's been stripped down and refinished so many times that it behaves like a jalopy." She also admits that both piano and dining room table have passed through four phases. They were mahogany first, then natural, then antique white. Now they're a grey wash that shows the (Continued on next page)

Gwen is extremely honest and straightforward when it comes to explaining why she likes to re-do her house at least once a year or so.

"I'm young," she says, "and I have a restless nature, a lot of curiosity and boundless energy. What I'd love to do best is to travel around the world with Donald, but he simply can't relax on a trip. Last year we made a tour of England and Scotland. Don lost 20 pounds. He just doesn't like foreign living. His idea of a vacation is to run ten full-length movies at home or go up to the mountains with a few decks of canasta cards. Put him on a boat or a plane, and he starts losing weight. That experience with him on tour in Britain taught me a very valuable lesson. Instead of going away for a change of surroundings, I now change the surroundings at home. It keeps me busy and Don happy."

PRACTICALLY the only thing about the Donald O'Connor house that's remained the same since they bought the place is the exterior. It's been painted, of course, but the essential structure has never been altered, except for the addition of a master bedroom which became necessary when Donna was born..

The house resembles a British cottage with its high-gabled roof and neatly shuttered windows. As of this moment, it's painted coral with a white trim. Coral and green are Gwen's favorite colors. That's why she planted so many lush tropical flora out front. The total effect of the exterior with its bright contrasting colors is that here's a house that might well be used on a travel poster inviting tourists to visit Bermuda.

The interior, subject to change, of course, is currently furnished in modified French contemporary with great accent on color.

"The last time I did the house," Gwen says, "everything was in antique white. Mother came to visit us and said, 'Why, Gwen, you look washed out against that background. It doesn't go with your auburn coloring.' Mother was right, which was why I had to correct things."

Gwen's correction this year consists of strong greens, purple, coral, and royal blue, all tastefully applied.

The ceiling in the living room, for example, is painted coral. The walls are purple. A fabric made up in this same color combination covers the enormous sectional couch and is repeated in the swag of the draperies. The remainder of the furniture in the room is off-white or antiqued-mirrored so as not to compete with the dominant tones.

The den, the dining room, and Donna's nursery are all predominantly green, while the O'Connor's master bedroom is done in royal blue with accents of red corduroy.

Occupying a small home, Gwen is always faced with the problem of making the house appear larger than it really is. She also must find additional storage place for Donald's constantly increasing possessions. (At one time the master of the house had a collection of 400 guns.)

Gwen and decorator-friend Alley employ a number of clever tricks in the solution of their space problem. For one thing, they extend the same grey carpeting from the dining room, through the foyer, the living room, and right into the master bedroom. This creates an optical illusion of expanse, since the eye travels from one end of the house to the other without a break. That's a good tip, should you want to make your apartment look larger than it really is. Use the same color and kind of floor covering in most of the rooms.

Gwen O'Connor's use of mirrors is also deft and smart. Their judicious location can give a room depth as well as a feeling of space. One wall of the master bedroom is lined with Donald's wardrobe closets. (He has enough clothes to outfit an army.) The three double doors of these closets are mirrored so that when they're closed they provide one solidly mirrored wall. When opened, they serve as utilitarian full-length dressing room mirrors.

Similarly, the wall that surrounds the living room fireplace is mirrored. The rest of the room is reflected in it and looks twice as wide as it actually is.

In order not to cut up her limited floor space, Gwen has stuck to a few large simple pieces of furniture rather than a flock of small cluttery ones. She's painted some of her furniture the same color as the walls so that they give the impression of merging with the background. In their bedroom, for example, she had the nightstands and two bulky chests of drawers finished in royal blue.

THE storage problem has always been an acute one in the O'Connor household. When Donna was two years old and began to need a closet for her own things, Gwen had to move her dresses out of her daughter's room. She had no place to put them, so she and Donald agreed to add a walk-in closet. It's a model of neatness and organization, at least on Gwen's part. Her clothes hang on racks two feet deep, and each type of article has a different rack. Blouses hang in one line, slacks in another, and so on. Gwen's shoes are arranged in neat rows, with her hats placed in plastic boxes above eye level. Deep drawers hold lingerie, sweaters, belts, bras, and pocketbooks.

As for Don's clothes, he has some strange habits. When he undresses at night, he folds his pants neatly on the floor and leaves them there, in the middle of the room, along with the rest of his things. He objects to anyone touching them. When the pile looms so large that he can't walk around it, he hangs his clothes in his closet. This is a habit left over from his vaudeville touring days.

"I know it's a funny kind of idiosyncrasy," Donald admits, "but Gwen has some funny habits, too. She's so darn clean that she won't prepare food in a kitchen unless it looks as sanitary as a hospital. All our kitchens must be white."

Gwen admits this, but, to take the clinical look away from glaring white kitchen tile, she's papered the ceiling and walls in a red and green Americana wallpaper and replaced a modernistic breakfast nook with a Pennsylvania Dutch table and pine bench. To go with her early American antiques, she then had a cabinet man build some hanging apothecary drawers in which she files her household bills. The total effect is warm and homey.

For Donald's money, however, the best room in the house is the bathroom, and for that he gives all due credit to his wife. Gwen has some very decided opinions about bathrooms. She feels they should be small, warm, friendly, and intimate. This is why she had the one O'Connor bathroom carpeted with an old-fashioned rag rug and furnished with a hamper, washstand, and wastepaper basket made of early American pine. The traditional toilet fixtures of porcelain, chrome, and marble are conspicuous by their absence.

"The next time Gwen does the house over," Donald says, "I'm gonna request another bathroom. The one we have now is just too good to share with anyone."

The way Donald O'Connor is going these days, both on screen and TV, he should be able to afford seven different bathrooms, one for each day of the week. END it's only money . . .

(Continued from page 82) springboard a Lucy script, because both are positive, colorful characters, domestically harmonious (their rift back in '44 was the result of career separations and lasted barely long enough for them to make a date and make up), but rugged individualists and very human indeed. In fact, it was Desi's dashing Latin recklessness that stunned Lucille when she first saw him and her own round-eyed, calm, Nordic look that made Dez's tropical heart soar out of sight.

Lucille Ball is half French, half Irish and nobody ever accused either nationality of being dumb, dull or demure. In person Lucy looks and usually acts as calm as a turtle, but actually she packs the spunk of a terrier. From the first time she served that impromptu cup of coffee to Katie Hepburn, through the day she quit a lush MGM contract cold because she didn't like an agent's deal. Yes, even to her bold plunge into TV when "television" was still a dirty word around Hollywood studios, Lucy has proved her spirit. Desi's a carefree cavalier too, from the word go. So in smaller ways around Desilu Ranch there are constant tugs of war going on, the funny kind that grow into TV shows if they don't watch out.

Mostly Lucy and Desi's clashes represent differences of latitude. He's a warm weather boy and Lucy's a snowbird—the essential difference between Santiago, Cuba, and Jamestown, New York. As a result, most family hassles revolve about such meteorological matters as heat and cold, sunshine and shade. Any visitor to Desilu Ranch can spot the determined battle of thermostats that goes on. Lucy flips it to cold and Desi back to hot until the heating system breaks down.

The California sun that Desi worships absolutely shrivels Lucille. While Dez tans as dark as a grand piano, Lucille's one of those baby-skinned posies to whom an actinic ray is deadly. She never tans, only turns painfully as pink as her hair and swells like a circus balloon. She's had two sunstrokes already, and once, when she first came to Hollywood and tried to acquire a fashionable tan on her apartment house roof, she wound up being delirious for two days.

This sun touchiness and a decided tendency toward mal de mer cramps the Arnazes' family fun aboard The Desilu, Desi's 34-foot cabin cruiser where, next to the ranch, he'd rather be than anywhere. They keep that family yacht down at Newport Harbor where already Desi, a terrific rod and reel man, has snagged six marlin out of the blue water. But when Lucy walks aboard the Desilu, all she does is head for the rail, and as for fish. . . .

First time she ever dropped a line into the gulf stream off Florida, where Desi bought his boat, Lucy snagged a big one and pulled him right in. "This fish is real cute," she bubbled, calling Desi, "nice and big, too."

Desi took a look, grabbed his knife and cut the line fast. The nice, big cute fish Lucy had pulled up between her bare knees was a 70 pound shark!

Lucy's greatest maritime adventure, however, took place in Pacific waters and that's a whale of a story. She was snoozing peacefully below on a bunk one afternoon as Desi chugged back from Catalina Island when a bump from below raised her, boat and all, right up in the air. Scrambling on the careening deck she saw a mammoth bull whale pleasantly rubbing his back on the Desilu's keel, and a hundred other Moby Dicks spouting around the boat. Desi gunned the motor and finally escaped, although since then he's had to talk fast to get Lucille on any Desilu cruises. When they go to the harbor, she stays in an apartment with Lucie Dee-Dee at the Villa Marina, on terra firma.

But no matter where they are or what they're doing, something with a comedy-drama family twist always seems to fasten on to Lucy and Desi Arnaz. They're just that kind of a pair. Once, for instance, when Desi played an engagement at the famous Flamingo in Las Vegas, Lucy trotted along to keep Desi, who loves to gamble, away from the gaming tables. With wifely fervor she decided to demonstrate at the dice table how you always lose. The lesson wasn't very convincing. In six passes of the bones, Lucy won $18,000.

Even at the great and long-prayed-for event of Lucy Desirée's birth, Lucy got wheeled off at the wrong floor and prepared for the wrong kind of operation before she could convince the nurses there was some kind of mistake. And Desi got lost in the hospital halls and couldn't find out what was going on or where until it was all over. So you can see, whipping out an I Love Lucy idea once a week is easy. But playing the show is not.

Lucille and Desi work hard, far harder together than they ever did apart. What they actually do is make a two-reel movie for 38 straight weeks of the year. Each Tuesday morning they tackle a new show, walking through it with script in hand. By that evening they have memorized all the lines. The next day they rehearse and the next they shoot it—in one session, without a stop. Cutting, editing, dubbing and printing by technicians takes up the rest of the time until you see I Love Lucy on your TV screen. Lucy's and Dez's biggest problem at the weekend is wiping the last playlet out of their minds so they'll be fresh to begin a brand new one the next Tuesday morning. That's where life on the ranch comes in.

Nathaniel Benchley writes that Alfred Hitchcock wants to make a pic involving a chase across the sculptured faces at Mt. Rushmore, with the heavy hiding in Lincoln's beard while the hero scrambles across Washington's schnoz . . .
Mike Connolly

Show talk is strictly barred at Desilu Ranch. To relax and clear their noggins, Desi and Lucille switch abruptly to a concentrated session of home life, although you can't honestly call it relaxing.

Desi calms down by pounding something together. With all those out buildings already constructed, there's really little left that the old home place needs for comfort. Yet Desi can always find something. Last year some lumber strips were left over from the new nursery wing for Lucie Dee-Dee. In no time at all Desi had raised a lath house.

"What's that thing?" his wife inquired.

"A lath house."

"What's it for?"

"I don't know," answered Dez.

Lucille is just as furious a weekend housekeeper. Her letdown therapy is to scrub everything inside the house like a Deutscher hausfrau. As a result, everything is so spic and span that recently when some workmen came to install a new all-steel kitchen, they had a rough time telling which was the new equipment and which (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) the old. Despite her official v.p. title at Desilu Productions, Lucy has no idea about the business end of their TV project; Desi handles all that. But around the house she's the supervising major domo, by force of habit from the years when she held the place together. Today Lucille can't go to sleep at night until she's made the rounds, checked all the windows and doors, put out the cats and seen every pup safely bedded in his box.

The Arnazes play every bit as hard as they work, but practically always at home. Their idea of a good time is to invite everybody they know—and they know hundreds—to swarm over the place for some kind of a feast and fiesta, usually a riotous costume party. "Western Costume would go out of business if it wasn't for us," Lucille grins. Not long ago, they sent out invitations far and wide to show up at Desilu Ranch dressed "as you dreamed you were after a chop-suey dinner at midnight." People arrived as geisha girls, Hong-Kong street walkers, hatchet men, opium slaves and all kinds of things for as weird a pipe dream as a poppy ever produced. Some of the guests went authentic, dyed their bodies yellow and couldn't whiten out for weeks. But everyone had a good time, you can bet, as they have at the Gay Nineties balls, Barn Dances, Baby Parties, Hawaiian Luaus, etc., etc., that Desi and Lucille have organized to keep the fun ball rolling.

Dorothy Lamour is a fast girl with the noblesse oblige, as costume designer Miles White would be quick to testify. White wheeled onto the set one day aboard a bright red scooter with "The Dottie L" boldly lettered across it in white paint. Dottie seized the first opportunity to return the compliment; the other day she bought a brand new Cadillac, and had lettered on its door, in elegant script, "The Miles W."

Dorothy Kilgallen in The Journal-American

At these rallies Desi, in chef's cap and apron, presides happily at one of the cooking spots which, like telephones, are scattered all over Desilu Ranch. He's a frustrated chef and the only Hollywood husband in captivity who actually had a kitchen shower given in his honor. Some of the Arnazes' very special friends—Kurt and Ketti Frings, Gordon and Sheila MacRae, Dean and Jeanne Martin, Ed Sedgwick, Eve Arden and many more—collaborated on this event and it's been well worth it. On every kind of elevator grill, electric rotisserie, charcoal pit and barbecue Desi forks up or ladles out some kind of ambrosia whenever he gets the chance.

Both Desi and Lucille are ardent family lovers and there are enough kissing kin around to make it interesting. Lucille's mother, Desirée, her sister Cleo and family, brother Fred and his and Desi's mom, Lolita, all live reasonably near and Desilu Ranch is the rallying point. Birthdays, anniversaries, Easter, Thanksgiving and Fourth of July bring them out to Northridge for the pig, turkey and general festivities of the season.

"When Desi builds a fleet of motels on the ranch and all the family moves in for keeps, that's when I'll be happy," says Lucille, and she's not far from meaning it.

With all this going on right on their favorite five acres, it's small wonder that the Arnaz's aren't spotted very often at Hollywood's glamor mills, or buzzing around in its social whirl. Partly, this is because they're both too wrapped up in their all out jobs with I Love Lucy, partly because neither is the Hollywood "society" type and partly because both Lucille and Desi have certainly had their fill of night clubs, show places and cases. Their private New Deal has no place for them now. From force of habit, stemming back to her glamor girl days, Lucille is still a sucker for new evening gowns, but they're strictly for the moths. Actually she prefers to dress in casual clothes. After the last Academy Award banquet she buzzed the doorbell of her director friend, Ed Sedgwick, who's been like her pop since she was a Goldwyn Girl.

"Can I come in and fry a chop?" Lucy asked. "I'm hungry." Ed said to help herself in the kitchen and complimented her on the sleek creation which Mitchell Leisen had designed specially for the occasion. "Pretty isn't it?" agreed Lucille and then zipped open a small beach bag she had carried in the car. In it were slacks, a sweater and a pair of bedroom mules. She walked into the bedroom and changed. "Whew," she grinned. "I'm glad that's over!"

Oddly enough, too, although she's usually seen in a bandanna, clamdiggers, blouses and barefeet around the ranch house, Lucille collects glamor jewelry, aquamarines of stunning shapes and mammoth sizes. In a way it's a sentimental kick, however, since aquamarines were the first gifts Desi gave her.

Before very long, it looks like Lucie Dee-Dee will have a sister or brother, Master Desiderio Alberto Arnaz y De Acha IV, if it's a boy. Early last summer, after winding up those 38 straight Lucy shows, Lucille and Desi got off the hook for a well deserved vacation. They planned a cruise to Hawaii and Lucy even went for a thousand dollars worth of sports clothes to keep the tropical sun off her tender skin.

But just before they packed to board the Lurline, Lucy had that woozy feeling again and the doc said uh-huh, she could officially slip on her halo again. So the Arnazes had to settle for a fast week at Sun Valley, where Desi happily snagged rainbow trout, while Lucy sat around the hotel feeling green and goose pimply, and happier than ever to get back home.

When the stork pecked their vacation plans to pieces, a certain girl friend of Lucille's heard the news and called her up to console. "You poor, poor thing," she began, "you've worked so hard and now just when you start on the trip of your dreams you get pregnant! It just isn't right!"

"Oh, isn't it?" came back Mrs. Desiderio Alberto & Co., with the red-headed emphasis she usually reserves for traffic cops and other menaces to her home life, liberty and pursuit of happiness. "So I need a dream trip, do I? Listen, this year all my dreams are right here on the ranch, and they're dreams I've waited for years to come true. Now tell me, what's poor about that?"

Well, practically nothing, when you level down on it. And besides all this and Heaven too, there are Hollywood movies when Lucille and Desi care to make them, or can tear themselves away from television long enough.

By now I Love Lucy is back on the air waves, and so is little What's-It's-Name Arnaz—although strictly under wraps, of course. Unless plans have been changed at the very last minute, Lucy Ball's blessed event is being written right into her TV show, week by week. It's still a little early to say just how the thirty million customers feel about this. But as far as Mr. and Mrs. Desiderio Alberto Arnaz, Consolidated, are concerned, it's by far the best script idea that's come out of Desilu Rancho so far. END

movie reviews

(Continued from page 24) nor affair are a careful production and some real casting imagination. Both dancer Bettis herself (who does no dancing but makes worldly comments on the passing scene with telling effects) and Alexander Scourby (as one of the most restrained slick and intelligent scoundrels of recent films) help made Affair In Trinidad sometimes seem more important than it really is.
Cast: Rita Hayworth, Glenn Ford, Valerie Bettis, Alexander Scourby—Columbia.

THE FOURPOSTER

Stanley Kramer continues to build his reputation as a producer of unusual pictures with The Fourposter, one of the most unusual he has presented. It has only one set and only two characters. The bed of the title symbolizes the married life of the Emersons, a Manhattan couple played by the real-life husband-and-wife team of Rex Harrison and Lilli Palmer. It remains in their room from the 1890s through the '30s—through love, laughter, sorrow and the sometimes subtle in-between relationship that the expression "husband and wife" implies. To get away from the static quality that would usually result from the use of only one set, there are a number of animated "bridges"—clever and often lovely drawings that explain what has happened between live-action scenes. Best of all, the novelty of these unusual factors never interferes with the story line. They have all been integrated so beautifully under Irving Reis's smooth direction that while one realizes the story is being told in a different way, one's attention is still held more to the story itself than to the mechanics of how it is being shown. Unfortunately, that story is often overmelodramatic where it could have been effectively dramatic; it is sometimes untrue to its characters (at least to Abby, the wife, whose temporary decision to leave her Johnny is just not believable of the woman she has earlier been shown to be). But if the film is not the great one it might have been, it is still something to see—a motion picture that shows again that movie-makers can find and conquer new frontiers if they are imaginative enough. And in the playing of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison it proves that it's the quality, not the quantity, of the cast that counts.
Cast: Rex Harrison, Lilli Palmer.—Columbia.

THE MERRY WIDOW

If there is little that is really merry about this remake of Franz Lehar's famous operetta, at least it is mostly light-hearted. Not taking the classic status of the original too seriously, the scenarists have up-dated the libretto a bit, substituting a farcical touch here and there for some of the romance. Most of these liberties help justify the casting of Lana Turner in the title part, for the emphasis is now on "light" rather than on "opera." She plays the American Widow Radek, whose husband made millions in the U.S. after emigrating from Marshovia, a mythical nation in the Balkans. Marshovia is on the verge of national bankruptcy when the story begins, and the country's king plots to persuade the widow to pay a visit and so to impress her with hospitality that she will pay his treasury's bills in return. His little scheme succeeds initially, and when Lana arrives the king forces one of his courtiers, a wide-ranging romantic named Count Danilo (Fernando Lamas), to pay her court. A comedy of errors ensues. Danilo mistakes Lana's friend and paid companion, Una Merkel, for her, and Lana in turn gets hep to the plot. Angered especially because she was particularly taken with the gentleman, Lana packs up and sets off for Paris with her friend. Naturally Danilo follows (the king tells him to, under penalty of death). Taken with the lady himself, he is still mistaken about which is which; one appeals to his heart, one to his and his country's pocketbook. While Miss Turner is believable enough as the widowed 19th century belle, singing and dancing are not her forte, so the memorable melodies suffer somewhat on the feminine side. Lamas, however, is such a dashing Danilo and sings and dances with such verve that he more than makes up for her shortcomings. The light touch, the tongue-in-cheek approach do the same for the show.
Cast: Lana Turner, Fernando Lamas, Una Merkel, Richard Haydn.—MGM.

ONE MINUTE TO ZERO

One Minute To Zero makes the audience a front-seat observer at the Korean fighting front, and that in turn makes the movie much more harrowing than most battle films. All this, one realizes, is going on today. Not only are actual shots of the Korean war incorporated into the picture, but they are well integrated with the staged action, so that the net effect is often that of a documentary telling the story of the problems faced in the Far East by soldier and civilian alike. Two colonels, Robert Mitchum, representing the Infantry, and William Talman, representing the Air Force, are military observers at Seoul when the invasion from the North begins. They team up to help evacuate American civilians to Japan, and naturally that leads to the beginning of a love story—a situation, in this case, less artificially arrived at than most. Ann Blyth, as a United Nations representative, refuses to leave; Col. Bob lifts her bodily into a plane piloted by his pal. Later Bob, too, is shipped to Japan after he has been wounded while fighting off an early North Korean attack. In Japan he asks her to marry him and is refused. She is a war widow already and can't face having it happen again. But both are soon back at the front, Bob as a regimental commander, Ann as part of a U.N. refugee team, and their paths cross again, this time in a dramatic wartime scene. Mitchum, having used all other means and failed, is forced to order shots at a milling mass of refugees, at least half of whom are Reds in disguise. Ann mistakes his order for sheer slaughter and fails to understand the agony he went through in reaching his decision. Gradually, as the fighting continues, she comes to understand, but what will happen to her colonel is left a question. The love story of One Minute To Zero is of minor importance, however, as are its numerous minor faults. Most of this motion-picture has the impact of a dramatized newsreel and should be looked at as such.
Cast: Robert Mitchum, Ann Blyth, William Talman.—RKO.

QUIZZING THE STARS

What do you notice about a girl when you first meet her?
SCOTT BRADY: Her figure, of course.
KIRK DOUGLAS: Her eyes. They are the most expressive thing about a woman's face. And then her mouth, to see what kind of disposition and temperament she has.
ROBERT STACK: Her, uh. Okay—eyes and mouth.

V. U., Cody, Wyo.

A. Hope is 50, Crawford 44.

Q. Which Hollywood stars earn the most money? —R. E., Memphis, Tenn.

A. The comedians Martin & Lewis, Hope & Crosby.

Q. Is it true that Loretta Young was once very much in love with Spencer Tracy? How many times has Loretta been married and how many children does she have?
—B. N., New York, N. Y.

A. Loretta was once very fond of Tracy. She has been married twice, once to Grant Withers, at present to Tom Lewis; has three children.

Q. What's the real reason Betty Hutton left Paramount after twelve years?
—H. Y., Detroit, Mich.

A. Wants to choose her own stories, make them independently with her husband.

Q. What are the salaries of Piper Laurie and Tony Curtis?—I. F., Chicago, Ill.

A. $1,000 per week each.

Q. I've been told that Lana Turner's father was a bootlegger who was murdered in San Francisco. Has his murder ever been solved?—T. R., Fresno, Cal.

A. It is still recorded as unsolved.

Q. Can you name at least three successful Hollywood marriages?
—R. S., Holyoke, Mass.

A. Alan Ladd's, Ricardo Montalban's, Bill Holden's.

Q. Did Fernando Lamas separate from his wife because of Lana Turner?
—Y. T., Denver, Col.

A. Fernando and Lydia Lamas were already separated when Fernando met Lana.

Q. Can you tell me who Janet Leigh's first two husbands were?
—G. R., Merced, Calif.

A. Kenneth Carlyle, Stanley Reames, both non-professionals.

Q. Is Jeff Chandler sour and surly off screen? I understand he is. Am I right or wrong? —C. H., Lansing, Mich.

A. Wrong.

Q. Is Barbara Stanwyck in love with Jean Pierre Aumont, or is that a publicity romance? —D. E., Miami, Fla.

A. They say they are just friends.

Q. Is Kathryn Grayson leaving MGM because of her feud with Mario Lanza?
—B. U., Boston, Mass.

A. No feud between these two; Miss Grayson's contract expires in January, but MGM agreed to let her leave immediately.

Q. Isn't Gary Cooper's wife going to give him a divorce so that he can marry Dusty Miller?
—T. R., Rochester, N. Y.

A. Not if Gary can help it.

Q. Hasn't Mario Lanza had a sensational fight with the man who discovered and sponsored him?
—T. R., Philadelphia, Pa.

A. Yes.

Q. Why doesn't Liz Taylor's husband, Michael Wilding, and all the rest of those British actors become American citizens? —B. U., Baltimore, Md.

A. Some like Charles Laughton and James Mason already have; others plan to.

Q. Since his success, hasn't Kirk Douglas developed a swelled head?
—A. Y., Amsterdam, N. Y.

A. He is not as popular with reporters and photographers as he once was.

Q. How long has it been since Stewart Granger has seen the children he left behind in England to marry Jean Simmons? —E. R., London, Eng.

A. Two years.

SUZAN BALL POSES FOR MOST UNUSUAL PORTRAIT OF THE MONTH

A most important part of preparations for roles in Universal-International's City Beneath The Sea was rigorous training at the Cross Deep Sea Divers School at Wilmington, Calif. These pictures show Suzan Ball and Tony Quinn in the school tank, being photographed under water. A MODERN SCREEN Golden Key girl, Suzan is one of only four or five women who were able to qualify for the difficult course, which requires a stiff physical examination, nerves of steel, and no claustrophobia.

At start of training, Suzan was hesitant, asked Tony to take the first plunge.

Once in the water, Suzan acts like old-timer, adjusts goggles.

200 feet down Suzan and Tony resemble visitors from Mars.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD

I'VE been resting. But Hollywood hasn't!

Literally, the very earth has been rocking (earthquake) while I lay amidst my flowers in a hospital room and watched the wall split! And that isn't all. There has been:

The seven-day wonder of Aly Khan's flying trip to Hollywood to see Rita Hayworth and Princess Yasmin—and the still unsolved status of their marriage.

There's been the opening volley in the battle between the John Waynes—with Chata returning unexpectedly from Mexico and barricading the Wayne home against the tenants who had rented it, in good faith, from John.

And, Shelley Winters is enceinte (fancy French for expecting a baby). Oh, no, I can't bear it when they start saying Shelley is sending out in the middle of the night for pickles and ice cream!

Joan Evans married Kirby Weatherly at midnight at the home of Joan Crawford. A misty-eyed occasion to all but Miss Evans' modern parents Katherine and Dale Eunson, unagreeably surprised.

Lovely Phyllis Thaxter, expecting a second baby, was sadly stricken with polio.

Brush fires in the hills burned the garage of Alice Faye and Phil Harris' valley home and threatened to destroy the summer estate of Y. Frank Freeman, Paramount production boss.

Maureen O'Hara weepingly divorced Will Price after ten years of marriage.

Judy Garland startled the natives with her wardrobe of maternity slacks—for every social occasion.

One of the swank parties of the year was held in a deserted mansion with "corpses" floating in bathtubs and "hands" protruding from empty drawers.

Dixie Crosby is suddenly, seriously ill—saddening the town.

Elizabeth Taylor and Mike Wilding and Jane Powell and Geary Steffen leave as a foursome to visit—of all places—Las Vegas as they await their respective and expected parenthood.

Yes, Hollywood had its moments—as I rested.

The story goes that 39-year-old Michael Wilding, centered in a gay crowd of Liz Taylor's pals, took a look around at the Marsh Thompsons, Janie Powell, Jean Simmons et al and hissed in his bride's ear:

"If your little guests aren't nice, I'll send them all home without their ice cream!"

WHEN my assistant, D. Manners, called Shelley Winters to verify the story that Shelley was going to have a baby, the conversation went something like this:

D.M.: "You going to have a baby, Shelley?"

Shell: "Gee, I hope so. I think so. I got good reason to think so. But, gee, it's awful soon." . . .

D.M.: "What does your doctor say?"

Shell: "He thinks so. One was negative and one was positive, but the positive was more positive than the negative was negative."

D.M.: "All right. Why can't we say you're expecting a baby?"

Shell: "Oh, gee. Maybe I caught a cold or something. If you say for sure I'm going to have a baby—and then it isn't true . . ."

D.M.: "Shall we just say you hope it's true?"

Shell: "With all my heart—with all both our hearts—Vittorio and I hope it's true."

JUDY GARLAND wore maternity slacks to the Jack Benny party and told everyone she had "lots of 'em" for all different social occasions.

But at her own party—the very first big one Judy has ever given in Hollywood by the way—she wore a dress to match the décor of the home she and Sid have rented from the Joe Fields.

Receiving her guests in a deep lavender bouffant chiffon trimmed in violets, Judy said:

"I can't go outside for the dancing and fun. Tonight, I'm designed to match the living room!"

But she did go outside, and she had fun. She admitted the duties of a hostess made her nervous, however. "I think I've got all the divorced people sitting at tables with their ex-mates," she giggled.

Rita Hayworth (pre-Aly's visit) looked a bit weary and tired and she didn't stay late.

June Allyson bubbled—as "norm" with her—in soft white chiffon.

Gossips took particular note that Evie and Van Johnson danced often, were lovey-dovey.

The happiest face was Jimmy Stewart's, because his lovely Gloria was well enough to be up and around again.

Judy went to bed at three. But expectant father, Sid Luft, managed to stay up with the hardier souls until breakfast.

MY staff had a wonderful time when Tony Curtis showed up at our Wednesday luncheon and gave a demonstration of magic tricks and sleight-of-hand bamboozling he's learned in order to play the great Houdini.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Tired, camera-shy Tina Cassini holds close to mother, Gene Tierney, on their arrival in England where Gene just made Never Let Me Go.

Tony dashed in wearing gray sweater and slacks, quickly ordered ground steak, scrambled eggs and tomatoes and began the usual chant, "Now watch this . . ."

My gang reports he is really remarkable. He has gone so completely nuts on the subject he "works" a deck of cards in one hand while he is brushing his teeth or reading a book with the other.

But the staff was just as intrigued with Tony's eating habits as they were with his magic.

When he got his order, he asked for a bottle of ketchup. It was practically full.

He put ketchup on the meat. Ketchup on the eggs. Ketchup on the toast. None on the tomatoes. But, even so, the bottle was practically empty!

MARIO LANZA wasn't being temperamental when he failed to report for the start of The Student Prince. He is worried sick about finances.

What?—you say. This man who has made a fortune from his recordings, concerts and films? How can this be.

The truth is, Mario has made bad investments—or listened to some bad advice. He sank a small fortune in Texas oil lands, a mine in Arizona and other properties he believed to be gilt-edge securities.

Or, perhaps it is that most singers or artists, unlike Bing Crosby, do not have the Midas touch in a business sense.

The sad story goes that Mario is very close to being wiped out of the savings from his brilliant career.

He has a wife and children he adores. His parents are dependent on him. Many relatives in his native Italy depend on that check from Mario.

Of course, he has many great years ahead, years in which he will earn even more money. But this experience has been shockingly brutal to the popular star.

TO LOOK at Dewey Martin I would not pick him for the coming big screen star. But the first time I saw Alan Ladd I wouldn't have picked him, either. Nor Tony Curtis.

Dewey dropped in at my office one day soon after he had been given his big chance

From THE HOLLYWOOD SET

By MARY MARATHON

If you saw "The Greatest Show on Earth" you're probably still palpitating, as I am, to that great big beautiful hunk of male, Charlton Heston, who played the "boss man" of the circus. Well, let me tell you—Chuck (that's what his friends call him, so I'll call him that, too!) made such a hit in that swell picture that he was immediately slated for other big things, including "The Savage," which theatres will be showing in November.

Chuck plays a white man who, when he was a little boy, was rescued from sure death at the hands of the Crow Indians by their hated rivals, the Sioux. He grows up learning to love his adopted people. When the whites and the Sioux threaten to start a war, he is caught between loyalty to his own race and to the Sioux, who have been so good to him.

* * *

The white girl who makes him realize that his true happiness lies with her in his own world is played by Susan Morrow, a 19-year-old beauty you're going to hear about. She and lovely brunette Joan Taylor as the Indian girl, also in love with Chuck, are both young stars with great promise you'll enjoy watching. Handsome Peter Hanson, cast as Susan's brother, completes a foursome of Paramount's most interesting and exciting new personalities. You will really get a charge out of Chuck as the virile, hot-blooded hero of "The Savage" and you'll chalk up another hit for this bright and attractive new star.

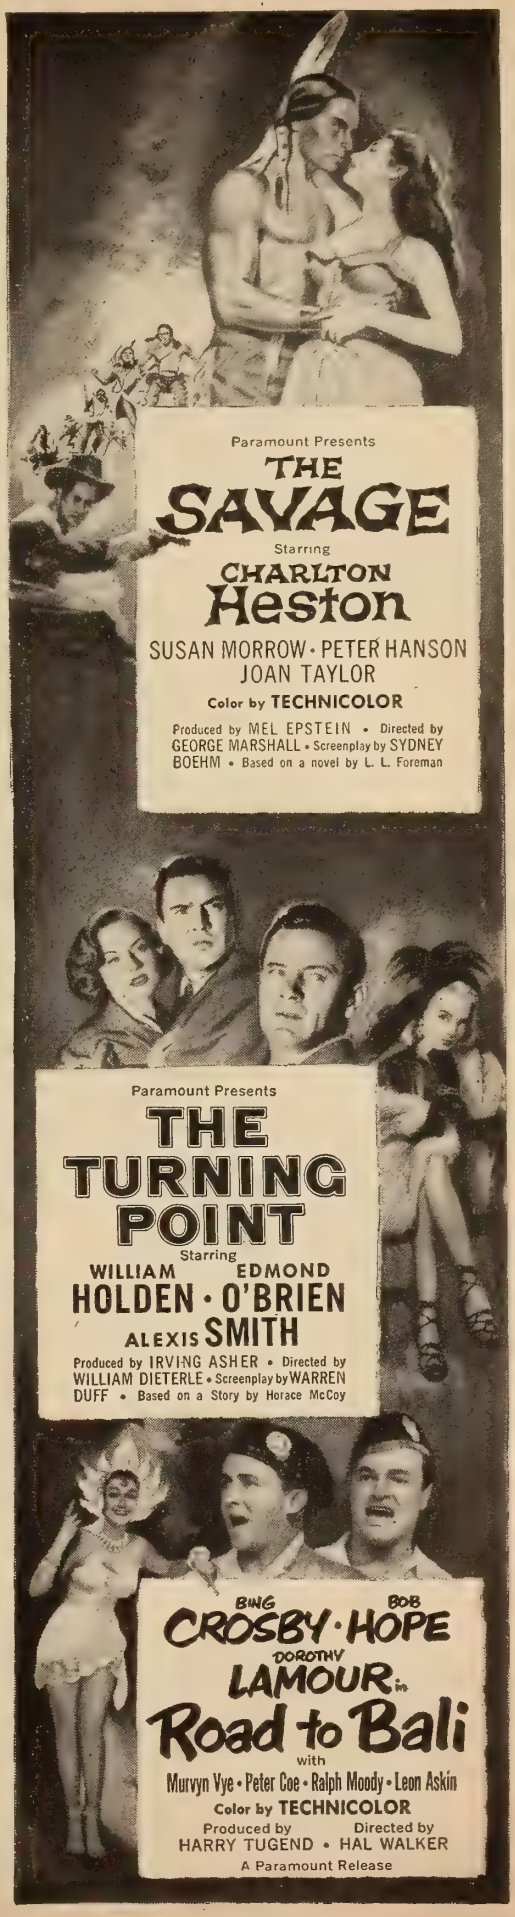
If you'd like a drooley photo of Chuck for your dressing table mirror, I'll be happy to send you one. Just make sure you write me for it before November 15, 1952 or I won't be able to send it to you. Address me care of Paramount Studio, Hollywood, California.

* * *



Another film I want to recommend to you is "The Turning Point," a thriller I am sure you'll enjoy as much as I did when I was privileged to attend a preview of it. William Holden, Edmond O'Brien and lovely Alexis Smith really do a solid job of entertaining in this modern story of the smashing of a big city crime syndicate.

* * *

I don't know whether you heard this yet, but Bill Holden was recently voted "Mr. Dreamboat" in a poll conducted by the bobbysoxers of America, and he sure lives up to his name in his big love scenes with glamour girl Alexis. The part Edmond O'Brien plays is a big change from his recent boots-and-saddle roles. He's the fighting lawyer whose dangerous job it is to turn the tide against crime in a city riddled with it. Believe me, this one will have your pulses hammering with excitement, it's that suspenseful and gripping.

* * *

P.S. Next month I'll have news for you about "Road to Bali," the travel-laugh film co-starring Bing Crosby, Bob Hope and Dorothy Lamour, that everyone is waiting for.

Are you in the know?

For a more-fun way to wrap Christmas packages—

☐ Play post-office ☐ Plan a wrapping bee

When presents for the family start piling up in your clothes closet, chances are your study-buddies have the same problem! So ask the gang to come on-a your house, toting their packages and various types of paper. Supply the scissors, paste, ribbons; award prizes for the most original "jobs." Gift-wrapping a la gang is fun. Even at "calendar" time—if you're comfortable with Kotex. This napkin's made to stay soft while you wear it; gives you softness that holds its shape!

What togs to pack for a house party?

☐ Strictly sports ☐ Date duds only

You cram your suitcase with glamour stuff; only to find yourself freezing on a hayride! Learn what's planned, then pack accordingly. At certain times, however you're togged, you'll be confident—for the flat pressed ends of Kotex banish revealing outlines. Your new Kotex belt adds extra comfort, too. Made with soft-stretch elastic; non-twisting, non-curling!

Know the jinx in this jalopy?

☐ Four's a crowd

☐ Casanova ☐ Tootin' twosome

Happy New Year? Huh-uh. Here are the makings of a crash landing! The car's crowded: bad for careful driving. Raucous blasts add more distraction. And how can a highway Casanova keep his mind on the road? Also, why risk problem day "accidents"—when Kotex gives extra protection with a special safety center? Try all 3 absorbencies.

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

*T. M. REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

P.S. Have you tried new Delsey* toilet tissue—now nicer than ever! Each tissue tears off evenly—no shredding. It's luxuriously soft and absorbent—like Kleenex* tissues. And Delsey's double-ply for extra strength.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Diana Lynn and Scott Brady step out after appearing in The Moon Is Blue at La Jolla Playhouse, Pasadena. Diana got rave notices.

in The Big Sky. He was nicely mannered, obviously a little "scairt" of me, nice looking but not devastating, not particularly outstanding.

Then, weeks later, I saw the finished Big Sky in my home projection room. I could hardly believe my eyes.

This boy has everything. He comes alive before the cameras in the most fascinating way and it is hard to believe that in his first important screen assignment he gave such a fine performance.

I sometimes wonder if Dewey and his pretty wife don't wonder what has happened to him also.

From a salary of just a few dollars a week he has jumped, in one performance, to where his discoverer Howard Hawks is asking $100,000 for Dewey on loanouts.

I hope he keeps his head. I think he will.

WHO'S WOOIN': Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner had a spat and after they made up he gave her a ring. Deb's wearing it on the right finger, wrong hand . . .

Barbara Stanwyck may be pining for Jean Pierre Aumont, but it doesn't show when she's driving, top down, in the moonlight, with Ralph Meeker.

Marilyn Monroe's another gal with a new ring—gift of the smitten Joe DiMaggio. But don't hang until they get married. As Marilyn's very best pal said "She's smarter than you think. She knows she's the hottest thing in pictures today. She also knows she's more valuable unmarried than sitting home being anyone's exclusive little woman."

Joan Fontaine is so long coming home from Europe, Collier Young went to Europe to see her and to find out if she still has that same old feeling.

I predict wedding bells for Piper Laurie and Leonard Goldstein, the young producer credited with zooming Piper's career. Even though he has left her home studio, methinks Leonard will be guiding Piper privately as well as professionally from here on in.

Cy Howard is awful blue because Gloria Grahame is going to Europe for a picture. He's got it bad. . .

Dial Soap keeps complexions clearer by keeping skin cleaner!

Dial's AT-7 (Hexachlorophene) removes blemish-spreading bacteria that other soaps leave on skin.

The cleaner your skin, the better your complexion. And mild, fragrant Dial with AT-7 gets your skin cleaner and clearer than any other kind of soap. It's as simple as that. Of course Dial's bland beauty-cream lather gently removes dirt and make-up, giving you scrupulous cleanliness to overcome clogged pores and blackheads. But Dial does far more!

Here's the important difference: when you use Dial every day, its AT-7 effectively clears skin of bacteria that often aggravate and spread surface pimples and blemishes. Skin doctors know this and recommend Dial for both adults and adolescents.

Protect your complexion with fine, fragrant Dial Soap.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Popular Jane Wyman surprised friends by appearing with old flame Greg Bautzer at the Mocambo party given by Marie McDonald.

ford, and two of Joan's servants were present for the midnight marriage of Joan Evans and Kirby Weatherly.

Joan E. had waited just five days after she was legally of age (18) before she took Kirby by the hand—and out to dinner at the home of Joan C.—for whom she is named.

Joan wanted to marry Kirby more than anything in the world. But her parents didn't quite approve.

They talked until so late that it was time to go home before Joan C.—a lady of action if ever there was one—went into action—and how!

An hour later, Joan Evans was Mrs. Weatherly. Joan Crawford was weeping sentimental tears and giving her "something old" (earrings), "something new" (gold bracelet), "something borrowed" (a lipstick to repair her makeup), "something blue" (a chiffon handkerchief).

The Judge looked slightly dazed. So did the bridegroom. Only Hymie retained his professional aplomb, happily snapping wedding pictures and getting his "exclusives."

The next morning, all was forgiven by Katherine and Dale except, perhaps, still smoldering embers against Joan C., without whom Joan Evans might still be Joan Evans.

DIXIE CROSBY underwent a very serious operation necessitating a long period of recuperation, and Bing and the boys came flying down from their Lake Hayden vacation to be with her.

By the time you read this, everybody hopes Dixie will be well on the road to recovery. But, if she isn't, you can bet Bing won't take off for Europe to make Little Boy Lost.

He has been the soul of devotion to Dixie, making her very happy. Little boy, found?

Jane Wyman's boyfriends have the doggondest names. Like her new one, Jim Fishgrund.

Before Jim, Bill Cabanne.

Before Bill, Travis Kleefeld.

Wonder if she ever met a man named just Joe Smith?

After Anne Baxter got good and sexy publicity-wise with her "olive green eyes matching her Martini blond hair," she gets slapped back in a weepy, dramatic role with Monty Clift in I Confess. That's the way it goes in Hollywood.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Looking a far cry from the rakish uncle he portrays in The Happy Time, proud father Louis Jourdan hugs one-year-old Louis Jourdan, Jr.

BETTY HUTTON has been undergoing another seige of resting her voice. During these spells she says absolutely nothing, doctor's orders. Instead, she writes on a blackboard.

This is hard on a gal who likes to sing and zing it up. It's also hard on a housewife who has definite likes and dislikes about television programs.

The other night, Charlie O'Curran was in her bedroom dialing away at his favorite sports programs. His back was turned to Betty so he didn't notice her gestures of displeasure.

Finally, she dashed out of bed across the room, grabbed the chalk and wrote on her blackboard:

"If you don't get something else but wrestlers—we're going to have the damnedest fight of our lives—right on this blackboard!"

Ava Gardner has to do a lot of gun shooting in her movie with Robert Taylor, and an expert at MGM asked her if she knew how to handle a gun.

"Sure," said Mrs. Frank Sinatra, "grab it by the barrel and hit somebody over the head with it. All women know that."

THE LETTER BOX: Kay Brown of Salem, Oregon, urges: "The reissue of Gone With The Wind every two or three years, please. The kids of my age are still hearing about this greatest of great pictures from older sisters and brothers or our parents and we would like very much to see it." I don't blame you, Kay. Ask your nearest movie house exhibitor about the possibilities.

"C.N.N.," Boston, says, "I'm one of the ones who wish Marilyn Monroe had never had to pose for that calendar. But I like her just the same and wish her well." Those are fair and just remarks, C.N.N.

About those letters to soldiers in Korea—I'm going to turn the tables this month. All you boys who have been writing me complaining that stars do not answer your letters and that you would like to correspond with some of the fans, send me your military addresses. I shall print every one I receive in this column, so stars and fans can know where to reach you.

That's all this month. See you next month.

"I flirted with trouble in New York!"

"It was a glorious, bright day," explained Doretta Morrow, "when Steve and I set out to see the sights of the city. But there was a wintry nip in the air, too, and when we got back from our ferry ride I knew I was in for trouble.

"My hands and face were chapped raw from the biting breeze. Fortunately, at home I had soothing, pure white Jergens Lotion. It smooths and softens chapped skin in no time!

"The wind atop Radio City was terrific. After extreme exposure like that, Jergens Lotion is a blessing. It works so wonderfully fast. Try this and see why! Smooth one hand with quickly absorbed Jergens . . .

"Apply any lotion or cream to the other, then wet them. Water won't bead on the hand smoothed with Jergens as it will with an oily care.

"Next day, my skin was soft and smooth — right for romance and close-ups." No wonder Hollywood stars choose Jergens Lotion 7 to 1.

Use Jergens Lotion regularly to keep your skin lovely, too. It protects against roughness and winter chap — costs only 10¢ to $1.00, plus tax.

SPECIAL TREATMENT FOR

4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"

Have you noticed lately that your face seems extra oily . . . shiny?

Are pore openings becoming larger . . . blackheads beginning to appear?

This is what is happening: In your teens, the oil glands often become over-active. At the same time, the skin gets sluggish—fails to throw off the everyday accumulations of dead skin cells. When these tiny, dead flakes build up over the pore openings, enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Today—Pond's recommends a greaseless treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores and blackheads. It's easy, quick . . . and it works.

Tonight—do this: Cover face, except eyes, with greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream. Its "keratolytic" action loosens dead skin cells—dissolves them off! Frees tiny skin gland openings so they can function normally. After 60 seconds—tissue off. See how fresh your skin feels! How much softer and clearer it looks!

FOR THE SKIN THAT REBELS against a heavy make-up: Before powder, smooth on a greaseless film of Pond's Vanishing Cream for a smoother, fresher looking make-up.

LONG HUNCH DEPARTMENT:

Her friends are all for a reconciliation for Maureen O'Hara and Will Price. They insist she filed for divorce merely to throw a scare into him . . . Rita Hayworth's Columbia bosses hope the press will continue to call her Princess Rita. It's good for business. But they are not at all in favor of their prize package resuming her marital status with Aly Khan. And they're sorry they didn't put Affair In Trinidad on the shelf until the public got a chance to see Rita in Salome, Dance Of The Seven Veils. Let's face it: Trinidad was not another Gilda! . . . Clark Gable speaking: "I would marry again if I knew the right girl and she would say yes."

O'Hara

I had lunch with Alan Ladd in his dressing room at U-I just before he took off to Europe to make his first independent production, Red Beret. He's supposed to be gone 18 months but I don't think Alan will stay away that long. "My roots are here," he told me. "This country has been good to me" . . . New friendship: Betty Grable and Bette Davis. They met while Betty was making a picture at 20th and Bette visited her ever-lovin' Gary Merrill at the studio. Betty was working on the banks of a huge tank that was made up to represent the Erie Canal. And Bette insisted that Gary row her across the briny to meet Betty! . . . I never realized how serious the Coleen Gray-John Payne romance was until I went swimming with them at Malibu and Coleen craned her neck looking up at her hunk-a-man and sighed, "And to think I hated him and his pouty lips when I first met him on a radio show we did together!"

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Marilyn Monroe is a thorn in the side to both Dick Widmark and Anne Baxter. Marilyn and Dick were supposed to be the co-stars of Don't Bother To Knock but Marilyn got all the publicity. And Anne lost the starring role in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, on which all her hopes were pinned, to Marilyn . . . Shelley Winters cooked an Italian dinner for her Vittorio one night before reporting at the Circle Theatre to do the Vivien Leigh role in Streetcar Named Desire. Next evening her leading man got even with her, just before curtain time, by chewing a clove of garlic! . . . Incidentally, the more English Vittorio learns, the less Shell has to say . . . Joan Evans' parents, Katherine and Dale Eunson, were invited but didn't attend her wedding to Kirby Weatherly at Joan Crawford's home.

Winters

When I leaned over a booth at the Brown Derby to ask Arlene Dahl how she's getting along with Lex Barker she crossed her fingers . . . Chata Wayne slipped quietly into town from Mexico and phoned her lawyer to start divorce proceedings against John . . . Their pals were wondering, when the divorce rumors started flying, if Glen Ford still uses that inter-communication system in his den to summon Eleanor Powell to his presence . . . Corinne Calvet told me: "I think it was very considerate of me to wait until Zsa Zsa Gabor finished making Moulin Rouge in Paris before I filed that $1,000,000 slander suit against her. I could have filed it beforehand, you know, and kept her in this country!" Zsa Zsa, you'll remember, claimed that Corinne wasn't French at all but Cockney.

Sir Christopher

sterling in the mood of grandeur

Sir Christopher, created by famed designer William S. Warren, has all the sweep and splendor of its inspiration—the work of the renowned architect Sir Christopher Wren, one of whose masterpieces is St. Paul's Cathedral, London. This pattern displays grandeur in sterling, exemplifies variety in design . . . for some pieces are decorated with carved blossoms, others with graceful clusters of fruit, still others with a combination of both. Sir Christopher is truly magnificent sterling, for it is given the ultimate in silvercrafting—Wallace's full-formed "Third Dimension Beauty"... beauty in front, in profile, in back . . . sterling perfection from every possible view.

Six piece place setting, Sir Christopher, $39.50. Settings for other patterns from $32.50 to $43.50 —all prices include Federal Tax.

Send for and read the many helpful table-setting ideas in the 32-page book "Treasures in Sterling". It also contains the exciting and romantic design stories of each Wallace "Third Dimension Beauty" pattern. —B. B., MONKS CORNERS, S. C.

A. No.

Q. Is there anything serious between Clark Gable and Gene Tierney? Why are they mentioned together so much?
—A. K., PENNS GROVE, N. J.

A. They co-starred together in a picture in London.

Q. Does Marilyn Monroe live with her mother or is she still hiding her somewhere? —C. F., FRESNO, CAL.

A. Marilyn lives in a hotel; her mother lives in an apartment.

Q. How much money does Dale Robertson earn? Is he independently wealthy? —G. H., TULSA, OKLA.

A. $750 a week; is not independently wealthy.

Q. Is it true that Mario Lanza and Howard Keel are the two most temperamental stars on the MGM lot?
—S. L., DURANGO, COL.

A. Yes.

Q. I understand that no motion picture studio will hire Frank Sinatra. If this is true, why is it?
—F. H., HOBOKEN, N. J.

A. Insufficient audience response.

Q. Does Van Johnson have a new contract? Does he get more than the $5,000 a week he got on his old one?
—B. I., PAWTUCKET, R. I.

A. Johnson's new contract calls for less.

Q. Is Rita Hayworth considered a very talented actress in Hollywood or is she used because of her sex appeal?
—T. R., HONOLULU

A. As an actress, sexy Miss Hayworth is considered adequate.

Q. Is Joan Crawford really petrified in front of a live audience and won't make personal appearances for that reason?
—T. P., COLUMBUS, GA.

A. Miss Crawford recently appeared on stage before a capacity crowd in New York's Loew's State Theater, plans to do a play next year.

TIME TABLES:

June Allyson, who knows about those things, held Humphrey Bogart's hand consolingly on the Battle Circus set while he chewed his nails waiting for his Lauren to have their second child . . . By the way, you can credit MGM prexy Nick Schenck with persuading June to table her retirement plans . . . The Wendell Coreys went through a list of Republican and Democratic candidates trying to find a name for their new baby . . . . Rock Hudson told me he's going to stuff himself with food when he finishes making Toilers Of The Sea with Yvonne de Carlo in Europe. That way, he'll get fat and U-I won't be able to assign him to another picture for at least a month after he returns. Rock has made seven pictures in the past year and wants a vacation.

His chums, noticing Van Johnson's moodiness of late, looked into the reasons and were told it's the result of that motorbike accident he suffered about ten years ago. And every year, on the anniversary of the accident, Van sends a bouquet to Dr. Bill Branch, who saved his life . . . Darryl Zanuck tells me he has discovered a child star who will be as famous as Shirley Temple, another Zanuck discovery. This one's a boy, however. He's Georgie Winslow, the child star of Top Man, and his nickname is Foghorn because he sounds like one . . . Shirley, it should be noted, has been warned by her medicos to wait a few years before she has another baby . . . Everyone who loves Bing and Dixie Crosby, and everybody does, was worried about Dixie's health as we went to press. It's a liver ailment. Bing took his sons to Nevada, at her insistence, when it began to look like she'd be able to leave St. John's Hospital soon.

SEX APPEAL:

At her birthday party, Barbara Stanwyck was told by Richard Greene she looks five years younger than she did five years ago, which is my idea of the nicest compliment a gallant gent can pay a lovely lady . . . If Debra Paget wears the same shorts in Stars And Stripes Forever that she rehearses her dances in, you'll never notice the star, Clifton Webb! . . . Marlon Brando, who's making Julius Caesar for MGM, has been doing the gay spots in a dual role. From the neck up, with vandyke and mustache, he's one of the noblest Romans of them all. But from shoulder to shoes he's a Schwab's drugstore cowboy in open shirts and levis.

Paget

The people who make maps of the movie stars' homes for the tourists have added a new attraction to their booklets. It's Linda Christian's nude statue in Ty Power's garden . . . "Dirtiest" love scene on record: Jennifer Jones and Charlton Heston kissing each other in the muck and slime of a Ruby Gentry swamp set . . . What would a "Sex Appeal" section in this department be without Marilyn Monroe? I'm told by reporters who were there that the Falls played second fiddle to a person for the first time in history when Marilyn made Niagara at Niagara Falls. All the tourists wanted to see Marilyn first!

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Judy Garland has paid off $100,000 in tax assessments and other bills during the past year. She made most of it during her long personal appearance at the Palace in New York. And now she's planning on making a musical version of Janet Gaynor's old hit, A Star Is Born, after her baby is born . . . RKO renewed Ursula Thiess' contract for another year, at $400 a week. Ursula sends half of it to her mother and two children in Germany and spends as much of the other half as she can making herself pretty for Bob Taylor . . . Randy Scott lost $250,000 drilling for what turned out to be a dry oil well in Oklahoma . . . Dana and Mary Andrews banked $40,000 for their first five weeks of touring with The Glass Menagerie, Dana in the Kirk Douglas role and Mary in Jane Wyman's.

Marie Wilson wrote a magazine article about how to be a perfect hostess. She started it out with: "Your party will be dull if you forget to invite the guests" . . . One child star asked another: "Who was that lady I seen you with last night?" "That was no lady," replied the other moppet. "That was a truant officer" . . . Bob Wagner has been writing his own checks since he was 13—and he earned the dough himself . . . Hardly anybody recognizes Hedy Lamarr when she sits poolside at the Beverly Hills Hotel wearing sunglasses . . . Left over from the earthquake: Fernando Lamas, who sleeps in the raw, jumped from his bed at the first quake, threw something over himself and ran out into the street. Safely outside, he discovered he was wearing a transparent raincoat! . . . Frankie Darro, who used to be a big star and can now be seen in his old movies on TV, is currently tending bar at the Try Later saloon on Santa Monica Boulevard . . . My personal nomination for the wildest driver in Hollywood: Jane Russell. Anybody who rides when Jane drives should have his life insured!

Marlene Dietrich is kicking herself for turning down Dream Boat, a dream boat of a picture for Ginger Rogers . . . And, right here, I'd like to thank 20th for the nice plug they gave Yours Truly in this fine hunk of celluloid . . . Joan Crawford's next picture may be Two Sisters, in which one sister burns the other to death with kerosene and a blow torch . . . Ida Lupino was in tears on the set of The Difference, which she was directing, apparently because she and Frank Lovejoy were having differences over a scene.

MOVIE REVIEWS

by jonathan kilbourn

picture of the month

This is the story of Blossom Seeley and Benny Fields, their marriage and fabulous careers. Blossom (Betty Hutton) got her start in a honky tonk, soon became a star.

Looking for a new act, Blossom meets Benny (Ralph Meeker). For her, it's love at first sight.

But they have to wait for happiness until Benny becomes a star.

SOMEBODY LOVES ME

■ The best thing about Paramount's Somebody Loves Me is a pretty good thing indeed. Here is Betty Hutton at her absolute top, singing with a new—and considerably subdued—authority and exhibiting an altogether unexpected charm. The story, suggested by the careers of oldtime singers Blossom Seeley and Benny Fields, is serviceable as a gadget on which to hang a good many wonderful melodies that were popular in Blossom's and Benny's bigtime. And Miss Hutton's success in the role of Blossom suggests that she herself may have taken a hint from the opening scenes of the script. They tell how Blossom, a shoutin' singer in the first decade of the century, makes the grade as a West Coast entertainer by following the advice of pioneer showman D. J. Grauman: "If you want to go over big—sing soft!" Success comes rapidly, and when Blossom meets jazz pianist Fields (effectively played by Ralph Meeker) she wants him to share the spotlight with her. He accepts her challenge, takes the job she offers him and then just as deliberately marries her. It is only later, when he finds that he really loves her, that Benny decides he must leave her so that he can build his success alone. This pseudo-biographical tale is not always a tribute to the intelligence of the principals, but its bittersweet base provides a perfect background for tunes like the title song, and producers George Seaton and William Perlberg, ably abetted by director-writer Irving Brecher, have used it for just that. Approximately half of the film is allotted to song and dance routines. In between times there is a perfect bit by Billie Bird a mistress of the tart retort. But she can't steal the show. That's done, for a change, by the star.

THE DEVIL MAKES THREE

The devil of the title is the still burning fire of fascism, personified in this film about postwar Munich by an aging cafe entertainer (Claus Clausen) who sees himself as Hitler reborn. For most of the footage, however, this fascinating character is a shadowy figure in the background while the cameras focus on the less interesting—though engagingly told—love story of Gene Kelly and Pier Angeli. Kelly, as an Air Force captain, returns to Germany on a Christmas leave to thank an anti-Nazi family for helping him escape when he was a prisoner of war. He finds the father and mother dead and their young daughter Willie (Pier Angeli) somewhat sullen and somehow changed; and he also finds that American intelligence officers are interested in his interest in her and want him to continue exhibiting it. Willie works in a cafe now, moving from customer to customer for a cut of what she can persuade them to buy. Seemingly against her will, she allows him to persuade her to be driven across to Austria for Christmas. He cannot understand her attitude, alternately truculent and loving; nor will he believe at first that she is using him to help smuggle material across the border, as his fellow officers suggest. In a smashing denouement, brilliantly directed by Andrew Marton and replete with a Hitchcock chase and one of the most frightening murder plans ever imagined, the devil reveals himself.

Cast: Gene Kelly, Pier Angeli, Claus Clausen. —MGM.

MY MAN AND I

For the first couple of reels it looks as if this little film might make the grade as a "sleeper"—one of those pictures, usually produced on a low budget, that slip into town without the usual publicity and make an unexpectedly big splash. But then the scriptwriters let the fine cast and director, not to mention the public, down with a sudden plop. For what starts off as an original, offbeat screenplay ends up as just so much oversimplified, even silly, melodrama. From the beginning it's apparent what the writers had in mind as a theme: to show how a naturalized citizen of good will can be a far better American than older stock who abuse their citizens' rights. Chu Chu Ramirez (played with sensitivity and charm by Ricardo Montalban), a young man from Mexico, sets out to work hard to prove himself worthy of his newfound status. He gets a job running a bulldozer for a hard-bitten couple named Ames (Wendell Corey and Claire Trevor) who own a marginal ranch. Mr. A. spends much of his time with an eye out for little unpleasant tricks to play on Mrs. A.; she has a permanently roving eye, and it lights on Chu Chu. But Chu Chu, unfortunately for his future, is not to be had. He befriends, falls for and tries to reform a truculent blonde with a tendency to dipsomania (Shelley Winters). How Chu Chu solves his difficulties is a tribute to the writers' ingenuity if not to the American judicial system. But it is a bigger tribute to William Wellman's direction and to fine performances by most of the cast that My Man and I seldom seems as ridiculous on the screen as it does shortly thereafter.

Cast: Ricardo Montalban, Shelley Winters, Wendell Corey, Claire Trevor.—MGM.

Slim the Way the Stars Slim

MY WIFE'S BEST FRIEND

Amusing movies about marriage are so few and far between that it is probably better to welcome My Wife's Best Friend first, then quibble about its shortcomings. Like some of the better British comedies of recent date, it starts off with a first-rate farcical premise: The Masons (Anne Baxter and Macdonald Carey), setting off on an airborne vacation to Hawaii to celebrate their eighth anniversary, see one of their plane's engines catch fire. A fatal crash appears imminent. They vow eternal love. Then Mrs. Mason, always one (according to the part she plays) to overdo an act, asks forgiveness for any little nagging or mistreatment she may have been guilty of. In an unguarded final moment her husband, in turn, admits a slight transgression. He was almost unfaithful with her best friend one night a few years ago when she took a long shopping trip to New York. But the plane doesn't crash. The goings-on thereafter, for some time anyway, are hilarious.

Cast: Anne Baxter, Macdonald Carey, Catherine McLeod, Cecil Kellaway.—20th Century-Fox.

BIG JIM McLAIN

Told in simple narrative style, with John Wayne's voice to bridge the gaps from episode to episode, Big Jim McLain describes the work of a couple of Committee investigators for the House Committee on Un-American Activities in identifying Communist leaders in Hawaii and helping to quell an incipient Red threat there. With the aid of Naval Intelligence and the Honolulu police department (the F.B.I. is inexplicably absent), Big Jim (Wayne) and his even bigger partner Mal (James Arness) find that the Reds have covered their tracks quite cleverly. But not quite completely. A nurse (Nancy Olson) gives them their first important clue: an address of a man apparently high among the party's controlling clique. The scenarists never find it necessary to give the nurse any further relation to the real story line, but Big Jim likes her and soon they get themselves engaged. Their romance runs like a misplaced thread through the whole fabric of the film, while Big Jim and Mal keep following up lead after lead. Eventually one of these pays off in a big way. An elderly, retired union man puts his finger on his own son as one of the party's higher-ups. Soon, with the help of hidden microphones, the Red hierarchy is trapped in its lair. Clumsily written and ineptly put together, the movie overstates its case for the Committee and bungles the job of telling an important story.

Cast: John Wayne, Nancy Olson, James Arness.—Warners.

SON OF ALI BABA

This heady concoction is half old-fashioned burlesque, half college carnival, sound-stage style, but the end result is so completely homogenized that it must be called unique if nothing else. Tony Curtis and Piper Laurie are the hero and heroine, and nobody could act more surprised. It seems that Tony, as Kashma Baba, first-born of that older and far better-known Baba, is most likely to succeed with the babes at the Persian Military Academy, West Point of its very early day. This annoys the Caliph of Bagdad's oldest son, a fellow cadet, who enthusiastically joins his father in a plot to kill Kashma and his father, make it appear that they have been plotting against the mighty Shah and take over title to the Babas' vast wealth. However, they reckon without spirited Piper, the pretty fly in the perfumed ointment of their plan. Daughter of the Princess of Fez (though, not unnaturally in this tale, posing as an escaped slave), she helps turn the tables on the evil Caliph and his henchmen. Nobody in the cast takes these goings-on too seriously, and Curtis-Laurie fans may find it all fun.

Cast: Tony Curtis, Piper Laurie.—Universal.

TOP SECRET

Employing the tried and true technique of trial-by-flashback, Top Secret tells a tale of espionage behind the Nazi lines during the war. The question before the French secret-police court, sitting in the present day, is: who murdered a certain French underground fighter during the war's waning months? Among the witnesses are Phyllis Thaxter, Karl Malden and Steve Cochran, one time comrades of the Frenchman in a unit of the Maquis. As each tells his story, the scene shifts back; gradually the jigsaw tale takes shape, each Maquis member filling in what he saw himself. It is soon clear that one person keeps reappearing in all the various versions: a missing American Marine, Cornel Wilde. And a fabulous career he seems to have had when the statements are pieced together. Cut down as it is into individual sequences, with the camera making repeated returns to the courtroom, the story is always credible. And that's something, considering some of the casting. Miss Thaxter and Malden, for example, competent players as they are, are just about as French as apple pie.

Cast: Cornel Wilde, Steve Cochran, Phyllis Thaxter, Karl Malden.—Warners.

ASSIGNMENT—PARIS

Up-to-the-minute in their choice of a plot, the makers of Assignment—Paris never get down to the point of taking it very seriously, so that what might have been a thrilling documentary remains just another thriller. This one is about a newspaperman detained behind the Iron Curtain and his employer's frantic efforts to get him back (the U. S. Government, it appears, was just sitting on the sidelines). After vying with George Sanders, editor of the N. Y. Herald Tribune's Paris edition, for beautiful co-worker Marta Toren, just back from Budapest, hot-headed reporter Dana Andrews is sent to the Hungarian capital to replace the ailing bureau chief. It's a hot spot and a hot story for an American correspondent, because a U. S. businessman there has just confessed being a spy. Andrews goes about his business of getting something on the Hungarian premier, a Russian puppet, like a tomcat with a tin can tied to his tail and finds himself in prison for his pains. In the script's most effective scenes, the Hungarians fake a confession, cutting and rearranging a tape-recorded prison talk and putting the whole "interview" on the air. But back in Paris, Miss Toren and Sanders have an ace up their collective sleeve—a trick that works and frees Andrews.

Cast: Dana Andrews, Marta Toren, George Sanders, Audrey Totter.—Columbia.

Though their friends believe that Duke and Chata are still very much in love, few who know the couple hold any hope that they will reconcile.

He can't live with her or without her, but after six years of being on a marital merry-go-round with the fiery, unpredictable Chata, John Wayne has decided he's had enough.

BY RICHARD DEXTER

■ If you have money, and let's face it, John Wayne does, there are only three places for you to stay in Lima, Peru.

One is the Hotel Crillon. Another is the Hotel Bolivar, and the third is the Country Club of Lima.

As anyone who knows Duke Wayne will testify, he is not the country club type, so a few weeks ago, while traveling through South America, he very quietly, very unobtrusively checked into the Crillon—no fuss, no publicity, no fanfare.

Now the Limeños, residents of Lima, are avid movie-goers—in fact there are more motion picture theatres per capita in Lima than in any other South American city. But the Limeños did not spot Duke right away.

It was a nine-year-old boy from Rochester, N. Y., who pulled the trick. He saw Duke ambling through the lobby and ran to his mother. "Look, mama," he shouted, excitedly pointing to the actor, "There's John Wayne!"

"Seymour," said the mother. "That can't be John Wayne. He's in California, in Hollywood."

Seymour insisted. "I saw him on television before we left home. I know he's John Wayne. Just look at his nose."

The lady rose, but Duke hurried through the lobby, walked (Continued on page 68)

BECAUSE YOU'RE MINE—title song by Mario Lanza* (Victor); Nat Cole (Capitol); Billy Eckstine* (MGM); Bobby Wayne (Mercury); John Raitt (Decca). The Song Angels Sing by Mario Lanza* (Victor); John Raitt (Decca).

Mario's new MGM film will make his own versions of these two songs the best-sellers. We think he's made better records, though, and you may agree that Nat's version of the title tune gets a more fitting mood.

THE MERRY WIDOW—Selections by Fernando Lamas* (MGM).

The trend toward making movie musicals out of musical comedy classics reaches a new peak with the Lana Turner-Fernando Lamas version of The Merry Widow. The real star of the picture, of course, is Franz Lehar, aided considerably by a gentleman who never met Lehar but who collaborated neatly by setting new lyrics to some of these famous melodies. The album, recorded directly from the sound-track, includes the Merry Widow Waltz; Girls, Girls, Girls; Maxim's; Night; Vilia; Gypsy Music and Can Can. The MGM Studio orchestra and chorus under Jack Blackton give Lamas sterling assistance.

THE QUIET MAN—Selections by Merv Griffin* (Victor).

The picture was shot on location in Ireland and the background music was very authentic. Merv brings the right sentimental atmosphere to his interpretations of Isle of Innisfree, The Young May Moon, The Humor Is On Me Now, Mush-Mush-Mush-Tural-I-Addy, Galway Bay, The Kerry Dance, The Wild Colonial Boy and I'll Take You Home Again Kathleen.

HAS MARIO SET HOLLYWOOD ON ITS EAR ONCE TOO OFTEN? HERE'S THE STORY OF THE LATEST HASSLE.

LANZA FIGHTS AGAIN

by Caroline Brooks

■ Ever since MGM signed him to a contract, Mario Lanza had proven himself a thorn in the corporate flesh of Loew's, Inc., a hundred million dollar holding company which owns and operates the studio.

According to executives, Mario has fought with directors, writers, producers, makeup men, musicians—practically every department on the lot.

He has argued with Dore Schary who runs the studio, tussled verbally with little Joe Pasternak, his producer, complained vociferously about the choice of musical conductors, commented acidly on the studio's insistence that he cut down on his weight.

In short, Mario in the past three years has earned the reputation, either justified or not—it all depends on whose side you're sitting—of being MGM's bad boy. He is at this writing the enfant terrible of Hollywood, the tantrummental star whose moods and outbursts have brought down upon his head the same type of censure that a few short years ago was meted out to another unstable star, Judy Garland.

The long-simmering feud between Mario and MGM reached the boiling point in August of this year when the studio decided that it had taken all of Lanza's shenanigans (Continued on page 103)

Aly chased his princess half-way around the world, to meet her behind closed doors in Hollywood. Here an outstanding reporter reveals the strange facts behind the headlines.

■ A woman meets a man who's gay, dashing, flirtatious, restless, unpredictable, selfish, and utterly fascinating. She marries him. And immediately tries to make him over into the age-old popular mold of a mate who is solid, stay-at-home and completely stable. Rita Hayworth was no exception. She did everything in and out of the book to force her prince charming to fit the pattern prescribed by American wives for American husbands. And it looked like she had finally succeeded when, in August, Prince Aly Khan flew to Hollywood and without waiting to change his clothes, dashed to Rita's rented house in Beverly Hills for a six hour huddle that lasted till nearly three in the morning.

But the victory was abortive and pyrrhic. It was Rita who had to change. Aly wouldn't and couldn't. And contrary to report, it was Rita who wanted the reconciliation, Rita who wept and sheilah graham tells

begged for forgiveness, who said she had made a mistake in running away from her Prince and who promised to do everything and anything if he would forget, forgive and take her back.

"I realize now I was wrong to leave you," Rita told Aly in the first rush of remorse. The Prince, gallant in the hour of delayed victory, soothed Rita, and like a father talking to a no longer rebellious child, replied that it wasn't a question of who was right or who was wrong. The problem was, could she accept him as the man she married, a Prince with a thousand years of Ismalite tradition, who belonged in part to his religious followers, a smooth sophisticate who could never conform to the humdrum limits outlined by the retiring Rita, terrified-of-people, tongue-tied in company, who would rather wear jeans than jewels.

Rita said she would. But let's face it. While she had enough sex appeal to catch him, is Rita clever enough to hold him? And if, when you read this, the reconciliation has gone kaput, it will only be because in the final analysis, Rita cannot quite cope with Aly's way of life, which he will never change for Rita or any other woman. In fact, even when Rita assured Aly she was ready to live with him as his wife, he begged her to consider long and very seriously before joining him in Europe. Because he isn't sure it can work. Neither am I.

The big trouble is that, while Aly has never wanted a divorce, he has always wanted freedom—four freedoms. in fact—to do as he pleases, to see whom he pleases, to travel when he wants to, and to gamble for high stakes when he's in the mood. And the ideal life, from his point of view, would be if Rita and little Yasmin and Rebecca lived with him from April until November. Then he would go off on his travels, as he will this year to India and South America, with Rita returning to Hollywood for six months to continue her career in movies.

And there's the rub. Rita is an all or nothing girl. She always wants to give up everything for the man she loves, and she expects the same consideration from the man. And this worries Aly. He knows that even though she promised "I will do everything your way," that when the rosy glow of renewed domesticity wears off and he packs up to go on his travels, her American upbringing, which has a few traditions of its own, might send her fleeing back again to the land of the hot dog and the way of life she knows and understands.

Very few people know why Rita left Aly in the first place. The parting is usually ascribed to Aly's dalliance with dames, especially Katharine Dunham. Aly's attentions to the dancer didn't improve the situation, naturally, but Rita took fright, then flight, when Aly displayed his serious side with his Moslem followers in Africa. She couldn't (Continued on page 70).

the GOLD DUST TWINS

The words "movie star" used to mean fabulous ways of life, leopard-lined Rolls Royces and capital-G Glamor—but Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift have reduced the term to torn T-shirts and old tennis shoes. Are these two deglamorizing the film capital? Have they neglected their obligations to the fans who put them in the chips? Is their contempt for Hollywood fair, considering that Hollywood feeds them? Here is an unusually frank commentary written by a top reporter and presented just as we received it.

The Editors

■ Nicholas Schenck, the mogul behind the scenes at MGM, recently made one of his infrequent trips to Hollywood to see what was happening at his giant glamor factory, the studio. On the surface things appeared to be in order. The cameras were turning, the directors directing, the actors acting, the commissary was open and selling chicken soup. Dore Schary was in his office plotting new and better movies, and his underlings were still driving to work in Cadillacs every morning. But something was wrong, and Schenck was worried.

Nicholas Schenck's first concern is revenue. He is the man who is directly responsible to the stockholders and he knew, on this trip, that a good many things had to be done to stimulate the nation's interest in movies.

"We're losing our touch," Schenck is reported to have said at a closed meeting of top brass. "The whole world used to be interested in everything that went on here. We were the most glamorous city in the modern world. The name 'Movie Star' was a label that meant a fascinating, exciting man or woman, and it brought people into our theatres in packs, just to get a glimpse of the great stars in good pictures or bad. What has happened to that?"

Nicholas Schenck was speaking of the days when movie stars drove leopard skin-lined Rolls Royces and appeared in public swimming in rare furs or, in the case of the men, wearing capes and followed by a retinue of flunkeys. And while he was trying to make his point, one of the current stars, assigned to make a movie at his studio, was just reporting for work.

Well, to say the least, it wasn't like it used to be. The man stepped through the front door of the studio wearing a pair of blue jeans and somebody else's shirt rolled up at the sleeves and not entirely buttoned in front. His hair hadn't been combed, at least not that day, and there was a stubble of beard on his chin. His shoes were unshined, and his manner was that of a laborer asking at the back gate for a day's work. He was, however, greeted excitedly and ushered quickly into the swank office of the producer who was to make his film. His name was Marlon Brando.

On the other side of town, at Warner Brothers, a tired publicity man was sitting at his desk holding his head in his hands. He was assigned to publicize an Alfred Hitchcock movie, I Confess, and he was looking into as bleak a future as a man in his position could imagine. On his desk was a list of phone calls from reporters and magazine writers who wanted to help him. All he had to do was produce the star of the picture. But the press agent couldn't deliver, for his star, at that moment, was where he had been ever since he got into town. Dressed in old flannels and looking every inch like a mechanic off duty, he was sprawled out on a bed in a third rate apartment house, dozing. His name was Montgomery Clift.

Eccentricities of all sorts amuse most people, but the eccentricities of Marlon Brando (Continued on page 92)

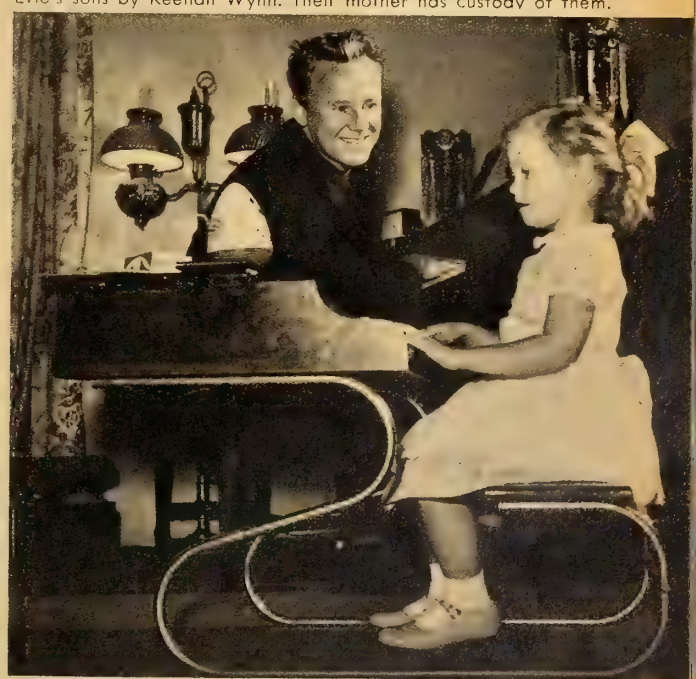
A word of warning to Van Johnson from an old friend

State of the Union

Dear Van:

■ It's been several days since we talked, and as I've got to make a report to the editors of MODERN SCREEN on our discussion, I thought I'd better re-check some of the things we spoke of with you and tell you just exactly how I feel about them.

It's a little embarrassing, Van, to have to sit down with a fellow—particularly a friend—and ask him about his marital life. But I did it and I'm glad. And your understanding that this is all just part of being a star in Hollywood, with your life an open book, made it a lot easier for me.



First, Van, it must be faced that for the past couple of months stories have been appearing in the papers intimating that things between you and Evie are not entirely harmonious. Not entirely the way they should be.

Now even though you and Evie and most of your intimate friends knew this to be nonsense, it began to hurt. Once an intimation of anything of this sort appears in print, an actor and his wife have to begin walking on eggs, because if they show anything but extreme passion for one another in public, the tongues begin wagging harder and louder than ever. For instance, if you neglect to help Evie on with a wrap when leaving a night club some night, you might conceivably read in the papers the next morning that you had knocked her to the ground. Sadly enough, many people would believe it, for this is a city and an era of exaggeration.

It just seems as though a man in your position can't cry NO loud enough to make people believe you. A good example of this took place a few years ago. Two columnists (Continued on page 98)

It's hard to tell who's having more fun playing soldiers, seven-year-old Tracy, or Van. Tracy and his brother, Ned, 11, are Evie's sons by Keenan Wynn. Their mother has custody of them.

Van and Evie's Schuyler is talented for a four-year-old, plays piano already. Van wants the kids to grow up in the North, where they can see the seasons change, as he did when he was a boy.

You're On, Kids!

Betty and Charlie got away from it all when they took a two-week vacation at Lake Tahoe. Afterwards, they went to London to do their own show at the Palladium.

At the peak of her career Betty Hutton has walked out! But it's the beginning of a new life and career with Charles O'Curran . . . strictly on their own.

BY LOUIS POLLOCK

The O'Currans took a small mountain cabin and Betty did her own cooking and cleaning. They were alone, except for a brief, hectic visit from Lindsay and Candy.

Charlie pointed out the breathtaking scenery to an enchanted Betty. She was really ready for a vacation after her strenuous USO trek to Korea and her highly successful vaudeville debut at New York's Palace Theatre last spring.

Betty's card-playing left lots to be desired. One night at Cal-Neva lodge, the house let Betty deal at blackjack and, oddly, not a customer lost.

■ One rainy afternoon last May, while sitting in her dressing room at the Palace Theatre in New York where she was appearing in her own stage show, Betty Hutton suddenly rebelled at the course of her career. She was at the top of her professional life, having earned almost two million dollars before she was 31, but she had come to the shocking realization that all her fame failed to add one whit to her security and that of her husband and children. She had kept thinking it was crazy, a tricky, economic slip-up that would be straightened out. But it wasn't being straightened out, and she couldn't wait any longer.

Only a few weeks before this, right after her marriage to Charles O'Curran, this depressing truth had been made clear to her again. Like a new bride will, she had been musing contentedly on their future together. "Just think," she speculated once, "if I wanted to—which I don't!—I could give up the screen and stage and just be a wife. After all, you have a good job. We could get along."

"We could not only get along," Charlie assured her, "but we would have just about as much left, after taxes, as if you were working."

Since Betty was then getting $5,000 a week (and had been for seven years), she patted his head consolingly and said she was sure he would feel better in the morning. "It must be something you married that's disagreeing with you," she told him. But Charlie found a pencil and proceeded to prove his point. Even though, as a dance director, he made only a fifth as much as Betty, their combined income put them into such a high tax bracket that they would have practically as much for themselves just living on his salary.

Betty was hypnotized by his figures. "What's it all about then?" she asked. "I've worked ever since I was a kid. All those years fighting to get somewhere and . . . and it's just glory? If I keep on like this, I won't have an extra cent to chip in for us or to use to safeguard my children? Nothing but a big whoop-de-do I couldn't (Continued on next page)

When they found themselves worrying about the future, Betty and Charlie made a pact not to think about it, to relax and have fun. They soon got to know their neighbors and learned to water-ski, got quite proficient at it, in fact.

Before long it was hard for them to remember there was such a thing as work, or that it was anything more than an occasional trip to the local grocery store to lay in supplies. For two such busy people, that was something.

exchange for a loaf of bread?"

"Nothing," Charlie had answered. "So just be a wife and let the old man bring in the money."

"But . . . but I can't!" she had exclaimed. "You know I love to work. I've got to work. It's in me and has to come out. Yet it should mean something to us. It ought not to come to nothing."

Betty kept dwelling on this talk. Then she got the idea of Charlie producing a stage show around her to be booked at the Palace. "Don't!" everyone warned her. "You can't follow Judy Garland." But as if she were bound to test herself (and she was), Betty went ahead. Waiting for the opening in May was like holding her breath. Then . . . a smash success. Yet, even this didn't change the basic situation and now, on this afternoon backstage between shows, Betty could not contain herself any longer.

She phoned her agent, Abe Lastfogel of the William Morris office, and, dressed in an old pair of slacks, went out to meet him in a small delicatessen store near the stage entrance. When he got there, she was at a table staring moodily at a 40 cent sandwich she had ordered but apparently couldn't eat. She tried to control herself as she talked, but the tears came before two words were out. She announced broken-heartedly that she could no longer go on in Hollywood as a studio star. She must strike out for herself.

They talked for an hour. "All I own to my name today," she told him, "is the house we live in. After all my years of struggling! . . . and I would have lost that if my show at the Palace had flopped.

He knew what she meant. Despite her high earnings, Betty had not had enough clear money of her own to organize the stage company and had to pledge all she owned to swing the financing. But he also knew that Betty had always been a victim of the performer's inborn fear of being "at liberty" i.e., unsigned and without a steady income. She had had her days with "short meals," her weeks of pinching nickels, sometimes borrowed nickels. He reminded her of it.

"If you want to be independent and go into business for yourself, that's fine," he said. "For taking the financial risks involved you are permitted to profit more. That's business. But these are touchy times. If you win . . . great. But if you (Continued on page 66)

QUIZ KID

Ten years ago he caddied for Crosby, Gable and Astaire . . . and they laughed when he said he'd grow up to be in pictures. But they remember Bob Wagner now.

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

■ "Say!" hailed the tall, grinning kid, strolling in from the fairway's edge and up to the Bel-Air foursome. "Want to buy a ball?"

One of the golfers extended his hand. "Let's see it, R. J.," he said, and inspected the proffered pill, which was hardly a prize in any self respecting linksman's book. The paint was cracked and on the cover, where a vicious iron had topped it, there was a smile almost as big as the one on the face of the tow-headed scavenger.

Randy Scott, who was the golfer accosted that day, started to shake his head but he knew he didn't have a chance.

"Let you have it for a real bargain," pressed the determined young salesman. "Two bits. I need the dough. Got a date. Thanks!" He caught the spinning coin and hustled off toward the thirteenth green, ducking through the hedge and across the street. That's where Robert John Wagner, Junior, lived. In a sec he had swung aboard his bike and was pedalling down the hill to pick up a cutie whom he had promised a double-jumbo malt at Tom Crumplar's in Westwood Village.

A scene like that was pretty common around the Bel-Air Country Club about ten years ago, when Bob Wagner was twelve years old and by summer profession a caddy. To tell the truth, he wasn't too hot a caddy for a couple of reasons: one was that packing bags and spotting balls for such movie star members as Bing Crosby, Clark Gable, Randy Scott, Fred Astaire and others, Bob was inclined to rivet eyes on his employers in a worshipful manner instead of on the balls they smacked, so usually the balls got lost. And then, just as a player started a backswing designed to wham out a 300-yard drive, "R.J.," as they all know him, was prone to paralyze the project by inquiring, "Say, Mister Gable, about that scene where you socked the guy and drove off with the girl: How could you shift gears with your hand around her waist?"

This one's too cagy to get married, say the Hollywood sages. But Marilyn says: "You can't kiss a career good-night." The answer might be just a guy named Joe.

BY IMOGENE COLLINS

■ One afternoon about eight months ago a friend of Marilyn Monroe decided to play Cupid and called her on the phone.

"You're always saying," he began, "how tough it is to meet nice eligible young men in Hollywood."

"That's true," Marilyn said.

"Well, I've got a great guy for you to meet tonight," the friend continued. "I'm sure you'll like him."

Her curiosity piqued, Marilyn insisted upon knowing something about her blind date. "Is he in show business?" she asked.

"He's not in show business," the friend said, "but he's the sweetest man right now this side of the Mississippi. Honest! I'll pick you up at eight. We're dining at the Villanova."

The Villanova is one of those warm, intimate, Italian restaurants with soft lights, candles on the table, bottles of Chianti, platters of antipasto, and huge casseroles crammed with spaghetti and meat balls.

Joe DiMaggio, one of the greatest baseball players in the history of the game, was sitting in a booth waiting. As Marilyn and her friend approached, the tall, dark, (Continued on page 101)

Marilyn appears at most Hollywood parties alone, leaves alone. But that's when Joe DiMaggio's in New York. The consistent "Gee, we're just friends" answer Marilyn and Joe give can't be depended on, intimates say.

CONFESSIONS OF A TEN-

■ Each week Jeff Chandler, a wavy-haired, mammoth-shouldered giant who weighs 214 lbs. with a towel around his midriff, and stands six feet four in his size 12 shoes, pays me ten percent of his considerable salary. Like clockwork.

I am Jeff's talent representative, or if you want to be down to earth, I'm his agent. Lots of people don't like to use the word "agent" in polite society because supposedly it conjures up images of blood-suckers, leeches, Draculas and other such parasites. But let's face it. In Hollywood the actor or actress without an agent doesn't eat regularly.

When Jeff isn't working, which, knock on wood, is never, I find him employment. When he is working, which is always, I go over his contract with a microscope. I get it renewed when it expires—at more money if possible. In his case it was possible. I pick up his check at the studio every Friday. Never miss a single week. I read his scripts and try to see that he stars only in top-grade films which can further his career. I handle all the requests for benefit appearances. And I go around Hollywood insisting that Jeff Chandler (Continued on page 89)

House in the Clouds

■ Bob Mitchum's wife, Dorothy, was riding along Ventura Boulevard in Los Angeles a few weeks ago when a truck suddenly pulled out of a side street. Dorothy swung her car around, narrowly avoiding a crackup.

Muttering some pithy words which best expressed her outraged feelings, Dorothy caught up with the truck at the next stop light. She rolled down the window, prepared to give the driver a salty piece of self-rehearsed dialogue. She took one look, however, and her car motor abruptly stalled.

The truck driver was Jane Russell!

At dinner that night Dorothy turned to Bob and said, "Can you give me one reason why Jane Russell should be driving a truck along Ventura Boulevard?"

Mitchum thought for a moment. "Maybe she was delivering her own groceries."

"No kidding," Dorothy insisted. "She almost crashed into me this afternoon."

Mitch shrugged his shoulders. "How should I know? Why don't you call her up and tell her you're going to have her license revoked?"

The idea of calling Jane appealed to Dorothy. The girls had a short conversation. Only thirty-five minutes long.

Chinese antiques and contemporary architecture mix gracefully in the dining area of the living room. The simple Chinese table is impressive in front of the glass-wall.

The Waterfields spend their leisure hours beside the irregularly-shaped pool. There's a spectacular view of the San Fernando Valley, where they grew up together.

Jane wanted her home to combine the stone and "Tell me," Dorothy began good-naturedly, "was that you driving a truck this afternoon?"

Jane giggled. "Did you see me? Wasn't it a riot? It wasn't my truck, you know. I just borrowed it from the filling station. How come? Well, you know the headboard of our double bed? And the two bedside tables? I wanted them covered with silver leaf. (Continued on next page) wood solidarity of a 17th Century manor house with the beauty of contemporary colors and fabrics. The living room shows how well she succeeded.

Jane relaxes beside the pool with pet dogs Blitz and Katrinka. She likes the feeling she gets there of being on the rim of the world.

When Jane started talking about building a house, Bob agreed she could do whatever she wanted, as long as he had a den to call his own. Jane made sure he got his den, a wonderful place full of his guns, trophies and sports memorabilia.

Jane's decorating ideas are sometimes unusual, always effective. Top: her jewelry-bedecked tree; bottom: the stone Buddha.

A decorator with bright ideas, Jane knows just what she wants, and she'll even drive a truck to get it!

Pantry, kitchen and hobby-room make this three-part unit, all covered with a stylized Chinese wallpaper. The Waterfields often eat breakfast and lunch here.

The wood-paneled den was designed as a small work room and not a second living room. It's also a secluded spot where Jane can read scripts and watch TV, and Bob can work undisturbed at his desk.

The prices they asked me were preposterous. Honest! I finally decided to silver the raw wood myself."

Jane then proceeded to explain that she did the job in a friend's studio and, when it was finished, needed a truck to cart the furniture back to her hilltop home. She asked the boys at the corner filling station if she could borrow their pickup truck for an hour. "They told me I didn't have a card from the Teamsters' Union and that I was a threat to the highway system of America," Jane continued, "but in the end they let me have it."

Jane piled in with Tony, her gardener, and that night, when her husband Bob Waterfield arrived home for dinner, RKO's number one glamor girl had all the furniture in place.

To people who know Jane Russell well, this story is typical of the girl. Once she gets a bee in her bonnet, no matter how dreamy, no matter how violent the objections of experts, she insists upon carrying it through.

According to her All-American quarterback of a husband, their entire home was built on this Russell principle.

"Jane wanted a house in the clouds," Bob says. "On the level. I don't know how she did it, but that's the kind of house we live in. And it's darn well constructed, too." (Continued on page 77)

The one touch of elegance in her simply decorated bedroom is this Chinese screen Jane dreamed of owning, and later found by accident in a decorator's shop. Their bed is same one Bob had as a boy.

"How we made it all in one piece is a wonder," says Sue Ladd. And, as she reclines in a deck chair in mid-ocean, she expects to be told any minute that one of the kids was left home in the rush.

We're Off!

BY SUE CAROL LADD

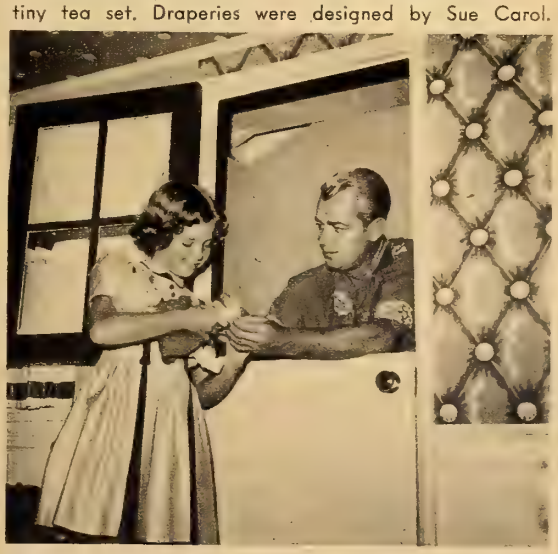
■ I am sitting here on the Ile de France, somewhere in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, in a deck chair that feels like Cleopatra's most cushioned couch. To me, anything would feel comfortable at this point—anything that was horizontal and softer than granite. It's the first time in three months that either Alan or I have been able to sit down without lists of details to be hashed over with each other. It's also the first time I've had a chance to write MODERN SCREEN about our trip. They asked me, weeks ago, to give them a blow by blow account of our evacuation to Europe, but the blows came so fast and furiously that there hasn't been time until this moment.

Frankly, I never thought we'd all board this ship in one piece. I remember one night when Alan came home from working in Desert Legion at Universal-International, and found the usual pandemonium that had been ruling the house for weeks. Some strangers were being shown through the house, people who were considering renting it during our absence. I was on the telephone, talking to someone about sending our car over to England, and David was standing patiently by (Continued on page 105)

JUST BEFORE THEY LEFT, ALAN COMPLETED THIS DREAM PLAYHOUSE FOR THE KIDS

The kids take possession of "The Castle Princess," a model home-ette Alan had built for them. It's all their own—grown ups allowed, but by invitation only!

Five-year-old David dons "formal attire" after spending weeks in overalls as the official foreman for the house. Nine-year-old Alana provided inspiration, Dad, money.



The whole playhouse is scaled to the children's size. Windows are on eye level, chairs fit them perfectly, the piano is a miniature one. Their mother did the decorating.

Alana's first tea party was a social success. Her guest of honor: Alan, of course. She served him with her own tiny tea set. Draperies were designed by Sue Carol.

Even the telephone is scaled to Alana's and David's size. It connects with the main building, and comes in pretty handy when Alana bakes a cake and runs out of sugar.

But no sooner had the house been completed than it had to be locked up tight. They're abroad now, but looking forward to happy hours in their own playhouse soon.

Once in love with Janie...

■ This is a kind of anniversary in a way. A kind of double anniversary for Jane Powell. Just about the time you will be reading this article, Jane and her husband, Geary Steffan, will be celebrating their third wedding anniversary. And Jane will be celebrating her tenth year in Hollywood. It seems proper, then, to take a look back, as sentimental people do, and once again savor the high spots and laugh at the low. And, best of all, look closely at the present.

Well, the present, for Jane and Geary Steffan, is pretty ordinary, if you call things going according to plan ordinary. No great comedy or tragedy is current in their lives. But, as they took stock of things the other day, Jane and Geary sat and smiled like a couple of kids who were close to the last payment on the car or had just finished finally, after several seasons, getting rid of the snails in the lawn. They weren't smug, because anything can happen. But they were, nevertheless, serene in the knowledge that they had accomplished most of what they had promised themselves five years (Continued on page 94)

EVERY GIRL NEEDS SEX APPEAL

■ Just before she took off for Quebec where she is currently co-starring with Montgomery Clift in I Confess, Anne Baxter was sitting in the commissary at 20th Century-Fox, munching a ham and swiss on toast.

A director who's put Anne through the paces in four films, happened to walk into the eatery with Marilyn Monroe.

"Who's that platinum blonde with the poodle cut?" he asked, nodding at Anne.

"Are you kidding?" Marilyn asked.

"No," said the director. "Who is she? Her face teases my memory."

"It should," Marilyn said. "That's Anne Baxter."

The director did a double take. "Anne Baxter?" He walked over to the table and sat down. "Holy catfish!" he exploded. "It really is you, Anne, isn't it?"

Anne Baxter, one of Hollywood's finest dramatic actresses, the brainy, demure, talented brunette who won an Oscar for her marvelous portrayal of a lost woman in Razor's Edge and an Academy Award nomination for her outstanding work in All About Eve has gone on a sex appeal kick.

She has cut her hair short.

She has had it dyed blonde.

She has reduced her weight to 107 lbs.

She has reduced the necklines on her dresses to new and daring lows.

She has posed for cheesecake pictures in bathing suits that leave precious little to the imagination.

She has experimented with wearing artificial beauty marks and eyelashes.

In short, Anne is fed up with the way she's been presented to the public and is determined to become more sexy, more stimulating, more exciting—three adjectives, she feels, every girl should have.

The world thought it knew a lot about Bing Crosby—but here is a new portrait of its idol: a shaken man, deep in sorrow and wishing that the last 20 years had been different.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

This was Dixie Lee in 1930.

dixie and bing: THEIR TRAGIC LOVE

■ One day a few weeks ago a man walked down an upstairs corridor of St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica, California. He had walked it before and knew it well. It was sterile and shiny and very modern. The walls and the floor curved into each other gently so that there'd be no place for dust to collect and the linoleum the man walked on was hard and shiny and made resounding noises as his feet paced his progress. Wide brown doors opened on either side of the hall and they seemed endless. Nurses and nuns passed briskly and nodded politely and some of them smiled.

This man walking down this corridor was probably the most famous man in the world today; better known than kings and better loved than statesmen and great benefactors. And his troubles, if he could have shared them that day, would have gladly been accepted by millions of people who had grown to know him and love him as Bing Crosby, a crooner, a singer of ballads, a flip man with a joke and a handy man with a golf club. Beyond these things he had never been very accomplished, but he had somehow achieved the position of a revered human. Maybe it was because of his family life.

When he reached the rear of the hall, Bing Crosby pushed open one of the brown doors and entered a corner room. A woman lay in the bed, quietly resting in the filtered light from drawn venetian blinds. There were a lot of flowers in the room but little else. Bing walked to the bed and stood looking down at her for a moment, then he touched her hand and they smiled. The woman was pale and thin. She (Continued on page 60)

IT WAS A STORYBOOK MARRIAGE OF AN

Bing was a hard-drinking, fast-living party boy when he first met Dixie; she was the exact opposite. But they were attracted to each other from the start.

Dixie left the movies when she had the twins, Philip and Dennis, in order to devote her time to her children, and other stars quickly took her place.

UNKNOWN CROONER AND A FAMOUS STAR. BUT AS BING ROSE TO FAME, DIXIE RETIRED INTO THE BACKGROUND

They married in 1930, and their first separation came only a year later. Friends blamed it on Bing's adolescent attitude toward responsibility.

When Dixie threatened to divorce him, Bing came to his senses and pleaded with her to remain with him. Their first baby, Gary Evan, came along soon after.

Family life came first, from then on. Bing bought a big home in Rancho Santa Fe, complete with tennis court and pool.

Lindsay completed the Crosby "full house" in 1940. Several years later, Dixie was chosen filmdom's ideal mother. These were happy years.

Trouble started again after all the boys had been born. But, even though they were unhappy, Dixie and Bing stayed together for the children's sake.

Dixie met Bing with a kiss on his return from South America in 1941. Usually shy in public, this was a rare picture.

As early as 1941, newsmen rarely found the whole Crosby family together; Dixie's public appearances were becoming infrequent. Here, her "five boys" welcome her home after a trip.

Bing stayed away from home more and more as his fame increased. When the children were young, Dixie always had plenty to do, taking care of them, but when they went to military school, she was left alone.

As teen-agers, the boys worked each summer on the Crosby ranch at Elko, Nevada. But Dixie preferred remaining alone in the Holmby Hills mansion to roughing it at the ranch.

The most recent time Dixie posed for candids was during an interview with Hedda Hopper in 1948. Since then, she's avoided newsmen, although she made headlines when Bing went to Europe in 1950 without her.

was Dixie Crosby, Bing's wife. She'd been ill a long time.

Although the world thought it knew a lot about Bing and Dixie Crosby, it really didn't. For instance, right at that moment it didn't know that Dixie Crosby was terribly ill, and that this day was, in a sense, a day of atonement, a day of remorse, a time of accounting. It didn't know that here, in this hospital room, its idol was a shaken man, deep in sorrow and pitiful in the wish that his last twenty years had been different.

They stood alone in the regret they shared and they asked no sympathy, for they both knew that this might be the end of their time together. Life never goes on forever, and a grave illness makes people think that way.

Twenty years ago Bing was an unknown troubador and Dixie a rising young movie star. He was penniless and underpaid, and she was making a lot of money and seemed headed for the heights in motion pictures. Bing Crosby, if you knew him in those days, was pretty much a character. Each night he reported for work at the Cocoanut Grove, a night club in the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles and, as part of a trio known as the rhythm boys, banged through a dozen or so songs very much in the manner of a group of male Andrews Sisters. And at the end of each show, Bing, a gregarious lad, sauntered from the stage and sat at the tables with the customers and laughed and chatted and (Continued on next page)

The four Crosby boys are so closely identified with Bing, many people forget it was Dixie who brought them up, and molded them into the well adjusted young men they are today.

This is the Holmby Hills home in which Dixie shut herself away from the world most of the time. Never an avid hostess, not many had seen her home until MODERN SCREEN did a story on it 2 years ago.

Dixie made one of her rare night club appearances, partly to counteract unpleasant gossip, when Bing returned from Europe.

sipped until it was time to go home.

Although he wasn't ever a handsome fellow, Bing was always likeable. And when it was time for him to sing his solo numbers, he leaned back on the piano and closed his eyes and, with all the casual abandon of a kid humming himself to sleep, proceeded to awaken an urge to possess him in all the women in the room. When a local radio station began carrying the program, it soon became evident that better than half the radio sets in Los Angeles were tuned to the station listening to Bing sing. He was the number one romantic rave of the town.

The first meeting between Bing and Dixie took place at a party held after the Cocoanut Grove closed. She was across the room talking to a group of friends and Bing couldn't take his eyes from her. She was a lovely thing, bright as a new dime and filled with a gay humor that made her universally liked. Bing waited for Dixie to come over, as most women did in those days. But she didn't. She ignored him —although later events proved she was just as fascinated as the rest of the women —and pretended to be vitally interested in her own friends. After a while Bing walked over toward her and waited politely until someone introduced them.

Now, despite Bing Crosby's obvious ability to handle all situations, he is by nature a very shy man. And, like most shy men in public life, he has a tendency to be brash when he is most embarrassed. It was that way when he first met Dixie. Casually, he shook hands and made a simple remark or two about how much he enjoyed her work. Dixie accepted the compliments, coolly. And in a few minutes Bing found it necessary to leave her, so he slipped closer and whispered confidentially in her ear.

"Look," he said, "you seem like a very nice girl. Let's get together sometime. Call me, huh?"

Dixie froze him with a glance. "As long as I live," she said, "I'll never call you." And she walked away.

The Crosbys have been married more than twenty years now and to this day Dixie has never called Bing for any reason. It is part of the agreement she made with herself that night.

The courtship of Bing and Dixie Crosby was a rather erratic one. Bing was a young hellion at the time and generous to himself with illicit gin. He was a powerful man, able to tear a phone book in two with his hands and capable of staying on his feet around the clock, and of still doing his show, anytime a party seemed to warrant it. Dixie, on the other hand, was gentle, careful of her career and health and just about as far from being a party girl as you can get. What attracted them to each other is as hard to say as it is with most people. But Bing, from the first meeting, was fascinated and unable to hide it or fight it.

As they grew to like being together more, Dixie changed her entire attitude and started a one-woman campaign to straighten the young singer out. She'd break his gin bottles and cart him off to a Turkish bath every time she thought it wise. She laid down pretty strict rules of deportment, and was a stern disciplinarian whenever Bing broke them. And when they were married, she accepted the responsibilities of being Bing's wife completely. She suffered the disappointments he did and tried to make him like his life better than he had as a single man. She held back nothing of herself to make Bing the husband that she had always wanted to meet and marry.

The first separation came possibly a year after they were married. It was due, their friends say, to Bing's adolescent attitude toward his responsibilities. Bing seemed to want to go on with his partying and playing, considering his contribution to life to be his nightly appearance at the Cocoanut Grove. The papers were pretty aware of Bing in those days, even though he was not at all famous nationally. And they were very aware of Dixie. She was riding on the wave of the new sound that had come to the movies, and was considered the biggest song and dance actress of the day. So, when it was suddenly announced she had gone to Ensenada, Mexico, possibly to get a divorce, the news made the front pages.

Something snapped in Bing Crosby when he read those headlines. He has never admitted his true feelings at that time to anyone, but his actions verify the fact that he was hard hit. He went to Mexico to plead with Dixie to return to him, and he must have done some pretty fancy promising and confessing to himself, for he came back a happy and a changed man. He quit partying, started to take an interest in his career, and started the family that now numbers Dixie and his four sons.

Dixie Crosby has always been Bing's four-leaf clover. If she hadn't come into his life, he might have lived it as a baritone in a trio, or, like the other boys in the group, in some other line of work. With ambition itching him, he quit the Grove and his partners and, with his brother, Everett, went to New York to try to get himself set in the radio business. And in a surprisingly short time, sponsored by the Cremo cigar manufacturers, he was the rave of the nation as the first and best of the crooners.

What has happened to Bing Crosby professionally since that time has been told again and again, but for some odd reason his private life became a great secret. Dixie Crosby quit the movies to start her family and, with a couple of minor exceptions for fun, has never worked since. The gay, exciting young girl crept behind the wall that Bing built for her and seldom came out. The boys were born, one by one, and even then Dixie stayed where she belonged—in the background of Bing Crosby's glory.

It must have been ten years before a serious difference plagued the Crosbys again. All of the boys had been born and were being carefully groomed for manhood. Both Dixie and Bing made each phase of their young lives important. Education, spiritual conditions and an acceptance of responsibilities were the things they concentrated on most, and the world agrees that no sons have been better or more lovingly prepared to face adulthood. But while this was taking place, something was happening to Bing and Dixie Crosby.

Bob Crosby, Bing's brother, once might have hit it on the head. It was at the time, in 1950, when Bing went to Europe alone and the gossip columnists were hinting darkly that Dixie was furious and would do something about it. "Bing," Bob said, "has made Dixie a golf widow. When he isn't working, he's off somewhere playing golf and she has to be alone." Bob backed this statement up with another that he, himself, was going to give up the game because he didn't want the same thing to happen to his family.

Others close to Bing and Dixie had other reasons. One close friend said—and it could have been true—that in all the years they had been married Bing had never given his wife a present. Oh, as he had grown richer with the years she could buy just about anything she wanted, but they say Bing never brought her anything and gave it to her as a token of his love and appreciation. There were those who said that Dixie, alone most of the time and with many idle hours on her hands, had taken to drinking too heavily, and that Bing resented it so much he didn't want to go home. This is pretty difficult to believe, because Dixie has had almost a full time job looking after her boys, and a careful look at them will deny any intimation that they were neglected in the slightest.

However, there was trouble in the Crosby family. While the papers were cagily looking for proof, never being sure they would dare print if they did find it, several bits of information became available to substantiate the report of a rift.

Larry Crosby, the member of the family charged with the public relations, told the press that a property settlement had been reached, but that he was not sure if a divorce or legal separation would result. And someone from the office of John O'Melveny, Bing's lawyer, also admitted that all details except as to method of annulment had been taken care of and that Dixie was in Nevada, with access to a court that could make the legal action a fact in a few minutes. The press was on edge because Bing and Dixie own a large ranch in Nevada, which makes them citizens of that state, and she could have secured a divorce in a few minutes any day she decided to walk into a court.

It must be said to the credit of both Bing and Dixie that neither of them spoke a word publicly about their personal problems, although there must have been anger between them at the time.

Like the cause of the alienation, the cause of the reconciliation, too, was never made public. But it is known that for several years the Crosby home was a home in name only. Even so, the relationship between the parents and their sons never changed.

But that brings us back to today. When a legal separation was decided against, Bing and Dixie picked up their lives together where they had left off, and even though it is said it was never as idyllic as it had been, they tried hard to make things right. They are both devout and sincere Catholics and marriage is a sacrament to them, not just a convenience.

Late 1951 and 1952 were trying years for the Crosbys. Bing was ill and required hospitalization and surgery. Dixie, too, fell ill and had to be in the hospital quite a bit of the time. As their trials increased, though, it seemed their love grew, and during most of 1952 their friends seemed terribly glad that they had had troubles, because they were reuniting the young lovers of twenty years ago. And then came Dixie's latest illness.

Nobody on the inside will, of course, tell just what the nature of the illness was or how serious. But from bits of gossip here and there, stories have been pieced together. Some of them true, no doubt, and some of them fantasy. The most discussed story is that Dixie's doctors decided she needed an operation to make her well. Surgery was performed and afterwards the doctors said that it hadn't been successful, and that Dixie would have to rely on God and nature to heal her. That may be right and it may not, but it is the most believed account.

At any rate, at the time of the operation, Bing Crosby went through the second transformation of his life. Although he was busy with his work, he abandoned it and took a room at the hospital where he could be near Dixie all of the time. For long hours while (Continued on page 97)

I discovered the power of prayer that day I heard the 23rd Psalm above the whine of German bullets . . . and the voice was my own.

WHY I PRAY

by Dale Robertson

■ My mother had fixed me a bed on the porch swing this hot Oklahoma night and then led me out to it. She helped me in and tried talking me into believing that it was nice and cool out there—as mothers will. As if I cared. I didn't care and I didn't answer because I was a ten-year-old boy panicked into dumb suffering. I knew my silence frightened her, made her feel helpless, and I knew it frightened my two older brothers, Roxy and Chet. Their awe and their dread came through in the way they tip-toed around and hushed their voices. But I couldn't help it. That afternoon, my whole happy, carefree world . . . the bright sun, my mother's face, had turned a dirty, puffy grey. I was blind.

The old swing creaked as it always did. The crickets chirped. The street buzzed, (Continued on next page)

(Continued from preceding page) and the film thickened steadily. I knew I was becoming isolated from those around me. I was only ten but I was growing older fast, old enough to know that there could be no help from those who were trying to help me, old enough to lie out on the porch, feeling my mother's troubled touch and trying to keep from crying. That would have been childish, and there was no use being a child any longer.

Then I heard someone coming up our wooden porch-steps and a man's voice asked, "Where is he?" I recognized him as the pastor of the Christian Missionary Alliance Church which we attended sometimes. I heard him walk up to me and then address me quietly.

"Dale, you know me, don't you?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Dale, do you believe in God?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Do you think God can make you see, Dale?" he went on.

"Yes," I told him.

"THEN I'll pray," he said. "And I won't quit until you can see . . ."

Whenever anyone asks me if I believe, or for that matter whenever an evening out here in Hollywood fails to cool off and is a little humid like the summer nights we have out in Oklahoma, my mind goes back to that scene. I remember his praying words, and then how a patch of the grey darkened after awhile and became the silhouette of his head against the lighted living room window . . . and I knew my ordeal was over and I knew I was not going to be cut off from the glory and the color of the outer world. Yes, I believe. Even as that night I knew I was going to see again, I also knew that I would always believe; whatever happened from then on, for the better or the worse, it would never change that.

Many things have happened. But this I have always had to hold on to . . . my belief. This, again and again, and nothing but this. This has given me my philosophy of looking for the good rather than spending any time regretting the bad—in the past or in the future, the bad which has come or the bad which might come. This has made me say about my fate, "If it is right for you, you will get it; and if you don't get it, it wasn't right for you." This I have told others (to a little actress just the other day when she revealed how worried she was about getting a good part) and have seen it give them comfort.

When I started to work in the studios I was so scared, so self-conscious that I simply could not speak or move normally. I would keep wondering what people on the set were thinking of me—the other actors, the grips, the technicians. One day I went back to my dressing room and directed a simple prayer: "Oh, Lord, let me be myself and do my job."

When I was called back for the next scene, I didn't wonder whether my prayers would be answered. I knew there would be some results if it was meant that I should continue to be an actor. As I neared the set I noticed how busy everyone was; each man had a job to do and was concerned with it.

"They're not thinking of me!" I told myself. "How could I have been so self-engrossed as to think that? Why, they would laugh if they knew it."

That was it. How prayers work out sometimes is not always easy to comprehend, but if your faith is real and your heart deserving . . . they work out. This I know.

Many things have happened but always my belief has held me up. As a boy struck by fever or as a soldier struck by enemy mortar fire, this was the big difference. As a young man trying to make a place for himself or as a young father worried about his wife and child in a first birth, this was the big lift. I would not be without it; I would not want anyone else to be without it. I don't know how it comes to them. I don't believe any one religion or church is right and all the others are therefore wrong. I feel the channels to goodness are many and that with belief they all lead to God. I do not have to question whether this is true or not. When you believe, you are past the question. And because I have been past it for a long time I have been happy for a long time.

When General Patton dashed across France and southern Germany and Czechoslovakia after the invasion of Europe, I was a soldier in his famous Third Army. One day he issued an order which frightened the pants off a lot of his men including this Oklahoma boy who was at that moment trying to look the part of a second lieutenant in the 322nd Combat Engineers. The order read: "Hereafter engineers will not stop to remove mine fields during the advance but run through them and suffer the casualties."

Eddie Cantor tells his favorite Jolson yarn: After the first preview of Jolson Story, Al hung around the lobby to listen to the comments. A fan sidled up to him and queried, "Aren't you Al Jolson?" Jolie said, "Yes, I am." The fan said, "Gee, I thought you were dead." Jolie replied, "I was but I'm all right now."

Mike Connolly in
The Hollywood Reporter

Man . . . it sounded awful! If there was such a thing as soldiers voting for or against their general, our general would have been impeached right then. You could hear the grousing on every side. Why? Did he just want to kill us off quicker? Why not remove the mines? Why run through them and get blown to confetti? Why? Why? Why? How this military directive was going to bother me particularly developed the next day in the form of a suspicious-looking road. An advance group in which I was the ranking officer came up to it and stopped cold. I drove to the head of the line in my jeep, saw that they were all looking at me. I knew instantly what they were thinking. The road was probably mined. What about the new order? Would I follow it and order them on through . . . or would I respect their fears and send a detail out to search and remove mines?

I wasn't thinking. I was praying. And I was awfully glad that I could pray with confidence. I knew what I had to do. In the army you are not supposed to ask for volunteers for any job that you wouldn't do yourself. This was that kind of job. While they watched I waved to them to take cover and then I drove ahead and down the road myself. The 23rd Psalm flashed into my head and as I sped along I kept repeating it, or rather two lines from it: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil. . . ."

To this day I don't know what follows after these lines, but these two were enough to do the job. I got to the end of the road where it broke into a clear area and then turned around and returned to the men. They knew now the road wasn't mined and started streaming ahead happily without waiting for a word from me. My heart was filled with a wonderful feeling that I had gotten from my prayers, for hadn't they lifted a load from the hearts of my men as well?

I prayed during the war and I was with men who prayed . . . loud and clear. I had a jeep driver, Donald Granlund, who made no bones about it. One afternoon we were making a reconnaissance along a river and had started back when we ran into trouble. The road ran through a clearing in some woods and the Germans had let our jeep through without firing, in the hope, probably, that other Americans were behind us whom they could also trap. But when we stuck our nose into the clearing on our way back, the devil's own racket broke loose. Donald threw the jeep into reverse and we just pulled back into the safety of the woods in time.

"What are we going to do?" he asked.

The situation was a simple—and hasty—one. We could wait until dark and make a dash for it, provided the Germans didn't come after us . . . which they certainly would. Or we could take a chance and try to crash through right then. I explained this to Donald.

"What do you think?" he asked.

"Because they're sure to come hunting us anyway, I think we're better off to try and make it now," I told him. "But I won't order it if you would rather not."

"Let's go," he said.

I had him back the jeep up until we would have a sufficient run to insure top speed by the time we got to the clearing. Then we rested a few minutes to get our breaths—our last ones maybe—and during this respite I told Donald how the 23rd Psalm had helped me before.

"It's good enough for me," he said.

"Okay . . . let her fly," I ordered.

HE did. He shifted through the gears fast and we hit the open patch and came out into it like a loose bullet—even ricocheting like one as we bounced and sliced along the ruts in the road. If you've ever seen newsreel shots of jeeps being tested hurtling along like horses over the jumps you'll know how we looked. Only it wasn't funny. Death was screaming in sharp whines all around us. I saw three tracer bullets flash by between my eyes and the windshield. The jeep had a wire catcher in front to cut wires or ropes the Germans sometimes stretched across highways just throat high. One second I saw the wire catcher . . . the next it had pinged off. But above all the noise of the bullets and the roaring motor and the car's jouncing I heard something else—a man yelling at the top of his voice. And then I realized it was Donald screaming out the 23rd Psalm and making sure he was heard. He was. Or I was . . . for my prayers were just as fervent.

As long as I live I can never forget the simple, abiding faith with which the people of those war-torn countries faced their tragedies. They succored their wounded, buried their dead and went their way quietly. They didn't need your shoulder to cry on and pretty soon you found out it was because they had Someone else's. It had an effect on us. We felt we were all one people. In a bombed-out French village we found a two-and-a-half-year-old French girl whose whole family had been killed. There were 163 men in our outfit, and without a word of discussion we immediately all became 163 uncles of little Anna Marie David.

It would seem we did a lot for her when we adopted Anna Marie and kept her with us for nearly three weeks. But it was the other way around. Actually, this little moppet brought a glow of warmth to our hearts. It was as if every man yearned to counterbalance the killing he had to do by helping to preserve a life. The bright spot of the day was when you saw Anna Marie (Continued on page 66) smiling over some present or playing about headquarters contentedly. It made us remember that we were men of families, born of love and with those who loved us waiting at home—and this was something we wanted to remember.

Everyone has heard that old saying that there are no atheists in the foxholes. I don't know. In my outfit most of the boys were Italian, devout Catholics. There were a few men who never attended services of any kind and it was assumed by some that they were atheists. I still can't speak for them. But if devotion is holy, then there were no atheists . . . because there wasn't a single man among us who wasn't devoted to Anna Marie and whose heart wasn't wrenched when we finally had to leave her with a Belgium family.

Before I finish, let me get back, in all fairness to his memory, to that order of General Patton's about advancing right through mine fields. Within a week after the order was posted it began to be apparent to us in the engineer corps that the general made sense. It was true that when we ran through a mine field without clearing it we lost men. But when we took count we found we lost fewer men this way than we had before! The reason was that as many men were killed by enemy sharpshooters and mobile artillery as they squatted around removing the mines, as by the mines themselves. By rushing ahead and either taking the German positions, or diverting their full attention to defending themselves, the whole area was made secure and the mines could then be attended to in comparative safety.

"Why didn't the big brass explain all this?" a GI asked one day when we had all come to realize this.

"The ways of women and generals are inscrutable," a buddy of his answered.

"Yeah, I know," grumbled the first GI. "But you can't make love to a general—and that's another thing I've got against them!"

My main reaction to the way things worked out with General Patton's order has to do with prayer. As I have said, the men were sore when it first was issued, and, I happen to know, a lot of them prayed that it wouldn't result in their death. What impressed me was that these prayers had already been answered. The general had known what he was doing in the first place. I feel that he, too, must have prayed that he would be right. And he was. END you're on, kids!

"I don't care," she cried. "At least I won't have to be ordered to sing such and such a song or do this or that picture. I've been in show business all my life and I am full of ideas and feelings on what I want to do. When I want to do them now, I am told to forget about them."

"It's up to you," he replied. "But make sure."

Betty went to Charlie. What she wanted to do was form separate companies for the presentation of their own pictures, stage shows and television productions. "We're a perfect husband and wife team," she pointed out. "You could produce and direct the show. Would you be willing to gamble?"

It was a gamble for Charlie because he had six years of his contract left. Besides, since he was not an actor and did not have to work in front of the camera, advancing age would not lessen his value to the studio to any appreciable extent. He could look forward to a good salary as a director as long as his knowledge of showmanship stayed with him. But his answer was, "It's all right with me."

WHEN Betty made her Honolulu trip to rest up from her New York showing, and her USO trek to Korea which preceded it, she worried about her decision to leave the studio and go on her own. Then she got a wire from Charlie: "Dear Maw, you're on," and knew that it was too late to turn back. The wire meant Charlie had booked her to appear with her own company at the Palladium Theatre in London in September. It would be the start of the new venture. There remained before them only the task of settling their contracts with the studio and they were off.

On her return from Korea, and with Charlie free of picture obligations, they decided to take their long-delayed honeymoon at Lake Tahoe.

The first two weeks there, they were alone in a small mountain cottage. Betty insisted on doing her own cooking and cleaning. It was a wonderful honeymoon, but also one which found them doing some serious thinking at times, because they had chosen to take it when their whole future was up in the air.

Some days they felt they were getting too concerned for their own good so they'd decide to forget about it, relax and have fun. They got to know their vacationing neighbors, Tom and Betty Dwyer, a San Francisco couple, and accepted their dare to take up water-skiing. When they got down to the lake's edge, Charlie felt the icy water and announced that he wouldn't even put his foot into it, let alone try to water-ski over it. Yet after only a few attempts they were both flying across the water like professionals. "You know, I'm awfully glad we learned, instead of quitting," Betty said to Charlie once. "It gives me confidence for what's ahead of us."

Nights when Betty felt like playing the lady, they would dress up and dine at the Cal-Neva Lodge, ordering everything plus the trimmings. The next night she would be back in the cabin trying to do something to a stew to make it taste as good as the steaks of the evening before. Occasionally, Charlie would assure her she had succeeded.

One night Betty achieved new fame—as a card dealer. They were out with some new friends and chanced to find themselves in a gambling room on the Nevada side of the state line. Betty was invited to deal the blackjack game. For the next ten minutes, not a player lost. She handled the deck so that the hole-card was always visible, plus most of the other cards as well. One player needed an eight to win a big bet. Betty fanned the deck to find him one while the gambling manager tore his hair and made frantic signs at her over the heads of the players that such solicitude was not required of a dealer.

One actress catted to another about a third: "No wonder she's so beautiful—she sleeps 15 hours a day!" Sniped the other: "With that conscience?"

Mike Connolly

THEY had their fun. They also had their scares. Betty's cook brought her two little daughters, Lindsay and Candy, along with her and one afternoon when Charlie was chasing Candy he suddenly tripped and went down.

Betty ran up and the expression on his face was so tense that she thought he had broken his leg. He shook his head and said he thought it was just a sprained ankle. "But," he added, in a worried tone, "the last time I had a sprained ankle I was on crutches for three months."

Suddenly she knew what he meant. The rehearsals for the Palladium . . . their first show as independents! These all depended on Charlie . . . on a Charlie who could move about and demonstrate exactly what he wanted.

They called a doctor and, after he had examined the ankle, he diagnosed it as a sprain but not a serious one. Charlie would be as nimble as ever in a week or so. They both heaved a sigh of relief, and they realized they were beginning to learn what it means to be completely on your own.

Then Betty's throat began to bother her again. It was a recurrence of an old complaint. A year before she had been operated on for removal of what the doctors termed "singer's nodules" on her vocal cords. There was a chance now that some minute growths had been overlooked. When they got back to town, this was confirmed, and Betty decided to go through another operation.

Betty came out of the ether a little too soon for her own peace of mind. Her doctors were still in the room, unaware that she had regained consciousness, and she heard the anesthetist congratulate the surgeon. "Frankly, I didn't think you would be able to get those tiny cores of the nodules," he was saying. "It was such delicate going." She closed her eyes. "Oh, murder!" she thought, realizing that only a small fraction of time ago all the remaining song and music within her could have been permanently dammed up by the slightest deviation of the scalpel in the surgeon's hand.

BY the time she was out of the hospital her plans had become known and she and Charlie began to get reactions. Some people feared for her. But the two opinions she valued the most came, respectively, from her hairdresser and from Alan Ladd.

"Now you won't have to live like a Prussian general," said the hairdresser. "Getting up, eating, working, rushing, all on a schedule for the benefit of others." And Alan sent word, "There is nothing else a Betty Hutton could have done."

As this is being read, Betty should be finishing her English tour. When she gets back to Hollywood she is going to star in Some Of These Days, a picture based on the life of Sophie Tucker. Six years ago, when Sophie wrote her autobiography with this same title, she came to Betty and insisted that she was the only one to play her on the screen.

Betty had demurred. "You're too vital," she had told Sophie. "What right do I have to impersonate you?"

"You're crazy!" was the blunt Sophie's reply. "It's you or nobody else."

It will be Betty. And it will be Betty in a lot of other presentations she and Charlie are cooking up. They work together always. They work together so much that often their business talk gets mixed up with their more personal conversations. For instance, one night before they sailed for England, Charlie looked into Betty's brown eyes and asked, "Are you glad you married me?"

She flung a pair of arms around him with the gusto that is typically Betty Hutton's. "If you hadn't married me, I would have had to hire you!" she told him. END

it had to happen

(Continued from page 28) out, entered a cab with a friend of his, Nate Edwards, and drove off. Seymour's mother strode over to the desk clerk.

"Puede Vd. decirme," she began, "si este hombre is John Wayne?"

The clerk smiled and replied in English. "Yes, madame. That's John Wayne, the North American actor."

Seymour's mother still couldn't believe it. "What in heaven's name?" she said, talking more to herself than anyone else, "is he doing in Peru?"

The official answer to that question, the answer Duke gave everyone who asked it, was that he was scouting locations for several motion pictures he plans to make next year, films like Pagoda, Alamo, and a few others.

The unofficial reason for the South American trek is that Duke is still trying to forget his Chata—the pug-nosed Mexican beauty he married in 1946 who is about to divorce him, if she hasn't already.

Chata—the word means pug-nose—is Duke's nickname for Esperanza Bauer Wayne. Esperanza itself means "hope" in Spanish, but, according to Duke and his quick silver wife, there is no longer any hope for a reconciliation. Their marriage is finished.

Before he left for South America, Duke phoned his attorney and said, "Frank, I want you to clean this up. Chata and I are finished. I'm not going to let her keep me dangling any longer. I can't go on like this, waiting for her to make up her mind whether or not she wants me. I've got to keep my self-respect, too. You get together with Giesler and work out some sort of property settlement."

Chata's lawyer is attorney, Jerry Giesler. Like all good lawyers, Giesler prefers reconciliation to divorces, but he himself says, "It doesn't seem as if there's much chance of these two getting together. They've been married six years, you know, and under the law Mrs. Wayne is entitled to 50% of the community property. Mr. Wayne's business affairs, however, are supervised by one of those business management concerns. It's very complicated, and the settlement will take some time to work out. I thought Mr. Wayne would fly to New York for the opening of The Quiet Man, but he evidently decided to stay a while longer in South America.

"I don't know, of course, but my guess is that he'll be back in Hollywood by October at which time, unless circumstances change, Mrs. Wayne will probably file for divorce."

DURING his six-year marriage to Chata, Duke has earned a million dollars and invested a sizeable share in prudent and diversified businesses. A few of his holdings, for example, consist of a hotel in Culver City, oil wells in Jack County, Texas, partnership in a northern California duck club, real estate in Los Angeles, a frozen food establishment called the Polar Pantry, and a four-acre estate in the San Fernando Valley, valued at $140,000.

Since Chata by law is entitled to one half in some of these investments, you can see that Duke's second divorce is going to cost him a pretty penny. In his first marital mishap, his wife was awarded custody of his four children, two girls and two boys, and Duke has been paying for their support since their birth.

In Duke's philosophy of life, money has never been the primary consideration. To Wayne love and loyalty are infinitely more valuable—the love of a good woman and the loyalty of good friends. These are the mainstays of his existence. Pull down one of these pillars and Wayne is lost and miserable, two adjectives which best describe the state of his feelings during the South American junket.

To forget about Chata, Duke wanted to go into another picture immediately. They offered him Vaquero over at MGM, but he wasn't particularly enthusiastic about the script and turned it down. Warner's then came up with Alma Mater, the story of Slip Madigan, the football coach at St. Mary's College. Duke agreed to do that one but first asked Jimmy Grant, one of his writer-pals, to make some script changes. When he was told that the picture wouldn't be ready to go until October, Duke was taken aback. He needed something to take his mind off Chata. He didn't want to hang around the house, because the house reminded him of his wife; and she might show up any minute, and he knew that he'd succumb to her charms, and once more they'd be off on that strange marital merry-go-round.

Duke packed his bags and sub-let Helen Mack's house. Into his own house moved Webb Overlander's relatives. Webb is a friend of Duke's. At the same time, Wayne agreed to rent his house to some socialites from the East for $1500 a month. "Webb's gang'll move out," he told them, "whenever you want to move in."

No sooner had Duke pulled out than Chata returned from Mexico. When she arrived at her house and found strangers there, the fiery Esperanza told them in no uncertain terms to scram. She fired the servants, got in touch with Wayne's lawyer and told him that she had no intention of renting her house. The lawyer explained that she had been notified of Duke's intention and offered her half the rent. Chata, in her characteristically Latin manner, told him it was no soap. She was determined to live in the house, and, as for Mr. Wayne, well, she hoped he was having a fine time in South America.

An aging producer and a young starlet are having a going romance. She's going on nineteen and he's going on benzedrine.

Sidney Skolsky in The New York Post

THE tragic part about the breakup of Duke Wayne's marriage is that he and Chata are still very much in love with each other. They have never fallen out of love; yet they can't live together without fighting—not for any appreciable length of time. And they've come to the conclusion that their heartache outweighs the physical and mental attraction each holds for the other.

Grant Withers and his Cuban girl friend Estrellita, who know Duke and Chata as well as any two people in Hollywood, say, "It's a terrible shame. Here are two wonderful characters who just can't make a go of it. They've tried everything in the book. Maybe it's personality differences, maybe something else. Frankly, we don't know and it's none of our business, but it's a shame, because when those two were happy—well, you couldn't meet a grander couple."

How long were they happy? From all reports, Chata was most happy when she could talk Duke into spending some time with her in Mexico. She's never been particularly ecstatic about life in Hollywood. She has virtually no close friends in the movie colony. Allegedly, whenever Duke went on location, Chata would wing back to Mexico City or Acapulco.

Friends have said from time to time that the crux of the marital difficulty could be traced to Duke's killing work-schedule, that for many years he's had small time for play or social life, that whatever weekend time he did manage, he spent with his four children who range in age from ten to nineteen. Others say it was mother-in-law trouble and Chata's inability to give birth to a child of her own.

Undoubtedly, each of these factors was a contributory cause to the breakup. In all fairness to Duke, however, it must be said that he did everything humanly possible to make Chata happy, except change his own personality. He even went so far as to offer her the leading lady role in Pagoda. Chata starred in three or four Mexican pictures before Duke married her, and he thought for a while that she might be yearning for a career.

Neither that offer nor their second honeymoon in Honolulu this past spring seemed to do the trick.

A few weeks ago Duke finally concluded that he couldn't take any more of Chata's unpredictable behavior and that insofar as he was concerned, the sooner the marriage was dissolved the better.

NOW that he's without a woman he seems lost. In South America he got so lonely that he phoned some of his old pals and asked them to fly into Lima.

Gossips say that Duke has already picked out his third wife, beautiful Maureen O'Hara with whom he starred in The Quiet Man. This picture was shot in Ireland last Summer, at which time Chata flew over with some of Wayne's children by his previous marriage. So there is no truth to the rumor that Duke and Maureen fell in love while making the film. Maureen has since obtained a divorce, but she and Duke haven't seen each other for months.

There is no doubt but what Wayne will get married again. More than 90% of the men who have been married twice try it a third time, and Duke is not going to be an exception. He doesn't mind working hard—in fact, he loves making movies more than anything else on earth. But when he finishes a hard day's work, he likes to go home to a woman, an easy chair and a drink.

At 45 a man becomes a slave more or less to his habits, and these are Duke's. Without them he's unfulfilled. Not that you'll ever hear him complain. He's too stoic for that.

One of his pals who made the South America trek with him and has since returned, says, "Years ago, it was different. I remember when Josephine divorced Duke (his first wife was Josephine Saenz), it hurt him, of course, because underneath everything he's a sensitive guy, but he took it in stride. Back then he'd call up some of the old gang, they'd go camping and carousing for a couple of weeks. Now Duke can't do that. To begin with, he hasn't got the urge and he's got too many picture committments. A very funny thing about this guy—the better his career, the worse his married life.

"Right now he's got three pictures out, Jim McLain, The Quiet Man, and Jet Pilot, but look what's happened to his marriage? Maybe it's because he has a yen for Latin-American girls, and they're not his type. He'll probably marry the same kind again—but somehow I'd like to see him try an American girl. He's the most American guy I know, and I think he should marry some corn-fed babe from Iowa."

Duke's only answer to his marital breakup is to schedule as many pictures and as much work for himself as possible. Work, he believes is the only anodyne for heartache. END what really happened between rita and aly?

(Continued from page 35) comprehend how he could be such a god for them, and such a fun loving playboy in France. She accused him of hypocrisy. The surprised Prince advised her to return to France to await his return in Cannes.

"Aly was the most amazed man in the world when Rita took off for America," a close friend of Aly's told me. "They were quite friendly when he saw her off from Africa. And he called her every day in France and not a word did she say about coming to America. He had to read that in the newspapers. He had no advance information then about the Nevada divorce, which Rita didn't conclude. Can you wonder why Rita baffles him?"

Baffling or not, he loves Rita in his fashion, which isn't the American way. But he made a point of seeing Affair In Trinidad the day he landed in New York. Then he immediately called her in Beverly Hills to tell her how beautiful she looked in the film, "even though I think it's an imitation of Gilda." Rita agreed, but said, "It's making money." "Anything you're in would make money," replied the Prince charmingly. It's easy to see why she loves him!

Once Rita had decided she wanted Aly again, she just couldn't wait for him to arrive in Hollywood. Called him on the boat every day, then telephoned him in New York to invite him to stay with her. But the Prince, who is more worldly than Rita, decided that until she was 100% sure she wanted the reconcilation, his staying at her house would compromise her and nullify the abortive divorce proceedings. And it was Aly who cautioned Rita on this, which gives you an idea of the reversed situation. Rita is only cautious when she is not in love.

Poor Princess Rita. She would have liked Aly to have spent 20 out of 24 hours a day in the house on Alpine Drive. But even on that brief jaunt to Hollywood, Aly had to go to the races at Del Mar.

THE Charles Vidors, witnesses at their wedding and close friends of both, wanted to throw a big party for Aly in Hollywood. But Rita wouldn't hear of it. She explained to them and other friends of the Prince that he was here to see the children and her, and she didn't think big parties were in order. But because of her friendship with Doris Vidor and Charles, Rita finally consented to a small gathering. And another small soirée at Cole Porter's house. But up to the last minute no one could be sure she would come to either.

In fact, no one can be sure about anything with Rita—except her love for her children. And for a playboy with a roving eye, it's surprising how much Aly loves the children, too. If Rita had any defenses up, they were down when Aly walked in the house here with the chauffeur staggering behind him under the weight of 15 pounds of toys. And when Yasmin accidentally swallowed sleeping pills, her father was so distraught he even forgot to comb his hair for the reporters, dashing with Rita to the nearest hospital stomach pump. His concern cemented Rita's determination to give the marriage another try—if Aly so willed it.

The mystery to me is why Rita ever left the guy in the first place. She knew he was a Moslem, she knew he was a playboy. She knew her life would have to be different. And quelle difference, as the French say. We should all live like this.

Aly actually owns eleven houses—five in Ireland where he breeds horses, a beautiful home in London's swankiest section, plus a country place in Paris and a three hundred acre stock farm elsewhere in France. And his estate in Cannes is the showplace on the Riviera. When it was owned previously by Maxine Elliott, Prime Minister Churchill and all the crowned and uncrowned kings of Europe were constant guests.

There's another chateau in Deauville. All the homes are fully staffed with servants. In the Paris house alone, there's a chauffeur, butler, maid, cook, kitchen maid, nurse for the children, supplemented by Aly's valet and Rita's own personal maid. There are no problems of housekeeping. Aly has a very efficient French secretary who speaks perfect English.

There was a story that Aly was broke and dependent for support on his father, the fantastically wealthy Aga Khan. But this isn't quite the truth. Aly is perennially hard up because he lives in such majestic style, but there's enough to pay for everything, including his gambling debts which are always high. He recently settled a little debt of $100,000 with the Big Casino in Monte Carlo.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Several years ago at the stage door entrance of the Majestic Theater in New York a group of teenagers were waiting to see various members of the cast. One group in particular had come to snap the picture of the handsome understudy for the male lead in Carousel.

Those fans who were wise enough to save their photos of the unknown now possess a candid of that sensational Howard Keel.

Clarissa Hedges

But it isn't true that he used Rita's money to pay more pressing bills. Most of Rita's spare cash went to square Orson Welles' income tax with Uncle Sam. I haven't peeked at Aly's bank book, but I'm sure he'll never have to live off his wife.

IT'S too bad Rita doesn't care over-much for clothes. She can charge it to Aly at Jacques Fath, Balenciaga, and all the top notch Parisienne couturiers. But all those times she was dressed to the teeth at the opera, the race tracks at Longchamps and Ascot, she'd have given the gowns away to be comfortable in a bandana, sweater and blue jeans, which is how she greeted Aly when he arrived for the reconciliation.

Most girls would have worn their best bib and tucker—but not Rita. She didn't have any makeup on either. She never cared for jewels, but Aly has given her some beautiful diamonds. And in her maddest moments of flight, she didn't leave them behind. She isn't a horse racing fan. But Aly put some of his finest horse flesh in her name, and to the best of my knowledge, has never taken them back.

In the matter of horses and women Aly is a chip off the old Aga. He's a partner with his father, with the four footed fillies —fifty-fifty of everything. And he listens to his advice re the women in his life. The Aga is strongly in favor of his son staying married. He would have preferred another son for Aly and Allah, but the old man adores Yasmin. Rita has more of a problem with the Aga's wife, who started life in as poor circumstances as Rita. I believe she was a waitress. But the Begum mistook Rita's shyness for stand-offishness, and the weather between them has always been cool.

But none of the power, the pomp and the money has meant a nickel in terms of happiness for Rita. When she asked a million dollar settlement for Yasmin, it seemed as though she were money mad. She never has been. She was just trying to make darn sure that Aly's only daughter had as big a settlement as his two sons. With Moslem thinking, this could never be.

Some sourpusses spread the tale that Rita wanted the reconcilation merely to get a hunk of the Aga's money for her daughter. But Rita doesn't need anyone else's dollars. She can make as much as Aly can spend. Her Beckwith Company is in partnership with Columbia. She earned quite a bit on Carmen. And while Trinidad was no great shakes as entertainment, as Rita told Aly, it's making money. lots of it. So she didn't have to pretend to Aly that she loved him, prompted by any financial insecurity. I think she just had to get away from him to realize that if she loves him she'll have to accept him on his terms, or not at all.

RITA learned the hard way that Aly can't be stampeded into any situation, although the wisenheimers insist he was stampeded into marriage and subsequent parenthood with Rita. I don't believe it. If that were true, why should he have wanted to resume the marriage.

And he does want it to last. And this bothers him more than it does Rita. That's why he begs her to continue her career. A busy girl doesn't have the time or the inclination to mope while her husband is dashing all over the world. Why doesn't Rita go with him? Come closer kiddies and I'll tell you a little secret. When Aly was courting Rita, she simply loved to fly. When they were married, she confessed she is terrified in planes. And Aly rarely travels any other way. The only reason he came by boat this last time was because he wanted to relax on board deck and look real rested when he saw Rita. But he flew back. She likes to travel but leisurely, by car, or train, or boat. And she hates to leave the children. So she'll have to do a lot of deciding. And a heck of a lot of compromising.

I hope she is as sure of her feelings as she tells Aly. Because a month before he arrived in Hollywood she was having a mad whirl with Kirk Douglas and after two dates was sure she wanted to marry him. But something went wrong on the third date, and Rita was out when he called for a fourth.

Three days before Prince Aly appeared she dated Richard Greene, even appeared at a party with him. And she hates parties. Before Dick or Kirk there was a little fling with Cy Howard, who replaced his bedroom photo of Lana Turner with one of Rita.

SO who knows what the end of this idyll will be. One thing, Rita, don't let yourself get fat again. She is so beautiful when slender and with red hair. Aly prefers it naturally black and long. Orson made her dye it blonde and cut it short. Her studio prefers auburn and medium length. You can tell by her hair the direction of Rita's heart.

But this is for sure. The book of Rita's romances isn't yet finished. The final chapter has yet to be written. I sincerely hope she'll be able to write, ". . . happily ever after." END

quiz kid

(Continued from page 43) called him and sometimes they'd quiz him back. "What you collecting all this studio dope for, R. J.? Going to be a movie star when you grow up?" But they'd scan appraisingly the sculptured features, handsome eyes and flashing smile of the curious kid even as they razzed him.

"I don't know about that," Bob would state seriously. "But I'm sure gonna be in the picture business someday."

By now Bob Wagner has done just what he said he'd do. He's in the picture business, and in solid. Not as a star, yet, although he's zooming that way with the speed of an F-86. Already he has six pictures to his account, and such varied roles as the touching shell-shocked paratrooper in With a Song in My Heart and the comic Willie in Stars and Stripes Forever. Bob has earned the rave praises of everyone who's worked with him, including his boss at Twentieth Century-Fox, Darryl Zanuck, who calls his big boyish actor, "the freshest and most promising young personality we have on the lot."

All this is no surprise to the locker room at the Bel-Air CC where Bob still hangs around every spare moment and where by now his status is considerably changed. The skinny caddy who was just "Dude Wagner's inquisitive kid" has sprouted to six foot-plus, his cornsilk mop has deepened to brown, he strips down to lean, hard muscles and has to shave his long jaw every day. He's twenty-two and a man. The aging idols he used to caddy for are often his golf partners today and he gives them a hard time on the course with his sizzling game.

But when he breaks it up by taking off in his maroon convertible, grinning, saying, "So-long. Have to run. Got a date," he gets the same affectionate razzing he used to. They call him "Lover Boy" then and "the Beau of Bel-Air" and sometimes his dad's favorite tag, "Dynamite."

In another respect Bob Wagner hasn't changed. They still call him "the Quiz Kid," because he's still eternally asking questions, not only around the club but wherever he goes. In fact, as he departed just the other day, a member cautioned "Better be nice to R. J., boys. He'll be hiring you some day. I never saw a kid so movie crazy. He used to be, he is now and believe me, he always will be!"

But in less informed circles, until recently at least, Bob Wagner has been sold short. Because he's so young, so glib, sociable and easy going, because of his social and well-to-do family and his private school and country club boyhood, and because he does like the ladies, notably Debbie Reynolds, the portrait of young Robert Wagner around Hollywood has too often been drawn as a butterfly playboy dabbling in pictures for the glamorous heck of it. Nothing could be more cockeyed.

It's true enough that Bob's a hometown boy and that he had plenty of top echelon Hollywood connections who could and did help him get a break. But there have been more hollow headed pretty boys with pull than you could dig out of Hollywood oblivion with a bagful of niblicks, and actually the hometown ones have always found it rougher than the rest to hole out their opportunities at a studio. Bob Wagner has made his shots stick at the flag, and he's driving straight down the fairway today only because he knew what he wanted and went after it aggressively, sensibly and for real. Being blessed with the native curiosity of a litter of kittens hasn't hurt him, either.

Since he arrived there three years ago, Bob has been prowling around the Twentieth Century-Fox lot like a tourist, poking into the cutting rooms, prop sheds, wardrobe racks, recording and dubbing stages, portrait galleries, even the paint shop, pestering people with "how come" on details about how movies are made. On all of his six jobs he's arrived with time clock precision throughout the picture, to watch and learn, even though sometimes he worked only a couple of days. He hauled home both a tuba and a sax making Stars And Stripes Forever and kept his Bel-Air neighbors awake nights until he could look like one of Petrillo's boys in the Sousa band. Though his part was brief, he cornered Jane Froman herself, out to record "With A Song In My Heart" and pumped her with questions once for four straight hours until that game gal gasped, "Well, Bob, now that you've got my life story, how about telling me yours?"

Already Bob has snatched two chances to cover the country and meet the people. On his tour of 80 cities after Let's Make It Legal, Bob got a call from a girl in the lobby of his New York hotel. She said she'd like his autograph. He told her to come right up, and, when he opened the door, 45 filly fans of his pranced in. He lost a gold pin, two shirts, three neckties and a cherished trench coat in the melee, but he was very happy about the whole thing. "I found out more about them than they did about me," he gloated. Returning by train from another COMPO tour recently, Bob struck up a gabfest with a stranger, naturally on the subject of Hollywood and the movies. Through a couple of states, Bob held forth enthusiastically on the glories of the picture business until his club car companion finally asked him, "Say, what's your racket out there, Bud? Press agent?"

Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Wagner, Sr., encourage young Bob in his movie career. Bob gets helpful business advice from his father, a steel executive.

So the locker room man was right. Bob Wagner is movie crazy. But, I submit, crazy like a fox. At Helena Sorrell's drama coaching department, for instance, Bob Wagner is such a standard fixture that she calls him "My Boy." Bob has haunted her so thirstily for instruction that he's made 56 tests with young hopefuls on his own time and by now can build up his scenes like a Barrymore. In fact, that's just what he did not long ago with very constructive results.

They had an option test coming up for a girl starlet, whose contract was on the shaky side, so Helena, Bob and Jeffrey Hunter got their heads together to make a miniature movie which could keep her stock soaring with the big bosses. Jeff played a suave older smoothie and Bob a bumbling, boyish lover with the girl in the middle of the contrasting suitors. Well, once Wagner got started on the funny business of bashful love the test grew and grew, because about every day Bob would comeup with "Look, I got an idea," which was so funny they just had to keep it in. But when they finally screened it for Darryl Zanuck, the outcome was gratifying, indeed. Not only did the girl get her contract renewed but Zanuck, impressed by Bob's comedy, scratched Rory Calhoun's name from the Stars And Stripes cast sheet and pencilled Bob Wagner in for Willie, his biggest part yet. So spreading yourself can pay off when you least suspect it, and that's what Bob Wagner has been doing just naturally ever since he was addressed and delivered to Hollywood at the tender age of seven.

The above is no idle figure of speech, because Bob actually did travel to Hollywood with a tag tied to his coat button reading, "Deliver this boy to Mrs. Pierce, Hollywood Military Academy, Hollywood, California." After printing those instructions, his dad boosted him up the pullman car steps, and slipped ten bucks to the porter to see Junior safe to his destination, all by himself via the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fe. Young Bob made the trip without even one mishap!

The reason for this hurry-up juvenile solo was to get Bob under the wire for the California fall school term. His older sister, Mary Lou, was already in school there at Marymount and the whole family was due to follow as soon as R. J. Senior, who had been successful in the paint business, could retire and enjoy life in sunny Southern California. But first there were business and household matters to wind up in Detroit, where Robert John Wagner Junior was born February 10, 1930.

Even at seven both Bob's athletic body and passion for sports had already got off to a pretty strong start. The first home he remembers was on Fairway Drive, just a mashie shot away from the second hole of the Detroit Golf Club links, and he played around with a putter and golf balls before he could walk.

Bob started his long list of schools at Brookside, a Detroit private academy for refined little gents, but summers he shook himself loose at the log cabin Wagner summer home on Northport Point by the lake. Exploring the wonders of the world there, he survived kicks from the family pony, canoe duckings, tumbles down sand dunes and one wild swing with an axe which almost chopped off his foot instead of the tree he'd aimed at. But finally he learned to swim, ride and fish and eventually hauled in the biggest catch yet pulled out of the bay, although his dad had to hold him in the boat to keep it from being vice versa.

Bob remembers a boyhood full of adventure that was marred by few restrictions on his personal freedom. He's always been pals with his father and mother and they're still his best friends. There's an easy going, relaxed, joking but affectionate relationship between Bob and his folks today that testifies to their sound, understanding job of raising a boy. "We just guided R. J.," his father admits, "we never reined him in. But, to tell the truth, he never needed it." That doesn't infer by any stretch that Bob was ever a panty-waist or a sis. On the contrary, from the start Junior Wagner got mixed up in all the rugged outdoor sports that California offers its sons. (Continued on next page)

Headquarters was the house his dad built by the Bel-Air golf course and later switched to the old Bel-Air stables, now the swank Bel-Air Hotel, where another kid who craved excitement named "Dare" Harris, now known as John Derek, kept a horse and a BB gun. Bob acquired the same equipment.

"We declared war immediately," he reminisces fondly, "and had point-blank battles all around the stalls." When that palled, they carried the skirmishes up and down the Bel-Air hills, hoss-opera style, until Bob got shot in the mouth and his mother took away his artillery.

The surrender channeled him into a more safe and sane athletic program, which, with the Club so handy, was easy. In no time Bob was pretty slick at golf, tennis, and swimming, and you can spot this training right away when you see him today, in the graceful way he moves and his long, streamlined build. When his dad acquired a ranch in the San Fernando Valley and stocked it with horses, Bob devoted himself to collecting all the cups and trophies for equestrian skill around Los Angeles County. Today he's got enough scattered around his room to start a small hardware store. And then there were all the campus sports—basketball, baseball, diving, football. Bob was on so many teams he can't remember them, but, for that matter, he went to so many schools it's hard to recall all those, too. In fact, Bobby Wagner piled up what must be an all-time, all-California record for campus trotting until he finally graduated from Saint Monica's at eighteen. "I made them all," he admits, "all except reform school. I can't understand how I missed that."

Bob blossomed most, though, at Cal-Prep, where the system was to treat boys like men. Students were on their own there. They could smoke in their rooms, buddy with the profs, manage their own study time, ride their own horses. Up in the Ojai Valley, Bob settled down, became an activity man and a member of the student body council. He wound up being senior class president at Saint Monica's, where homesickness for his folks and Hollywood brought him back for his last year.

All this private education may smell like money, and it's true that Bob Wagner's family has never been on relief and probably never will be. But the picture of a pampered rich boy doesn't fit R.J., and it burns him to a crackling today when that's how he's painted. Bob's dad isn't and never was a rich man, but a successful business man who made a good living and still does. Although he arrived in California to take it easy after piling up some security, sitting around in the sun soon drove him wild, so he got back in the paint business again, switched to steel and now represents several Eastern companies on the Coast. Self-made himself, he has always plugged that idea with his son.

"We had a deal," Bob says. "Whatever I earned, Dad would match it. But I had to earn something first or it was no dough." From his caddy days on, Bob never missed wangling a summer job.

Frankly, Bob Wagner likes the girls and the girls like him and it's a pretty old and mutual habit. As far back as his Harvard Military School days he was going steady with pretty Sue Moir, just as he is today with sweet-faced Debbie Reynolds. In between Bob has enthusiastically lived up to the courtly nicknames they still toss his way. With his charm and looks it would be a shame if he hadn't. Like everyone else, a lot of his dates told him, "You ought to be in pictures," and a lot of them knew what they talked about. Among his first girl friends were daughters of first line Hollywood families—like Gloria Lloyd, who's Harold's daughter; Melinda Markey, who's Joan Bennett's, and Michele Farmer, who calls Gloria Swanson "Mom."

His own family, too, had scads of Hollywood friends stemming from the days when R. J. Senior sold paint for movie sets and traveled around the studios. The Wagners' long standing as Bel-Air Club members too, where Bob's dad is on the board, had established them in a social set that takes in an important part of the movie colony. Wherever Bob turned he could find someone, young or old, with a studio connection—like one of his best friends, Jack Anderson, who married Joan Bennett's other daughter, Diana. And they all were eager to say, as Jack did one day to Solly Baiano, the Warner casting chief, "I know a kid named Bob Wagner who'd be great in pictures."

"Send him out," said Solly.

Now that happens all the time to good-looking young men in Hollywood who have the right entree. So there's no point in saying that Bob Wagner's chance came hard. But making the chance pay off is strictly another thing. Bob went out to Warners, for instance, and nothing came of that. He traveled around the studios a lot on introductions but, after all, what did he know? Facing up to it, Bob came right back to the bleak fact that as far as dramatic experience was concerned, all he could point to was a military school playlet, The Life Of John Alden, in which he played—hold everything—Priscilla!

That's why it was easy for his dad, who had a business career for Bob in mind, to argue logically that he should take a crack at the steel game when he graduated from Saint Monica's. That Easter vacation R. J. Senior took Bob on a tour back East, to all the steel mill towns, to show him what it was about. That summer he hired him on as a junior salesman and for a while Bob did his best. But then one day he had to let his dad have it:

"It's just no good," he told him. "I've got this picture business in my system and I've got to either get it or get it out. How about it? Will you stake me for a year while I try?"

R. J. Wagner had been a sportsman all his life. "I'm your dad, aren't I?" he grinned. "Tell you what. Bill Wellman's starting a picture. I'll ask him what he can do."

Wild Bill called from MGM two hours later, "Get on out here, R. J.," he ordered. "We'll make you an actor." But of course it wasn't as easy as that.

WHAT Bob did was a tiny bit in The Happy Years, a baseball catcher to be exact, with a grilled mask over his face. He said, "Come on, pitch it down here!" and probably he didn't say it very well. But that didn't matter. Bob Wagner was up in the clouds. He was in the picture business, officially at least.

Of course, that brief exposure really meant nothing at all. Bill Wellman doesn't make pictures all the time, for one thing, and Bob Wagner wasn't out after one-line parrot bits anyway. He knew he was gourd-green, but he wanted to set about this thing right. A lot of people gave him good advice—John Hodiak, whom he'd caddied for; Alan Ladd, whose daughter Carol Lee he'd dated; dozens more. Their counsel was sound: Get an agent, get experience, get into some little theatre shows. Go on, just do it. But easier said than done. Bob was still asking questions but not getting the right answers, and the months were slipping by when suddenly the lightning struck. A piano-playing friend of his, Lou Spence, was trying out some ma- (Continued on next page) terial at the Gourmet restaurant in Beverly Hills, and Bob and his folks went there for dinner. Bob likes to sing, has a good voice, too. So between courses he leaned over the piano with Lou and joined in on "Tea For Two." That's when the waiter brought the note: "If you'd be interested in picture work, come see me at the office—and better bring your parents." Bob looked that young, and he was, just nineteen. The talent spotter was Henry Willson, who's an old hand at such things. He's helped a dozen stars get started—Guy Madison, Rory Calhoun, John Derek, to name a few. After Bob called around, with his dad to the Famous Artists office the next day, things started rolling fast.

Before he knew it, he was up for a test at Fox, doing a love scene with pretty Pat Knox and perspiring so profusely he had to take a shower afterwards. "They still call me 'the sweater' out there," Bob grins. But getting all hot and bothered paid off. He won a four month option. In other words a "You look good, we'll see, hang around." But Bob was too steamed up for that passive role. Henry Willson routed him right away to MGM where a free-for-all elimination contest was going on—the prize, a lead in Teresa. Fred Zinneman was screening a hundred-odd young actors, some pulled clear out from Broadway, for the part of a young psychoneurotic. "For me," Bob allows, "that was easy. I was so nervous I was a psychoneurotic!"

Anyway, he emerged from the contest definitely the red hot favorite, and word like that gets around. Fox didn't let his option dangle any longer. They put him right on the team and four weeks later he was playing the beardless Marine in Halls Of Montezuma which came easy too, because Bob had just seen a stretch of service with the USMC Reserve.

SINCE then, in The Frogmen, Let's Make It Legal, With A Song In My Heart, What Price Glory and Stars And Stripes Forever, Robert Wagner has pretty well proved it was no crazy kid idea that propelled him toward the picture business back in his caddy days. While none of his jobs yet is anything to cop an Academy nomination, they've earned him the tag, "a young Montgomery Clift," and a bundle of bouquets from far and wide.

But, if there have been some swift and important changes made in Bob Wagner's Hollywood prospects, there are very few alterations evident in R. J. himself. He's still pretty much the friendly, grinning, inquisitive guy, with his eyes roaming around looking for fun and excitement. Being an eager beaver hasn't made Bob a dull boy. It's safe to say that R. J. Wagner has more friends and less enemies than any unattached young male in town of all ages and stages of Hollywood eminence.

He's a familiar fixture at the homes of John Hodiak and Anne Baxter, Richard Sale and Mary Loos, the writers, the Walter Langs, the MacDonald Careys, the Dick Widmarks, Clifton Webb—all older than Bob—and a particular pal of "Dooley" Dan Dailey's. The young married set, like Dale and Jackie Robertson, Jeff and Barbara Hunter and Rory and Lita Calhoun keep him just as busy, and the young unmarried set (female) even busier. Or perhaps it's the other way around.

Besides his best girl, Debbie Reynolds, Bob occasionally spreads his favors among Barbara Darrow, Melinda Markey, Pat Knox, June Haver, Anita Eckberg, and Susan Zanuck—to list a few. When Dan Dailey became a bachelor-about-town a while back he immediately buttonholed Bob. "You really can't use all of that talent yourself, Lover Boy," he ribbed him

"Come on, give us a look at the little black book!"

Bob takes the gag goodnaturedly, but actually the wolf skin doesn't fit. In fact, Bob thinks it's some kind of a crazy joke to call him a Casanova on the $35 his dad doles him out weekly from his studio paycheck. If there is any serious heart interest for Bob, of course, it's Debbie Reynolds who first met Bob right on his own studio lot and immediately tabbed him "a real crazy cat." By now Debbie knows different. In fact, she's the biggest booster Wagner has. "A serious, sensitive actor, this boy," she'll tell you today, and Debbie ought to know.

They've been chasing to movies (still Bob's favorite form of entertainment) practically every date of the world, and so far the most furious battles they've had have been who was good and who was lousy in the show and why. Actually, Debbie Reynolds and Robert Wagner are pretty much in the same Hollywood boat. Both are homegrown, both tackled Hollywood as green as grass and both have come through—Debbie further than Bob and a little faster, but as she says, "Just stick around." You get essentially the same answer when you ask either one about such things as engagement or marriage. "Just not on the docket for either of us, that's all," Bob says frankly, "although there's no one like Debbie. She's great—just great."

WHILE Bob's attractions for the girls are obvious—he's a snap dancer, tailor's dream and keeps them laughing with a running patter of very funny talk—feminine attractions for Bob fit only part of his program. He's still a great family boy, goes fishing with his dad, and squires his mother to dinner and shows just like any younger date. The athletic kick he's owned since infancy still gallops strong in his blood, and he could no more get along without his golf, tennis and swimming than he could without the bushels of food which make his mother despair, "I can feed R. J., but I can't fill him."

Bob will have to take on that problem himself in short order. Because the Wagners are leaving Bel-Air soon and moving south to LaJolla where R. J. Senior can take things easier as he'd planned to 15 years ago. Since coming back from Camp Cooke and his Army Reserve service last summer, Bob has started hunting for an apartment for himself and his cat, "Rudy," but nobody around the Wagner household is worrying about Bob's being lonely or starving to death.

The only qualms that Mr. and Mrs. Wagner nurse about casting R. J. adrift are the accidents that seem to threaten his life and limbs whenever he leaves home. Up at Lake Arrowhead last year Bob was water skiing double with his pal, Jim Aubrey, behind Dan Dailey in a speedboat at 30 m.p.h. when he spilled, and Jim, on the long rope, cracked into his head, knocking him out cold and sending him plummeting to the bottom like a rock. Jim pulled him out in time, but Bob reaped a brain concussion, also a split ear drum, and he's had migraine headaches ever since.

Then, travelling out of Chicago on the train, the engine smacked an automobile at a grade crossing and the wreckage almost flew in the window of Bob's roomette. And there was that car crash Easter Sunday on the Coast Highway riding with Susan Zanuck when a Model-A hot rod smacked Bob's car broadside for no good reason at all. Luckily, the door flew open and Susie popped out like a cork with no damage, but Bob suffered a severe cut on his eye from the flying glass.

But if Bob Wagner can only keep himself all in one piece, it doesn't look as if the world around Hollywood will be very cruel to Junior. He knows what he wants and by now it's pretty certain he has what it takes to get it. And by now too, his old man, who at one time wasn't too certain about the latter, is pretty confident and proud of his namesake.

When the steel mills closed down in the Big Strike a few weeks ago R. J. Senior had time at long last to see Bob in action. He strolled on the set of Stars And Stripes Forever, watched fascinated as his son emoted, and then strolled off arm-in-arm with Bob. "Well, R. J.," he grinned at the stage door, "I'm glad somebody in the family's working steady!"

From all the evidence it looks as if Bob Wagner will be working steady around Hollywood for a good long time to come. That is, if he keeps on asking questions and getting the right answers. Already he's collected the ones that count. END

house in the clouds

(Continued from page 51) In contrast to Bob, who made only one demand ("All I want is a den"), Jane knew exactly what she wanted. At times she was the despair of the architect, Kemper Nomland, Jr., but after four years of observing the Waterfields in their house, Kemper agrees it's ideally suited to them.

In 1948 when the Waterfields decided that they could afford a house and pool, Jane took over, going about the job in her characteristically direct manner. First-off, she asked every real estate broker along Ventura Boulevard to show her any lot he had in the hills overlooking the San Fernando Valley.

THERE are only about 2,000 such lots, and Jane swears she visited about 90% of them. After weeks of endless tramping, her patience was rewarded. She found "exactly what I wanted." The Waterfield property consists of four lots at the end of a near-vertical climb. Wild hills surround three sides of the land while from the fourth, the breathtakingly beautiful valley stretches out below. Actually, the property was once a hill. A previous owner merely leveled off the top as a house site, then changed his mind and decided not to build.

Jane envisioned this leveled area as the ideal spot for a pool. Her house, she felt, would hug the hills on two levels with a portion of the living room cantilevering over the garden. This, in essence, is the plan that Kemper Nomland drew up.

"I chose Kemper as our architect," Jane explains, "because I've known him all my life. His father built homes for mother and my grandparents, and I knew he was honest. He also combined a knowledge of solid old-fashioned construction and an education in modern design. That's the exact combination Bob and I wanted in our house, something built of stone and wood like a 17th century English manor house and something with all the glass and openness of contemporary homes."

To hear Jane tell it, she and Robert (she always refers to her husband as Robert) were a pair of dillies as clients.

"We questioned Kemp and we argued with him about construction and design, and in the end, he always compromised because, after all, we were the people who were going to live in the house."

One main bone of contention concerned the beams of the living room ceiling. Jane wanted heavy beams to give the 45-foot room the warmth you get from natural woods, at least the impression of warmth. The architect argued that structurally beams were unnecessary. "I don't care whether we need them to hold up the roof or not," Jane said. "I want beams."

Hear about the guy who went snow-blind seeing so many French pix? His medic blamed it on all those white pillow cases.

Mike Connolly

Another argument in which Jane emerged the winner dealt with the front entrance. Jane explained that she wanted to be able to step into every room in the house from the front door. The sorely-tried architect said jokingly, "Look, Jane, I don't know how I can do that unless we built a front hall up through the middle of the house like an elevator shaft."

"Exactly what I want," Jane said. "You tunnel up through the center of the house. Then I'll be able to carry groceries from the carport to the kitchen without having to tramp around to a service entrance. It'll be good for Robert too. He'll be able to sneak right into his den without going through the living room."

The "tunnel" Jane insisted upon turned out to be her home's exceedingly fascinating front entrance. Lighted from above by a translucent skylight, a polished redwood stairway curves up one flight from the carport to the house proper. In the curve of the stairs are tropical plants and a stone Buddha that was once part of the Clover Club bar. When the Clover Club burned down, Jane bought the Buddha from a salvage company.

IN furnishing her highly individualistic house, Jane worked with three interior decorators. She needed three to get the particular fabrics and furniture pieces she wanted. It is basically her taste, however, which the house reflects. Russell isn't the type who puts anything in her home because someone else thinks it belongs there.

Her enormous living-dining room has been so carefully furnished to scale that you overlook its tremendous size until the room is filled with people. It can hold more than a hundred without appearing at all crowded. Its bigness is minimized because it's divided into several areas on different levels.

The dining area is one step up from the rest of the room. It has one long simple Chinese table and eight chairs set out in front of a solid window wall.

The "fire pit" is two steps below the main floor level. Two over-sized couches are set at right angles in front of a large flagstone fireplace. Someday Jane wants a leopard or zebra skin rug in front of the fireplace, but at the moment, two Navajo rugs cover the floor and harmonize surprisingly well with two Chinese red lamps.

Another section of the room is known as the "music corner." This one consists of a baby grand piano and an antique Chinese record cabinet which stands in front of the glass doors leading to a small patio.

Downstairs by the pool there's a lanai room which has a complete kitchen setup of refrigerator (Continued on next page) sink, garbage disposal, coffee maker, and tableware is hidden behind the Hawaiian bar. In another section of the room there's redwood furniture whose cushions Jane has covered with a turquoise plastic. There are also two dressing rooms for the swimmers in which Jane herself painted the murals. She's not half-bad as an artist. During the warm months most of the Waterfield entertaining centers in the lanai and around the pool.

The master bedroom is the only room in the house which is inaccessible from the front door. Jane wanted privacy in this room, also a built-in music system since she owns many rare recordings, collectors' items, and wanted to be the only one who would handle them.

The bed the Waterfields occupy is the same bed Bob slept on as a boy. When they were first married, Jane and Bob lived with his folks, and Jane got so used to the bed that her mother-in-law made her a gift of it. The bed is now equipped with a fancy headboard and a large grey-velvet spread.

IN ANY home that costs upward of $100,000, and Jane's is easily worth that, you can rest assured that the kitchen will boast the latest in equipment. Jane's kitchen is really more than that. It consists of pantry, kitchen, and hobby room. The three-part unit is done in blue and white, but since Jane can't stand the average kitchen wall paper, she covered the walls with a stylized Chinese pattern. She and Bob, when they're home, eat breakfast and lunch in the pantry.

Jane had a wonderful idea for the kitchen proper. Rather than have her architect build the usual half dozen cabinets for food stuffs and the like, she had him build one large cabinet that holds everything—cooking utensils, provisions, ingredients, etc. Having one closet saves time and extra motion. Instead of opening one cabinet door after another, then closing them all during meal preparations, Jane opens the double closet doors until her cooking is finished.

Beyond the kitchen lies the most functional room in the house. Its the laundry-sewing-studio-tool and general storage room. Here Jane has collected all the hobby and work-room equipment that is ordinarily scattered over a house from basement to attic. She has a file for her easels and canvasses, a home laundry, a portable sewing machine, an upright Amana freezer in which she stocks the game Bob brings home from hunting trips, and a tool bench for him, too.

Despite the fact that she had the help of three decorators in doing her house, Jane herself had so many fine decorating ideas that several of the decorators decided to adopt them. No greater tribute hath any home-owner.

Jane, for example, took a piece of ordinary driftwood, set it on a base, and sprayed it blue. She uses the driftwood as a jewelry tree, draping her costume pieces over it. She also thought up the idea of ceramic tissue boxes. Her best decorating trick, however, she reserved for her draperies. Jane has two sets of draperies, a winter red and a summer turquoise, that hang from different tracks. When one set is out of season, Jane merely pulls a cord, and it slides back into a drapery well.

Tom Land, a professional decorator who's copied some of these stunts, asked Jane a few weeks ago why she didn't go into the decorating business herself.

"Don't kid yourself," Jane told him. "When I finish my next picture, I am."

every girl needs sex appeal

(Continued from page 57) "I've been presented," Anne sadly admits, "as a terribly nice person, a good actress, a kind wife, a thoughtful mother. If I were running for office, if I wanted to become the mayor of Beverly Hills, that description would be wonderful. But let's face it. I'm an actress. I'm supposed to sound stimulating, look exciting.

"In the past my sex appeal has been kept in shackles. My fan mail, for example, has always consisted of letters congratulating me on my acting ability, my interpretation of various roles. I appreciate those letters. I really do. But why haven't I gotten any mail asking for pinup photos? The answer is simple: men, because of my films and reputation, have regarded me as brainy, dull, motherly, practical, anything but sexy.

"In all honesty I must admit that I'm no holier-than-thou. I'm not Gree-ah Garson. I'm a young actress who resents being presented as dull and inhibited."

In addition to re-doing herself physically, Anne, a few weeks ago, joined the growing line of top-flight screen stars—Tyrone Power, Cary Grant, Betty Hutton, Alan Ladd, Kathryn Grayson—who prefer free-lancing to studio contracts.

After 11 years at 20th Century-Fox, Anne walked into Darryl Zanuck's office one morning and asked for her release.

Her contract, at $3500 a week, ran until the spring of 1953.

When I asked Anne why she was giving up the security of a contract long before it expired, she said, "With me it's just a matter of professional growing pains. I've been under contract all my working life, and now I want to do some experimenting on my own. I am indebted to the studio for all the great breaks and guidance it gave me. But there are some exciting things going on in the show world and I want in on them. For example, Paul Gregory, theatrically speaking, has found a new world in America and we have been talking. I want to be free to hit the road for him in some vibrant, exciting work such as his stage productions of Don Juan In Hell and John Brown's Body. I also want to be free to travel, to make a picture in Europe or South Africa and naturally here in Hollywood. I think the world is too exciting right now to stay put in any one place."

ANNE'S great handicap, at least she currently regards it as a handicap, is that she talks like the literate, sensitive, perceptive, aggressive, knowing actress she is.

Her personality seems to accentuate her intelligence rather than the body beautiful. A friend who knows her well explains her desire to appear sexy in these words. "It took Anne 11 years to achieve fame and stardom in Hollywood. All of a sudden a girl named Marilyn Monroe comes along. Let's face it. All Monroe has is sex. It oozes out of her the way toothpaste oozes out of a tube.

"Monroe's been at the studio only a few years. She's played mostly bits. But today she gets more fan mail, more publicity than any other actress in town. You don't have to be an intellectual giant to realize that sex pays off. Baxter has come to that conclusion. Having a brain is very important but nobody buys tickets at the box office to see it. Maybe it sounds crass, but the average male movie-goer today is more interested in the bust than in the brain. Anne realizes that love is what makes the world go 'round."

In fact, Anne Baxter says very frankly that it's time to bring back longer-lasting, and more passionate kisses to the screen.

"The motion picture industry was partly built on great, uninhibited love scenes," she told me. "Today stars give each other gentle pecks and let it go at that, or the camera cuts away from them just as they really get into the spirit of the thing. The emotional excitement that meant so much to people back in the silent days of pictures is gone.

"Why do you think a picture like A Place In The Sun brought so many women storming to the movie houses? Word got around that the clinches between Montgomery Clift and Elizabeth Taylor were realistic. And the closeups too."

Baxter also has a theory about why so many females attend the French and Italian movies, and it has nothing to do with learning a foreign language.

ACCORDING to Anne, "Foreign stars kiss as if they enjoy it. They go in for historical kissing, too. We haven't had that in Hollywood since Garbo and Gilbert."

In Hollywood, Anne points out, a man with a stopwatch stands on the sidelines when an actor and actress go into a clinch. If the kiss lasts more than twenty or thirty seconds, the scene is re-taken, and the players are told to speed it up.

"While making My Wife's Best Friend with MacDonald Carey," Anne says, "we held a kiss a couple of seconds too long. We had to shoot the scene over again. It doesn't make sense, doing things like that. That scene, as Mac and I felt it—well, it could drag a lot of people who have lost the movie habit back to theatres. There are so many unloved people in the world who need a little warmth from movies. Why short-change them?"

To people who don't know Anne or who merely know her by her staid, country-club type of reputation, the preceding quotations may seem out of character, but the simple truth is that ever since she fell in love with John Hodiak, Anne has been an out-spoken, down-to-earth, lusty female.

The studio has played her up as the grand-daughter of Frank Lloyd Wright, the great founder and practitioner of modern architecture, either forgetting or not knowing that when Wright was a young man, he was involved in some of the most tempestuous love affairs of the century. If Anne's love life, as a matter of fact, were to follow in the footsteps of her illustrious grandfather's, she herself would be involved in some of the choicest scandals of all time, because Wright always was and still is, despite his advanced age, a rugged individualist who will brook no interference with his plans and ideas. He had several wives, was in trouble with many of them, and for many years his marital difficulties made intriguing headlines.

Anne herself says. "My grandfather, Frank Lloyd Wright, the architect, wore only a red sash on his wedding night. That's glamor."

Anne also attributes her current change in appearance and outlook to her grandfather. "He always says," she explains, "that a habit of any kind is absolute death. 'Never let a habit become a habit' is a favorite maxim of his."

When she was 11 years old, young hazel-eyed Anne Baxter was sure she had been born to be a wall-flower. "I hated that," she recalls, "but I must have been a precocious brat because I did something about it. I decided that wall-flowers were people other people didn't look at, and I wanted to be looked at—in a nice way. So I thought that if I were on the stage, people would have to look at me."

Anne's parents sympathized with her ambition and enrolled her in the Theodore Irving School of Dramatics. When she was all of 12 she made her stage debut. A few years later she was playing in summer stock at Dennis, Mass. Anne also starred on Broadway with Gladys Cooper and Eva Le Gallienne, two veteran performers, who taught her plenty. Several years of study with Maria Ouspenskaya, and Anne was called to Hollywood to test for the lead in Rebecca. She made eight tests for the part, then David Selznick decided to postpone production. Back to New York went Anne, puzzled and disappointed, but not for long. Darryl Zanuck asked her to test for Stage Door, and when he saw the result, signed her immediately.

ANNE came to Hollywood with her mother. She was 16 at the time, and mother watched her like a hawk. Anne's first picture was with John Barrymore in The Great Profile. Her second was with Jack Benny in Charley's Aunt.

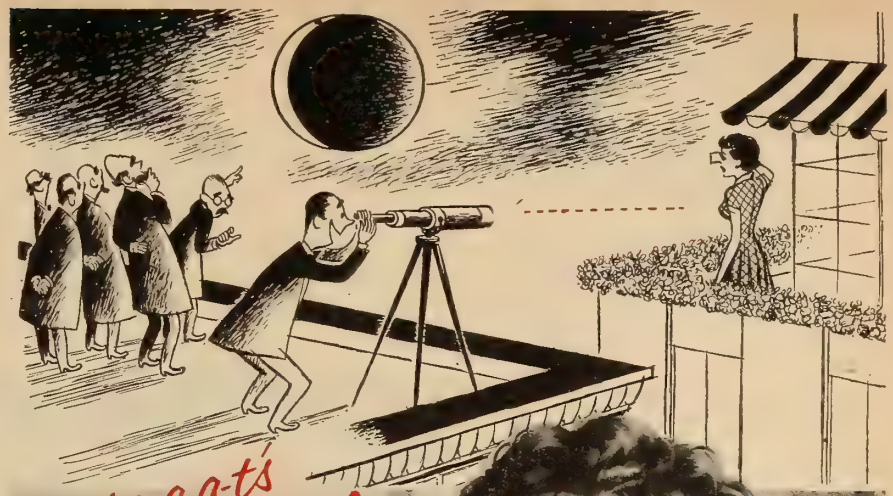
She was rather plump, very serious, very talented but not too sexy. She had dates and boy friends but no one very serious until John Hodiak walked into her life. Hodiak was a former radio announcer from Chicago, the son of immigrant parents, and he'd come up the hard way.

It was whispered around town when Anne and John started going together that Mrs. Baxter didn't think this was a suitable combination. But Hodiak wasn't particularly interested in rumors, founded or unfounded, concerning his future mother-in-law's opinion of him.

It made no difference to John that Mrs. Baxter was Frank Lloyd Wright's daughter. This was pure accident. Mrs. Baxter had nothing whatever to do with choosing her parents. Hodiak wasn't impressed either with the fact that Anne's father, Kenneth Baxter, was sales manager for the Frankfort Distilleries. He was in love with Anne and he would have proposed if her father had played third base for the San Quentin Eagles and her mother had been graduated from a school for delinquents. This boy was really taken with everything about Anne, her poise, her erudition, her savoir-faire and her sex appeal.

When Mrs. Baxter realized that marriage was inevitable, she graciously gave her consent and the ceremony was held at the Baxter home in Burlingame, California. That was in 1946. Last year the Hodiaks had their first child, a daughter, Katrina.

Hodiak may not be as talented as Anne's grandfather, but he certainly is an infinitely better husband. Thus far, for example, he's said nothing about Anne's platinum blonde hair, the poodle cut, the false eyelashes, her new insistence upon glamour and sex appeal. To him, Anne has always been loaded with these attributes.



As regards the public, Anne now feels she must be a little more obvious with what physical charms nature has endowed her. "Every girl," she says, "needs sex appeal."

Apparently that even holds when a girl is a successful actress, is earning $3,500 a week, has captured a handsome husband, earned a magnificent career and given birth to an utterly delightful baby. END

Fall Beauty Hints

—by Ruth Pearse

Top News—
Fashion's newest fanciness is the beautiful outside bra, to be worn as a dress-up blouse a-top an evening skirt or hostess slacks. Made of glamorous flowers or fabrics, these revealing pretties call for underarms soft and smooth as your neck and shoulders. That calls for YODORA, the beauty-cream deodorant. Used daily, YODORA protects against perspiration odor, helps beautify your skin at the same time.

Lady at Home—
Would you believe, some women feel they don't need a deodorant when they're "just staying home"? They feel they're saving their underarm skin from the irritation caused by constant use of too-harsh deodorants. (One out of two women reported such irritation in a nation-wide study among readers of a leading woman's magazine.)

LADY, you never need a rest from YODORA! A four-week test among more than a hundred women, supervised by a leading skin specialist, showed not one case of underarm skin irritation from using YODORA, even when applied immediately after shaving. YODORA is actually soothing to normal skin.

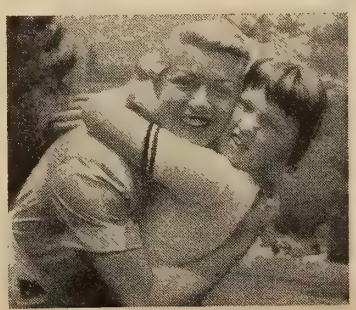
I like to rumba, tint my hair, drive past bakeries, says Lana Turner. Here's the seventh in MODERN SCREEN's new series of informal comments on life, love and the pursuit of happiness written by Hollywood's top stars.

Take my word for it

by LANA TURNER; star columnist for November



I'd rather rumba than read.

You can be lonely in a crowded room.

Best makeup trick I know: falling in love.

A woman needs children to be happy.

SEVERAL YEARS AGO I SAID: I'd rather rumba than read . . . I'd be terrified to do a play . . . I can count my women friends on the fingers of one hand, and none of them are movie stars . . . I feel lonely in a crowded room . . . I don't like to read poetry . . . I can't get past seven times seven in the multiplication tables . . .

Today I love to read fiction, but love biographies, too. I like anything that teaches me something new . . . If there were a play in which I could lose myself completely, I might try it, but I doubt it . . . I have discovered that if you have one real friend, you are very lucky, so being able to count friends on the fingers of one hand isn't as deplorable as it sounds . . . I have also learned that loneliness is a condition within yourself, so being alone or in a crowd doesn't make any difference . . . I can now get past the sevens in the multiplication table, but I won't say how far past.

PERSISTENT HABITS: I still dress in the standard way, from the bottom up. Stockings, shoes, lingerie, face, hair (if putting on the dress won't disturb it), then the gown. I like to change my hairdress to fit the occasion—down in the daytime, upsweep at night. I usually do it myself. I still like to change the color once in a while (I am about to become a brownie with lighter wings at the temples).

Philosophy: The best makeup for any woman is to be in love.

Culinary: I learned to eat snails in Paris. This is a habit easy to forget. I still like to drive by a bakery.

Suntan Department: Getting a good even tan is a hobby of mine. After years of experimenting I have reduced it to what I believe is the simplest method. You'll find nothing new in it, just use common sense. Watch yourself the first few days in the sun. That's all.

RESEARCH: In The Merry Widow I thought it was fun wearing a corset until I started dancing with Fernando Lamas, when I had to keep whispering, "hold me tighter," because I felt I was slipping away. After a few days of not being able to take a deep breath or sit with any degree of comfort, I began to feel very sorry for the women who had to wear them. In fact I don't know how they ever ate a square meal.

More Research: American women have the taste but not the leisure of European women. Consequently, we usually consider the latter overdressed, with their feathers, veils, hats and heirloom jewelry, etc. American women, most of whom work, haven't the time to fuss with all these fripperies. Sometimes

I think European women have the right idea in letting men take care of everything while they just take care of themselves . . . but, on the other hand, an American woman's life is broader and gives her many more contacts with the world. I don't think, in the long run, an American woman would be satisfied with the confined ways of a European woman's existence; and I believe a European woman would be fascinated with the freedom and opportunities for self-expression her American sister has.

EDITORIAL BLAST: Let's start a campaign against being careless about introductions. This is a bad habit. Don't slough off an introduction, or the names involved. Don't assume everyone knows everyone else. (I have seen so many people standing around at parties not knowing anyone that I've sometimes felt I was in a theater lobby between acts rather than in someone's home!)

Many times I have entered a room where others were gathered and heard the hostess say, "You know everyone, don't you, darling? Of course you do!" I can't call her a liar, so away she goes leaving me in a social sahara. Oh, I know she has things on her mind—the dinner, some special seating arrangement, a guest of honor not yet arrived. But her first duty is to make sure her guests form a harmonious group.

When a guest arrives at a party, he should immediately be introduced to everyone. And no guests already present should hesitate to stop their conversation and pay strict and courteous attention to the newcomer. Give of yourself that moment, because it is what makes the social wheels go around; don't be mechanical about it, don't slough it off.

It's infuriating to be at a party and have to ask some friend who the person is who's coming toward you and have them answer, "Haven't you met him yet? You must have." You say, "No." They say, "Oh." And they let it go at that!

A few weeks ago I was invited to a cocktail party, and Fernando Lamas was my escort. When we arrived I introduced Fernando to the hostess. So far so good. She then took me by the arm, and with Fernando on my other side, we went around meeting the rest of the guests. Each time the hostess introduced just me, leaving it up to me, then, to introduce Fer-on this newer successful technique for FEMININE HYGIENE

Assures You Hours Of Continuous Action!

Wives fully realize how the practice of vaginal cleanliness protects their health, married happiness and prevents offensive odors. And they should rely on Zonitors for this intimate purpose. Zonitors offer a far more convenient, highly modernized and effective method, yet they are positively non-poisonous, non-irritating.

Zonitors contain the same powerful germ-killing, deodorizing type properties as famous ZONITE liquid in greaseless, stainless vaginal suppositories. (You never feel their presence.) When inserted, Zonitors do not quickly melt away. Instead, they spread a protective coating and continue to do so for hours. Only Zonitors can make all these claims!

Zonitors completely deodorize. They help prevent infection and kill every germ they touch. It's not always possible to contact all the germs in the tract. But you can trust Zonitors to immediately kill every reachable germ. Inexpensive. Convenient to slip in your purse.

nando. This is quite a trick, like passing the baton, or whatever it is that runners hand to each other in a relay race.

Sometimes introductions are so casual that you don't really feel you have met the person at all. I know of cases where people who were introduced to each other in this way at a party didn't even nod when they happened to meet again the next day. They weren't being impolite. Their introductions had been so indifferent that each felt he or she would be presuming if they accepted this as a basis for knowing each other. The truth was that they had both been slighted by their host. An introduction should be the cement that can bind a new friendship together, not a mere brushing of two people together.

I've talked about European women, so I must say one thing about European men. When you meet one and he bends over and kisses your hand, you sit up and take notice; you feel you've been really introduced! It's so much more courteous than an offhand "Hi!"

EVER SINCE MY DAUGHTER CHERYL CHRISTINA has been old enough to understand, I have taught her to introduce her little friends to me whenever I happened to enter a room where they were playing. Now it is second nature with her, and it gives her a sense of responsibility that I know she enjoys, as well as a measure of poise that will always benefit her. I'm very proud that, at nine, she is already a gracious hostess.

While I am on the subject of Cheryl, I'd like to mention one other thing that I feel very strongly about. I hate to hear children call adults by their first name, as you so often do. If friends are frequent visitors to the house and calling them "Mr." or "Mrs." seems too formal for the kids, they can call them Aunt Nellie or Uncle John. I am sure it is an old American custom for everyone to call a venerable old man in the community "grandfather" whether or not there is an actual family relationship. Then take "Grandma Moses." She is grandma to the whole world now. Similarly an old friend of the family could be called aunt or uncle as the case may be. Anything but the person's first name which, coming out of a child's mouth, always jars you with a feeling of disrespect, even though it isn't meant that way. Children brought up to respect their elders and to be courteous at all times will have a wonderful foundation for life, because courtesy never goes out of style.

Finally I'd like to say a little about makeup, fashions and perfumes. The only trick I know about makeup has been told before—apply it with discretion. For the street I use eyebrow pencil, mascara and lipstick, rarely powder and never rouge. For evening I add a mauve eye shadow and sometimes, if I am to be photographed, I will use a light foundation. The most important rule for makeup is never to think and fuss about it once it is on and you are out for the evening. If someone tells you, "Your makeup looks beautiful today," something is wrong. It shouldn't be noticed as makeup, and if it is, it's too obvious!

I SEEM TO WEAR JEWELRY IN SPURTS — some weeks a lot, some weeks little or none. In the daytime I like gold or pearls. For evenings I love diamonds. I like smart costume jewelry too, but it must be smart. Not wooden beads or plastic gadgets. I've always hated gadgets. There is beautiful costume jewelry to be had quite reasonably today, so if you have one good genuine piece of jewelry, perhaps a ring or earrings, you can do a wonderful job building around it with good costume pieces.

Personally, I prefer colognes to perfume and have used the same scent for 11 years. I have it made up just for me. This is my own secret, but anyone can find one that suits them . . . and do find it. It's fun to experiment and finally get something you think is like you and will be your individual trademark. Actually my cologne is a blend of two colognes, both of which are available in any store. The point is to get hold of some perfume or cologne that becomes you and only you. Part of the strategy of femininity is to be remembered. An aroma distinctively yours helps do that job.

IN CLOTHES I conform pretty much to regulation, except that I do love slacks for around the house or at the studio. I buy my slacks ready made and prefer the fly fronts instead of the side zippers. No matter how neatly they're sewn on, side zippers do bulge a little where the material is lapped over. And, of course, I have always liked sweaters. Nothing is softer for informal wear, or more complimentary. They come in the most beautiful colors and can be worn with slacks, skirts or even shorts.

For my skin I always use soap and water, then rub a little cream in to counteract the dryness . . . but I never leave it on overnight Someone was telling me the other day that mixing cold cream with a tablespoon of ordinary table salt was wonderful for cleaning your pores. Maybe I'll try it some day. If I do, I'll let you know how it works.

As for hair, it should always be kept clean and lustrous. Such hair worn simply is far more attractive than an elaborate hairdo that needs constant washing.

BUT THE MOST IMPORTANT THING of all is happiness. To find that is quite a trick. No woman is really happy unless she knows she is loved, has children and has learned a way of expressing herself. Not only must there be a relationship with life in which others have a part, but you must have some outlet other than your family. Fortunately I get a great deal of satisfaction from my career. Even though I get greater pleasure out of being with my daughter, both help me to feel that I am being a worthwhile human being.

Working toward this and, improving one's beauty, is not an unimportant step. Beauty is as old as people and the best remembered thing about them. Cleopatra, Salome, Madam Pompadour, Mata Hari were all guilty of specific deeds that few people can recall—but everyone remembers they were beautiful.

confessions of a ten-percenter

Right now, just for the record, I'd like to say that I know Jeff as well as any person living with the possible exception of his wife, Marge. She, of course, thinks he's a dream. She only lives with him. I have to work with the lug.

This guy will play a benefit in Peoria if you ask him. On the level. He is constitutionally incapable of saying no.

Let me give you a few examples. A number of weeks ago a lady called and asked me if Jeff would be good enough to travel out to a section of Los Angeles called Westchester. The Jewish organization, Hadassah, had elected a girl to be crowned Queen Esther of Westchester; and they wanted Jeff to preside at the ceremonies. When I asked Jeff about it, he said, "Sure, why not?"

A day later Father Patrick Peyton, who runs the Family Theatre, a radio program over the Mutual Network, phoned. "I wonder if Jeff'd do another show for us," the Catholic cleric asked me. "He's done so many already I'm almost ashamed to impose upon him."

When the Man Mountain ambled in that afternoon, I relayed the request. "Be glad to," he said, "Why not?"

When Jeff was shooting Because Of You in which he co-stars with Loretta Young, the company used the Sawtelle Veterans Hospital as a location. Between set-ups, Jeff sat around, cracked jokes, bulled with the men, listened to their old stories, their plans for the future.

Early next morning a soldier came up to my office. "I was talkin' to Jeff Chandler out at the Hospital," he explained. "Told him I wanted to get into show business. He said you'd be glad to help me."

That's one of the troubles with Chandler. He tries to foist his missionary spirit on his friends. Thinks everyone should help everyone else.

Know that crazy baseball team that Martin & Lewis have, the Aristocrats? A look at the lineup shows Chandler playing right field. Know where most of the Aristocrats' games are played? At Sawtelle for the benefit of war veterans. Ever hear of the City of Hope, that wonderful outfit near Duarte, California, which provides free medical help for tuberculosis and cancer patients? I've lost count how many times Jeff has appeared for that charity.

HOW TIME FLIES!

■ Cupid Dep't—Vivien Leigh thinks Laurence Olivier is the nicest man in town . . . Ann Sheridan and Cesar Romero have discovered each other . . . Joan Fontaine has a Pasadena beau, but Conrad Nagle still escorts her places . . . Errol Flynn and Lily Damita are planning a second honeymoon.—April, 1939—Modern Screen.

MAYBE it's because he's always been tall and tall people have a way of feeling self-conscious, as if they didn't quite belong. Maybe it's because of that, or maybe it's just because he's humanitarian, but Jeff is always going to bat for the underdog.

That's Jeff's outstanding trait, I think. He's unbelievable. Just look at the guy. Does he look like an actor? Does he walk like an actor? Does he even talk like an actor?

Behind that granite face would you think there lurks a first-rate intelligence? Would you think this lug is as soft-hearted as Florence Nightingale? Would you, even in your most fanciful dreams, consider him a sensitive artist or a fine singer?

Listen to the truth, friends. This guy started out in Brooklyn as a commercial artist, and a darn good one, too. He also sings. Peggy Lee had him on her radio show as a guest, and he was so surprisingly good as a canary that she insisted he make a repeat appearance.

As for his soft-heartedness and his intelligence, maybe you won't believe this but Jeff is one of the few Hollywood stars who tries to answer personally each and every fan letter. Not with a form reply, either. He has a blonde secretary, Arleen Franz, and he dictates to her every day.

"If people are nice enough to write me," he says, "who am I not to answer?"

If this is not a refreshing attitude in Hollywood I will eat it. Here's one of the busiest guys in town who's never too busy to answer his own fan mail. Few other stars can make this claim. Not that Jeff ever makes any claim. Ask the reporters about him. All of them say, "The trouble with Chandler is that he won't talk about himself. The subject embarrasses him."

I first saw Jeff 12 years ago when he was Ira Grossel from Brooklyn. He was enrolled at the Feagin School of Dramatic Arts in New York. At the time I was a talent scout for 20th Century-Fox. It was part of my job to make the rounds of dramatic schools, searching out new talent.

To me Jeff was a big, gawdy kid. He didn't seem to coordinate too well, a common failing of tall guys. But there was an arresting quality about the boy, a kind of deep sincerity. I watched him for a few minutes, then walked out.

Later I was at (Continued on next page)

the Mill Pond Playhouse on Long Island when who should turn up again? Right. Only this time he was a spear-carrier or something in a costume drama entitled The Trojan Horse. His face had more character and his acting showed indications of great potential, but I still didn't think enough of the boy to recommend a screen test. I felt he was at least two or three years away. Then the war broke out and I lost track of Jeff.

When I next ran into him we were both in Hollywood, he as a radio actor and I as the general manager of Huntington Hartford's talent agency. We met at a Lux Radio Theatre broadcast, and when the show was over I knew at once that Ira Grossel had arrived. He had not only developed his acting, but his sex appeal, his personal magnetism, that strong-but-silent he-man attitude seemed to overwhelm the audience. I was surprised after the broadcast to observe that more fans asked for his autograph than for the signatures of the established movie stars who headed the cast.

Although I'd seen him, Jeff and I had never met. A mutual friend introduced us. The first thing I said, looking up at the Man Mountain was, "I saw you in stock under a different name." He furrowed his brow. "Yep," I continued, "It was at the Mill Pond Playhouse in Long Island. You were in a play called The Trojan Horse."

Jeff couldn't believe it. "But that's impossible," he said. "That was more than eight years ago."

We set up a date for the next day and Jeff came into the office to discuss representation. We talked for a while and he said, "Suppose I sign with you, what sort of parts do you think I'm suited for?"

"Maybe I'm crazy," I said, "but I see you as a leading man."

Jeff grinned. "Thanks," he said. "Everybody else sees me as a character."

Well, it wasn't easy getting Jeff Chandler a job in pictures, I'll tell you that. But I never lost my confidence in the guy. I remember the night I met him. I went home to my wife and I said, "Edna, I've run into an actor today and I've got a very strong feeling he's going to become a big star."

A funny thing. Jeff later told me that on that very same night he went home to his wife and said, "Marge, at last I've found the guy who's right for me. This guy's gonna do it."

For three months I went from studio to studio trying to sell the lug. At one studio they said, "Look, we've got all the truck drivers we need." At another, the casting director said, "He's too tall. He's a giant. If we make a sequel to King Kong, we'll call you." A third studio sent word that he wasn't handsome enough. A fourth told me that possibly he could be used as a mug in gangster films.

It was disheartening and discouraging for both of us. It's sort of embarrassing to ask for work, which is why actors have agents. But I think it's especially embarrassing for a big hunk of man like Jeff to be told, "Sorry, I can't use you." All the time he knows what the casting director is thinking, which is, "How come a big healthy Joe like you isn't driving a truck or digging a ditch?"

Jeff didn't give up and neither did I. He continued to work in radio, and I kept pounding studio doors. Universal was the first studio really to let us in. They tested Jeff for a part in Sword In The Desert.

He was sensational. The studio called me and had the test run. "Aren't you surprised?" one executive asked me. "No," I said honestly. "I expected him to be good. What do you think I've been talking about all these months?" While Sword In The Desert was being made, the studio signed Jeff to a contract.

Other than for the outside pictures he's made at 20th Century—Broken Arrow was the best of these—he's been at Universal ever since. A few weeks ago we signed a new contract. It makes Jeff one of the highest paid actors on the lot.

When I tell people that despite his success Jeff hasn't changed, they refuse to believe me. "You're his agent," they say. "Whoever heard of an agent telling the truth about his client? How come he separated from his wife when he earned a little success? Why don't you tell us the truth about that?"

The truth is very simple. All married couples quarrel in Hollywood and out of Hollywood. Sometimes personalities rub each other the wrong way, No marriage is perfect. It has to be worked at. Jeff's wife is a beautiful, intelligent extrovert. Jeff is essentially introspective. Lots of times he'll sit for long periods, just thinking. Marge will say, "What's wrong?" Jeff will say, "Nothing. I'm just trying to think something through." The separation stemmed from a difference of viewpoint. There was no third party involved. Jeff and Marge were apart for seven months, and my own personal opinion is that because of that separation their marriage is more solid today.

THE Chandlers with their two daughters live in a middle-class house in a middle class neighborhood, drive a middle-class car, a Pontiac, wear middle-class clothes, and live a quiet, circumspect life.

Jeff has a wry sense of humor which is open to misinterpretation because on occasion his kidding is taken seriously. It hurts him to hurt anyone even momentarily. If he feels he has, he's quick with an apology.

He also has a pretty good idea of where he stands as an actor. "I've done some good parts," he says, "and then there have been others. I have a set of values for myself, and I know I've got a lot to learn."

As an agent and talent scout I've seen an awful lot of actors in Hollywood. The behavior pattern is very simple. They start out grateful and hard-working. In a few years success turns them a little heady. The agent who once helped them is now a necessary evil, a sycophant. They tolerate you because they feel that one day they may need your services again.

This is not true of Jeff Chandler. He called me Meyer when he didn't have a dime, and he still calls me Meyer today. The important thing to me is that the tone he uses is still the same. END

the gold dust twins

(Continued from page 37) and Montgomery Clift have Hollywood in a turmoil because these two stars are taking away from the film capital some of the glamor that made it famous. There is no illusion on the screen when the theatre-goer knows very well that the man he is looking at in the fancy costume is, at home, a chap with manners and attire that might keep him from being invited into the average living room. And, apparently, there is nothing that can be done about it.

Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift, to give Hollywood its just due, are not Hollywood people. Neither one of them have starved on Hollywood Boulevard to get where they are. They never had to face hunger or the other trials that the usual aspirant in Hollywood does. They came sailing into the movies on the winds of Broadway success. And they came, and come, to Hollywood for only one reason, gold. They come a-mining for the dust whenever they need it and then skadoo. And both have stated publicly that they wouldn't give two cents for the whole town. Both of them at the time of this writing have informed their studio bosses that they will not give interviews for fan magazines, nor will they take off their old clothes and pose, like movie stars, for the picture pages of these periodicals. It looks as though Hollywood and Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift are at a stalemate.

It has been charged time and again that Marlon and Monty are nothing more than free-thinking young men who refuse for basic reasons, known only to themselves, to conform to any movie star tradition but picking up the fat pay check. Their supporters claim that they are singular artists, too concerned with their mauling of the Muses to bother their heads about rational matters. And too steeped in the traditions of the theatre to care if anybody puts down a dollar out front to get a peek at their genius. This is nonsense.

One old-timer, a man who holds the deep respect of actors, and who in his prime lived the true life of a movie star, snorts when their names are mentioned and cries that in his day neither one of them could get work as an extra. This is terribly harsh, according to other old-timers who think Monty and Marlon certainly could have been extras but might never have got to the top of the heap in a time when competition for stardom was keener.

A CAREFUL check of the situation reveals that although Monty and Marlon have had rather celebrated careers both on the Main Stem in New York and in a few artistic-type pictures, neither one of them has distinguished himself at a box office to be worthy of the fabulous fees they exact for their movie efforts. True, Monty made Red River, a big money-maker, and A Place In The Sun, which made a nice buck, but the rest of his films have not been gold mines. Marlon made Warner Brothers happy with A Streetcar Named Desire, but none of his other films had bank tellers working overtime counting profits. And yet both boys demand salaries in excess of actors who have been making smash pictures for 20 years and more. A logical conclusion would be that the lads have found a strawberry patch they're picking clean.

A wise movie man once said that the way to sell movies was to have the star put the print on his back and travel the land peddling it as he trudged. Marlon and Monty refuse to do this. They feel perfectly free to wind up shooting and take off for New York or Europe, leaving the Hollywood folk to sell the effort as best they can. The fact that some of these pictures have been what is known in the trade as "bombs" is an indication of faithlessness. It is not good enough that Marlon mumble into a moustache for a couple of months for a fortune, then dash off to study tinsmithing or something until he feels the urge for more gold; or that Monty sag through a movie between cat naps and then walk through a brick wall into nowhere until the uncertain producers raise his fee again.

The private lives of Marlon Brando and Monty Clift, are, to be sure, not average and are certainly not like a fan's idea of a movie star. An astute observer once said that Marlon Brando has blue-jean skin, for that is all he ever seems to wear—at least in public appearances, and that the torn T shirt he wore in A Streetcar Named Desire is swank compared to some of the things that hang in his clothes closet. The only time he has been seen in a suit, he confessed that it was his agent's (his agent is a good 50 pounds lighter than our hero). Marlon's idea of good all-weather headgear is a knitted seaman's watch cap which, it is said, he showers in. One bitter winter long ago he lost his overcoat and has never bought another.

And this is the lad who is at present playing the romantic role of Mark Antony in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar.

In the wardrobe department Monty Clift fares a little better. He wears a pair of pants and a jacket, but, his friends opine, it is only because his frame, undraped, is not a beautiful thing to behold. Monty never clipped the coupon that tells you how to have bulging muscles for a dollar a week. And, being a shy lad, he has no wish to display his physique. A member of the press who once got a peek into Monty's closet found it bare of clothing. He asked if the actor was moving and was informed that Monty had his wardrobe on his back.

HAVING a date with an old-time movie star was something to watch. Something a movie fan, lucky enough to observe, would never forget. Flowers would arrive in the afternoon. And at the appointed hour the star would appear in a glittering car, driven by a handsome, aloof servant. The star would alight and, after being properly announced, kiss his date's hand, lead her to his chariot and take her off to an evening of dancing, champagne and caviar.

This writer happens to have observed one of Marlon Brando's dates. He arrived in mid-town Manhattan during the busy theatre hour aboard a dirty old motorcycle. His blue jeans and leather jacket were glistening this night, for it was raining, almost a cloudburst. He stood three floors below his date's window and howled, like a wolf after its mate, for the young lady to come down. When she did, he piled her onto the back seat of the motor bike and whirled her off to a sodden tour of Central Park. And they dined beside the reservoir on sandwiches he had made himself. The next night she went to a movie with a nice polite bus driver and had the time of her life. She is now one of the many who stay away from Marlon's pictures. She is one of the disenchanted.

Monty's dates are different only in that he is not the type to ride a motorcycle. A young lady he dated in New York stated that they went to a nice cozy saloon on Third Avenue. They sat in a back booth near the kitchen and ate a spiritless hash while Monty dozed between courses. After it was all over, she bracketed Monty Clift as a glamor boy somewhere between Butch Jenkins and the night clerk of a Bowery flop house.

An interview with a movie star in the good old days was quite an event. The star generally received in a lush palace filled with rich evidences of extravagance and an artistic soul. The star was dressed to the teeth in a cashmere suit, silk shirt and flowing fifty-dollar tie. Coffee in antique silver service was on the coffee table and spirits of rare supply were in cut glass bottles on the bar. The star never stepped out of character, so that when the interviewer left he walked away with the impression that he had just shared a moment or two with Sir Launcelot.

This writer once had an interview with Marlon Brando. The actor appeared at his gate wearing a pair of shorts that looked as though they had been salvaged from a long forgotten YMCA and a terrifying multi-colored cap that must have at one time been owned by a lady bird watcher. He entered and, for the first two hours, said nothing more than "Can I take a shower?"—something he did and continued to do for the rest of the afternoon. Then he mentioned that he didn't like Hollywood, was hungry and wished he were dead. It was about as inspiring an occasion as a visit to a juvenile detention home.

Monty Clift doesn't get as many interviews as Marlon, only because he is harder to find. A reporter who once set out to find him to ask him if he planned to marry Elizabeth Taylor, stopped at the end of the third day because he began to feel like the detective in a Mickey Spillane novel. Even if you have a date with Monty Clift, one of his pursuers claims, you have to shadow him to the place of rendezvous.

It would be totally unfair to say that Marlon Brando and Montgomery Clift give nothing to Hollywood. To the best of this writer's knowledge they are not related to anyone in the moving picture business and must merit, in some manner, the money they pick up here. But it is an indictment against Hollywood that it has not discovered its own talent, which will assist in carrying on the grand illusions that sell movies and are so dear to the hearts of the young people who find in the magic of the cinema a few hours of enchantment each week.

It is very disconcerting to see a boy dressed in tat- (Continued on next page) ters standing before a group of highpriced showmen and telling them flatly he will take their money for acting but will not assist in selling the finished product to the public. It is unfair because the public is interested almost as much in the glamorous off-screen life of the stars it maintains as it is in their screen appearances. And the picture of Monty Clift lying in semi-slumber on a cot in a darkened room and informing his bosses, through an intermediary, that he will not be available for gab, except before a camera, is no less disheartening.

What is the solution? Apparently there is none. It appears that the die is cast. Monty Clift will remain Monty Clift and will not change, for it is the fancy of this younger generation of stars that they owe nothing more (for their riches) than their spell-binding performances. It is the fancy of Montgomery Clift and Marlon Brando that they can live their lives as they wish as long as they are casually brilliant in their work before the cameras. They can hide in condemned tenements or snooze in caves, unwashed and unglamorous, as long as they display a talent on film.

Both Marlon Brando and Monty Clift have a beef with Hollywood and these beefs should be aired. Marlon's is that pictures are sterile, made by sterile men, and that they do not allow him the actors' thrill of getting an immediate, direct reaction from his audience. This has undoubtedly been responsible for his sullen behavior. But he has apparently not given a thought to the fact that the applause for a movie star comes after the lights have been turned off for the last time and the cameras have been stored in their lockers. The old timers could tell him, if he'd listen, that the cheers when they face their audiences on personal appearance tours and trips to far cities is as thrilling as anything that ever came across the footlights. It's delayed, but it's as great.

Monty Clift's beef is almost the same, except that he feels Hollywood wishes to change him from a relaxed kid to a man with a zest for a medium he dislikes. His background does not entitle him to this, for before he came to the movies he was no earth-shaker in the theatre. It was likely that the talent of the man who made Red River put art into his screen acting. Monty, like Marlon, refuses to face the fact that no actor in the world is so magnificent that he can do in eight hours the work that warrants the huge sum of money paid him. While the salary of Monty is as much a secret as the wage paid Marlon, it would not be too far out of line to say that they have been paid $5,000 for an eight-hour day. And for that sum, they should be expected to peddle the film that winds up in the cans.

ALTHOUGH they are suspected geniuses, both Monty and Marlon could learn a lesson in ethics from some of the young, home-grown movie stars who made it the hard way. Tony Curtis is one. Bill Holden is another. Marilyn Monroe is another—and so is Dale Robertson. These are actors who are movie stars as well. They came here hungry, all of them, and what they have attained they have come by by the sweat of their brows and the hunger in their bellies. Their movies make money. And one of the reasons is that they work at being movie stars 24 hours a day. And when they are not making movies, you will generally find them out in the sticks, or in the neighborhoods of the big cities, selling the product, meeting the people who pay them face-to-face and never ducking down alleys to hide from the fans that hold their destinies in their hands with the coins in their pockets.

Yes, Monty Clift and Marlon Brando can be fairly dubbed The Gold Dust Twins. They came to Hollywood like confidence men, looking like stevedores and acting like collectors from a finance company who want their money without a lot of nonsense. They come to take their tokens of gold, and then they amble off to their little Fort Knox's, sighing with relief and looking for all the world like a couple of urchins who have just successfully raided an apple orchard. END

"It's been wonderful," said Jane, "not just because we've been happy, because we expected that, but wonderful that we've done so much together and know each other better and have faced so many pitfalls together and still love each other so much."

In any other town but Hollywood a young wife shouldn't get a medal for being able to make that statement, but here she should. In Hollywood a marriage or a career can tumble as easily as a kid on his first pair of roller skates. The daily papers prove that. And even though it's only been three years, several of the marriages of Joan's and Geary's friends have long been dissolved and new alliances made. Jane and Geary Steffan may not be able to take bows because they've been married three years, but they can take them because they bet on a slow horse that's holding his own in the backstretch. That's the way Hollywood looked at their marriage. Being sensible, they faced up to it before the wedding day, and they can begin being a little cocky about what they've done.

The odds against Jane and Geary were pretty great, if you take a good look at the circumstances. Geary was a young fellow not long out of the army with the whole wide world full of roads before him and no sign posts. By profession, actually, he was an ice-skater, and a good one, making a lot of money. Sonja Henie doesn't pick dubs for partners and Geary, they say, was the best she ever had. The army had taught him to be two things, a soldier and a ski expert. And with a war over, there wasn't even a 2nd Lieutenant's salary in that. He was a boy without even a hobby he could get rich at, and he was in love with a girl making a lot of money, who couldn't, because of her station in public life, be taken to live in a one-room apartment.

But Geary had two things—guts and pride. You can, however, tell that to the man in the corner grocery all day and he won't let you take home a pound of bacon. The guts and pride had to be put to work before you could marry the girl, and they had to be put to work fast, because the girl was beautiful and the world, it seemed, full of suitors with a head start.

The romance between Jane and Geary began at their first meeting. Geary was not of the picture crowd, although an entertainer who had skated in a couple of pictures, but he did have a few pals who had turned to acting and associated with movie people. One of them was Marshall Thompson, a young fellow who was working at MGM. It was through Marshall that Geary met Jane. And their friends like to say they knew it was mutual enchantment at first sight. It was lucky for Geary that none of this younger set had a lot of money to spend. Contrary to popular opinion, young actors and actresses do not become millionaires upon the signing of the contract. So Geary was in his proper element and a suitable date for the pretty, young singer. Even if it wasn't love at the first gander, it was something, because they went steady after that.

The first hurdle came a few months after they found out they really liked each other. Geary began to think things over and he knew he had to subtract the time he was in the service from his life and get a move on if he wanted to make something of himself. He had opportunities to be an actor, but he didn't want that. He tried real estate and thought of a few other lines that might make a career. Finally, he decided on the insurance business. He knew that each year a man worked in insurance he built up a bit of an estate, because the big companies cut salesmen in on the continuing premiums. That was what Geary wanted. He was much more interested in the future than a fast dollar today. The best job he could find was in Chicago, so Geary moved there and said goodbye to his girl and his home town for he didn't know how long.

A fellow makes mistakes, and Geary found out six months later that he had made one. His business was fine, but his life was pretty dull. Then fate, as it will, intervened. Jane Powell went to Chicago to make a personal appearance. Well, if Geary didn't meet the plane, he got in touch with her right after. And for the three weeks Jane was there he never left her side. When she left town, it was a sad farewell. And when Geary was alone that night a terrible thought came to his mind. He wasn't ready to marry Jane right now. He knew that. But suddenly he realized that if he stayed in Chicago, somebody else might. No man ever quit a job, packed a bag and headed for California faster.

As we said, just about now is also the tenth anniversary of Jane Powell's start in Hollywood. She was just 14 years old and fresh from Portland, Oregon, where her life had been pretty full, for she is gregarious, makes friends easily and people are important to her. She was a beautiful child and a magnificent little singer. She was put under contract to MGM, but she made her first picture for Charles R. Rogers, an independent producer, a film that is now being seen on television called The Song Of The Open Road.

After the picture was finished, Jane went back to MGM and became lost in the huge plant. She wasn't terribly important and she didn't know many people, so she spent miserable hours sitting at home wishing she were out of it all and back in Portland with her true friends, having the fun she used to have. But when school started, she perked up a bit, because she met a few kids who are still her closest friends, among them Elizabeth Taylor.

Like two kids from any ordinary school, Liz and Jane had an affinity that enveloped them completely. They'd get out in back of the school house and sit on the ground eating peanut butter sandwiches and talking about life, grown-up liberty and the pursuit of adult happiness. They'd talk about the men they'd marry and the crushes they had and the idiots who didn't think they were gorgeous, dangerous women when they wore forbidden lipstick. The talks were so memorable to them that when Jane got married—and one of the dreams was fulfilled—Liz sneaked a peanut butter sandwich into her suitcase which said, in a beautiful and subtle way: "Well, it all came true."

Jane grew up and became a star. She got more famous as each year went by. But she was a sensible girl and retained a close contact with the kids of her own age. There came a time when the MGM wardrobe department had to ask for instructions from the front office. Jane, it seemed, was supposed to be playing the tiny, elfish girl she'd always been in films, but the costumers were having a devil of a time keeping her from looking like a miniature can-can dancer. She was a woman now, for sure.

These were the things that Jane was accomplishing professionally—the things that belonged to the tenth anniversary. In her private life, though, we deal with three years, maybe four. She was 19 when she knew she was in love with Geary and wanted to marry him. Geary had joined an insurance firm in Los Angeles and, although he was progressing nicely, he knew darn well he was in no position to marry a girl who was making a fortune a week, even though he was madly in love with her. And she'd have married him if he wanted to take her to live in a tent. However, prodded no doubt by Jane, he bought an engagement ring and one night when he was driving her home he pulled the car over to the side of the road and put it on her finger. And they sat for a long while and had a sensible talk and tried to figure a way to tell her folks.

That was something they needn't have worried about. They quietly let themselves into Jane's house and tip-toed to her parents' bedroom to see if they were awake. They were, and in a moment Jane was sitting on the edge of the bed and Geary was standing beside her as nervous as a burglar.

"Mother," Jane said, determined to win her over, "we (Continued on next page) have something important to tell you."

"Is that so," said her mother. "Well, let me see the ring."

The wedding of Jane Powell and Geary Steffan was a pretty fancy affair. It was a church wedding, celebrated the way a girl who knows she'll only do it once would like to remember it. Liz Taylor was one of the bridesmaids and all of their close, long time friends turned out in fancy finery to make it a real gala occasion. And then they went to live in the apartment they'd picked out together and began a marriage that would be a model for any town. There were, of course, skeptics—as there still are—who said it couldn't work. Mainly, they opined, because of the difference in careers and income. But Jane and Geary were determined it would.

A magazine article appeared in MODERN SCREEN a year after they took their vows telling why it would—and some of the things Jane and Geary said in that article make pretty sound sense. They pointed out that their marriage had not been consummated in an "adolescent romantic haze" and they outlined their plans for what they considered a suitable financial arrangement. They would split their expenses right down the middle—considering they both worked for a living—and Jane would be able to afford no more than Geary or vice-versa. They would, they said, attend only the night clubs that Geary could patronize sensibly and they stuck to it. As a matter of fact, Jane, who had a pretty penny in the bank, used to visit friends who lived in nice houses and almost cry because Geary wouldn't let her buy one. They waited until he was able, and then bought a sensible, small home without most of the frills you generally find in a movie star's home.

This doesn't mean that Jane is a helpless little doll, unable to cope with most situations. As a matter of fact, generally when they have a business deal on of some kind—like the time they rented their apartment—Jane tells Geary to wait in the car and she goes in and drives a hard bargain. She got them to lower the rent on their first flat.

Now that they look back on the last three years, Jane and Geary have a good deal to be proud of. Geary Steffan is known in insurance circles as a real whiz. He's the top salesman in the country with his company. Sure he sells insurance to people he meets in the movie business, but he's like the fellow who joins a country club in any other town to meet prospects. That's his line of work—and he's proud to handle the accounts. The Steffans live better than most folks because they make more money than most, but Geary holds up his end and better.

The house they bought three years ago is now getting too small. They have a son, Geary Steffan III, and Jane is expecting another. They want, according to their own statement, four or five, and they definitely will not let Jane's career interfere with their counting. Her career is important to her because she is an artist who should and must find expression—and it's important to Geary, because, being a big part of Jane's life, it makes her happy. Right now, with number two coming along, they are looking for a larger home, and Geary's friends say that he looks at strangers in the street wondering if they'd be interested in a little insurance. Babies are just as expensive to raise in Hollywood as any place else.

It's an astonishing thing, but even in what is obviously an ideal marriage, dissension arises from time to time and things have to be ironed out. Jane and Geary have a system for that, too. They sit down, when the need becomes evident, and tell one another their faults. Jane, for instance, found herself getting sick of sitting still while Geary explained something to her, with long pauses, without letting her get a word in.

"That's a fine thing for an insurance salesman to do," she said. "Maybe I have to wait until you make sure what you want to say and then find the words. But you're going to bore prospects that way."

Geary looked amazed for a minute, then grinned. "Hey, you're right," he said. "I've got to stop that."

And if Jane picks up a habit that annoys Geary (like the time he watched her straighten up the living room and fluff up the pillows for the hundredth time, just as they were going to bed), he tells her about it.

She didn't take it too well that time. She snapped back at him. Then he sat her down firmly in a chair.

"Look," he said, "this is a very small thing, but it annoys me. And when I tell you, you get angry. Now it's not a question of fluffing up pillows in the middle of the night, but of my being able to criticize you. If you get this sore over something small, what will you do if it's over something big some day?"

Jane sat silent for a moment and then apologized. She hasn't fluffed a pillow since, but more important, there has never been anything they can't talk about since.

Yes, Jane Powell and her husband are happy, there's no argument about that. But, like all Hollywood marriages, there have been rumors of friction. These things just happen here. Geary is still in the army reserves and likes to keep active in things military. That involves going away to camp each summer and spending a few evenings a month training at a local army establishment. And his business requires that he make calls on prospects quite a lot. People have said that they are apart too much. Columnists have reported them on the verge of separation.

THEY both accept these things pretty much as a matter of course because they don't fool themselves about anything, especially Hollywood.

Recently Jane and Geary and Liz Taylor and her husband Michael Wilding went up to Las Vegas for a few days. Geary is always courteous, especially to the press, because Jane is in the public eye. But he won't take a shoving around. The four got off the plane and a group of newspapermen were waiting. They chatted for a few minutes and a photographer showed up and wanted to take a picture.

"Ordinarily I wouldn't mind," Geary told him, "but it happens that both of these ladies are expectant mothers—and at that time no woman cares too much about having her picture taken, so if you'll forgive us this once, we'll be grateful."

The photographer, a surly rascal, got huffy, and for a moment it looked like trouble. But Geary held his temper and escorted his wife to a car. Somebody should have told the photog that Geary's dad was once the lightweight champion of the world and had taught his boy a thing or two about fist fighting, and that during the war Geary ski'd down an Italian mountainside at the head of 26 men to attack a German position and that he was one of only three that came back. At any rate, he didn't get the picture and he's fortunate he didn't press his luck.

Geary Steffan loves his life now and he loves his Jane. He'll work hard for his happiness. He and Jane figure they've got a good deal to be grateful for. It's their anniversary just about now. Wish them well and help celebrate it with them. END dixie and bing

(Continued from page 62) she was in possible danger, he sat by her bed while she slept and held her small hand and comforted her. And when she awoke, there was her man, the crooner from the Cocoanut Grove, seated at her side with a grin and a wry joke to cheer her.

DIXIE CROSBY always was a strong woman. She came out of the first severe suffering of her illness with a smile and the will to keep things going. The summer was here and the boys had to be taken to their summer cottage at Hayden Lake near Spokane, Washington. They had to be taken, because it was something they looked forward to all year. Her illness was not going to change that.

Bing kissed Dixie on the forehead and ambled out of the hospital room to do as he was told. If Mom was sick, the old man would have to carry on with the kids alone. So he piled the youngsters into a car and drove to Washington and the cabin. But they all kept in touch with Dixie by telephone several times a day.

People who have known Bing Crosby intimately for years didn't know him at all at the time of Dixie's illness. Always a preoccupied man, he became more and more preoccupied and appeared never to think about anything else but his wife. He had to do a little work, mainly on his radio tapes for the next year and in preparation for another movie to be made this winter, but he never seemed to care much about what he was doing. All he seemed to care about was finishing up so he could get out to the hospital. And whenever a phone rang, a look of expectancy came over his face, as much as to say: "Any news of Dixie?"

MAYBE, in the final analysis, the marriage between Bing Crosby, the crooner, and Dixie Lee, the actress, will go down as one of the true love matches of the age in which we live. Certainly it was successful in the respect that it bore bright fruit, and that four young men can testify to the worth of the match by their conduct in society. Maybe it was a good marriage, because, at the time it began, the odds were against it, and the parties to the union overcame the obstacles and managed to end up loving one another more than they had at the start. It was certainly a marriage bedeviled by obstacles. It's tough to be as famous as Bing Crosby and stay with the same woman to the end. And it's tougher, maybe, to be Dixie Crosby, wife of a man more famous than anyone ever was, and to be in the background for all the days of her life. At any rate, it will be remembered as a beautiful romance that flowered and stood the test of time and strain.

When the man walked down the hospital corridor alone that day a few weeks ago, maybe he thought of these things. The old days when he didn't care about much; and the girl who said she'd never call him as long as she lived and never did; and the lives they had lived side by side somehow, even though apart a lot; and of the sons and the homes they'd built; and the happiness and occasional sorrow they had given each other.

He was the most famous man in the world, but what did it matter now. There were just two of them now, alone together in a small hospital room. All that mattered was that Dixie was very ill—and the sky would fall if she didn't get well. Take a look at the casual man. He's weeping. END

state of the union

(Continued from page 39) were talking about the separation of a prominent star and his wife. "I don't believe it's true," said one columnist. "Oh, no," said the other. "Then if it's not true, why is he denying it?" I must admit that this makes no sense whatsoever, but you must agree with me that it happens every day.

When I first spoke to you about these rumors and asked if I could make a report to MODERN SCREEN, you gave me the first sensible answer I've heard in a matter of this kind. You said that you didn't want to deny it because you didn't want to be placed in the position of denying something that didn't exist. And you felt that if you lent any dignity at all to such a preposterous situation, you would be abetting the acts of the item-hungry dolts who instigated it.

I THOUGHT then—and I still do—that you were perfectly right in using the only measure suitable—silence.

After reading back the above few paragraphs, being aware that this letter will appear in print, it might seem that I am performing the very act I condemn and, in a sense, I am. But I know one thing for sure. The only other alternative you do have to attempt to squelch these outrageous rumors is to put it all down on paper, go beyond the matter of separation and tell the truth about your present home situation and your future plans.

Let's go back to the beginning, when you and Evie were married. At that time you were the rage of the younger generation of movie fans. I'm sure I don't have to recall the buttons that were snatched off your coats and the mad mobs of admirers wherever you showed up and the time that the New York Police Department asked you not to come to their city because they were afraid they wouldn't be able to cope with the crowd. You were the symbol of the male, unmarried movie star, the Prince that almost every one of your young lady admirers knew would some day come and take them away from their drab lives. And when you got married, they gave up and actually few of them wished you bliss.

It's an odd thing, Van, that almost the same thing happened to the grownup columnists. You were the star they dangled over the heads of their readers, you were the dream they peddled almost daily to their young followers. And when you married they, too, resented it, more than likely, unknowingly. This, in an odd sense, is a tribute to your stature.

I think you are aware of these things. And I think because you are, you have gone out of your way to let the world know of the happiness that has lived in your house. You knew, I suspect, that a false move would bring the "ah hah's" and "I told you so's" that were printed recently.

First, let's tell them how the rumors came about. I think the first one was printed shortly after you left a party early and Evie stayed on. The explanation of this is so simple that you may not be able to sell it, but I think I can. You had to get up at six o'clock in the morning to report for work at MGM, and Evie didn't. You were with close friends, having a good time, and would have considered it ridiculous for Evie to have left at such an early hour when she was enjoying herself. So you did what any man who loved his wife would have done. You insisted that she remain.

Naturally, a day or so later one of those tricky items appeared in a gossip column: "What's this with the Van Johnsons. He walked out on her at a party the other night." From your standpoint this was an impossible fantasy to challenge. You had left her there. You had apparently "walked" to your car, which was outside. The only alternative you had was to call the columnist and insist that you weren't sore at your wife. You realized, of course, that she probably would have run another item stating that the Van Johnsons had kissed and made up, so you decided to keep your mouth shut.

Almost the same thing happened a short time later at a night club. You and Evie were again with very close friends, and, in order to be able to crawl out of bed for work in the morning, you left before the floor show, insisting that Evie remain and see it. That, I think, was the occasion of the second item which read something like: "If there is no friction in the Van Johnson home as his friends insist, why did he stalk out of a night club on her in a towering rage the other night." Your big mistake here, Van, was in not grinning like a discharged G.I. at the doorman as he brought you your car. He no doubt commented that you were in a filthy mood and it wound up in the papers as quoted above.

Harry Brand, super-publicist of 20th Century-Fox, ran smack into an open door one day and acquired a black eye. Completely undismayed, he had his picture taken and mailed it to a glamor girl who had recently had a row with the studio and walked out, signing with a rival outfit.

Across the bottom of the picture he wrote, "Nobody can call you dirty names while I'm around."

Bennett Cerf in This Week

THE Hollywood bandwagon makes the bandwagons the politicians leap on at political conventions look like go-carts. True news is scarce enough in Hollywood, so that a columnist reading a rumor in a rival's pillar must immediately steal it for his own. This, then, means that other incidents aren't particularly necessary. The gossipers resort to the time-honored custom of back-tracking. A typical example of back-tracking is this: "This sudden exposure of a rift between the Van Johnsons is no news to us. You may recall we itemed here six months ago as follows: 'Evie Johnson attended Barbara Stanwyck's party alone. Van was out of town on location.' We could have told you the real reason at the time but we were sworn to secrecy."

I'm sure you and Evie must have discussed some dignified manner of handling the situation. You couldn't hire a publicity man, because then you'd read that the Van Johnsons have hired a press agent to handle the details of their divorce in a nice manner. You don't dare call up one columnist and lay all the facts as presented here on the line, because all of his rivals would immediately denounce him as a fake.

I would like to quote you in MODERN SCREEN, Van, as saying, simply, "I love my wife, I love my children. I have never been happier in my life, and I look forward to many years of happiness for all of us together."

This may not do the trick, but I think it is the least a man can say.

We can, however, talk about the future, as you and I did at lunch. You are at a point in your career when you might make some changes. You have one more year to go on your MGM contract and you are thinking of what might happen if you didn't sign another long-term contract.

While it involves important business decisions, it is also a fun time. And I personally know that whatever you do, Evie and the kids will play a most important part in the decision you make. If you sign the contracts being offered you, you will have absolute financial security for the rest of your life, because you're the kind of actor who will be able to work until you're older than Spencer Tracy. And MGM is willing to back this with money. But it will also mean that you must spend the greater part of your time—and the kids' formative years—in Hollywood.

I remember the expression on your face when you told me that you wanted them to see the seasons change as you did when you were a boy. That they will never see in Southern California. You told me you'd like to live for a while in a different place, maybe Connecticut, maybe New York or Nantucket. You said you'd like to take your family to Europe and get a big car and take your time and drive through all the countries you and Evie and the kids now read about. And you didn't want any pressures, no sudden wires from a company that was paying you a big salary, to check out of a Swiss inn and be on a set in makeup on Friday morning.

You told me that maybe you'd like to go back to Broadway and do a play, possibly a musical, because that's where you came from and you've never gotten it out of your blood. You said you'd like to spend more time with your folks and Evie's folks and get to know them all again. None of these things will be possible if you sign a long-term exclusive deal, and so you think of them a lot. And when we spoke of them, I was impressed with one thing. Your complete selflessness. You expressed a humble gratitude to Hollywood for the good things it had given you and you never once said you might like to do something without first weighing its possible effect on the happiness of Evie and the children. It's just too doggone bad that everyone doesn't have the opportunity to hear you say these things as I did.

I know, Van, that at the moment you're rather troubled. But I can foresee nothing but the best for you. When a man feels the good things as strongly as you, he cannot fail to be rewarded. If it must be your decision to continue making pictures at the rate you've been making them—and I must inject here that your films are better with each succeeding one—you will find a way to adjust your family life to Hollywood's exacting formula. If you decide to make a change, you will also be able to fit your pattern for happiness into a new environment.

From the time the movies began, magazine writers have been advising actors. The advice is generally given in the form of a letter from the editor. Now I don't want to give the impression that many of these letters are not entirely constructive, but I do not want this to be like most of them, the chiding type. I can remember way back when editors, via open letters, were advising Pola Negri to stop making a fool of herself over that nothing-of-a-new-boy Valentino, and sternly warning the virile young male stars of the day to keep off polo ponies or wind up with pulpy collar bones. And advice was always freely given. Garbo was advised to speak up. Cooper was advised to run when he saw that spitfire Lupe Velez coming his way. Most of this counsel was administered with the best of intent, but I've always cringed when I read these notes because I knew the main reason for the gab was to sell magazines. I, therefore, hesitate to advise you for fear that I fall into the category of the fellow who says something for the effect it will have on a newsstand sale.

I want to be loved

(Continued from page 45) thin-faced outfielder rose quickly to his feet. He was introduced and they both smiled, pleased with their fate. For a minute they looked into each other's eyes, saying nothing. Then the conversation began, easy, simple, exploratory. How did Joe like it out here? Just fine. How did she feel being a movie star? Well, she wasn't really. In fact she was just a very small movie star.

Joe DiMaggio and Marilyn Monroe are basically simple, honest, forthright people, and over the dinner table that night, there was no attempt by either of them to sound sophisticated or witty or worldly.

Joe explained that he'd retired from baseball and was working as a telecaster in New York. He had a 9-year-old son, Joe Jr., going to school on the West Coast. As part of a 1944 divorce decree, he shared custody of the child with his former wife, actress Dorothy Arnold. He himself came from San Francisco. Had Marilyn ever been to San Francisco?

Marilyn smiled. "About five years ago," she said. And then she told how one day early in her career she happened to run into Doc Shurr walking down a street in Beverly Hills. As Bob Hope's agent, Doc knows all the latest town gossip. Marilyn was looking for a job at the time and he sent her around to see Groucho Marx. Groucho was casting an atrocity, later to be entitled Love Happy.

When Marilyn called at the office, Groucho took one look at her. "Don't say a word," he insisted. "You've got the job."

"The job," Marilyn recalled, "consisted of Groucho chasing me across a room. It took only 60 seconds, but I got five weeks work out of it because they asked me to go on a personal appearance tour. That's when I played San Francisco."

As the dinner dwindled down to dessert, the friend who had brought Marilyn and Joe together made a diplomatic exit.

Joe was extremely grateful; so, too, was Marilyn. In the course of the evening a rapport had sprung up between the two of them. Now they wanted to be alone, so Joe thought of a way.

"How about riding around town a little?" he suggested.

Marilyn nodded. It was one of those bright, clear California nights when even the smallest stars are allowed out, so they drove along the Sunset Strip. Gentleman that he is, Joe asked the beautiful blonde if she'd like to drop in at the Mocambo or Ciro's or any other night spot. When she said no, he was secretly glad. That night Joe didn't want to share Marilyn with anyone.

They parked on the Doheny bluff overlooking Los Angeles, and oddly enough, it was Joe who pulled the switch. Usually it's the girl who brings out the autobiography in man. Not this time. Joe asked Marilyn to tell him all about herself and she gave him the straight dope, how she was born Norma Jean Baker and bred in Hollywood, how she was raised partly in orphanages and partly in the homes of adopted parents. "I was married when I was 16," she said quite candily, "divorced when I was 17, graduated from high school when I was eighteen."

Joe asked how she'd broken into movies.

Again Marilyn told the truth—not the souped-up baloney the publicity agents bandied about but how it had really happened.

In 1945 she was working as a parachute inspector in Reginald Denny's model plane factory. A photographer from the Army came around to shoot stills of the female aircraft workers, thought it might boost the morale of the boys fighting overseas. "A sergeant named David Conover shot a few stills of me," Marilyn explained, "and two weeks later local photographers began phoning, offering me $15 an hour to pose as a model. Since I was only averaging $22 a week at the aircraft plant, you can bet I switched jobs in a hurry.

In August of 1946 after her face and figure had appeared on the covers of five national magazines, 20th Century-Fox agreed to give Marilyn a screen test. It came out well, and she was signed. Six months later the studio dropped her, as one of the casting directors termed her "absolutely hopeless." Three years later this same executive had to admit he was wrong, and Marilyn was signed again.

Joe DiMaggio was smitten that night, not only by Marilyn's beautiful face and curvaceous figure but by her patent honesty, her lack of pose. Here was a girl after his own heart, the kind of simple, earthy, basic girl he once felt sure he could never find in Hollywood.

A few nights later, Joe, who always stays at the Hollywood Knickerbocker during his west coast visits, checked out of his hotel and flew back to New York and his television program. He was definitely in love.

When the New York Yankees hit the road and Joe had some free time, he winged back to the West Coast. Reporters who asked him what he was doing in town again were told that he'd come to visit his son. "He goes to school here, you know," Joe told them.

DiMaggio not only saw his son while he was in Hollywood but he also brought the boy out to the Bel-Air Hotel to meet Marilyn Monroe. That's what started the hullabaloo, the rumpus between Joe and his ex-wife and Marilyn.

WHEN Dorothy Arnold learned that Joe had taken Junior to meet his new love, she reportedly blew her top and asked her lawyer to seek a modification of the 1944 divorce decree, giving her complete custody of the boy.

"I certainly want little Joe to see his father," she said, "but I think it would be better for all concerned, particularly the boy, if the meetings were at my home."

What is wrong with a 9-year-old boy swimming in the same hotel pool as Marilyn Monroe?

Anyway, DiMaggio, very upset, flew back to New York. Marilyn, deeply hurt, checked into a hospital for the removal of an appendix.

I was in New York when Joe arrived. I reached him at the Yankee stadium before the start of his TV show. "What happened out in Hollywood?" I asked. "Why did Dorothy object so strenuously when you took the boy along on a date? Does meeting Marilyn Monroe constitute grounds for demanding full custody?"

Joe shrugged his shoulders. "I sure can't understand it," he said. "The boy and Marilyn met only for a couple of hours. There were at least a dozen other children swimming in the Bel-Air pool at the time. Everyone there was perfectly respectable. There was no drinking, and I certainly don't know what's wrong with spending an afternoon at a swimming pool.

"I picked the boy up last Friday and we went out to dinner. Then I took him to see a movie. We got home and he was in bed by ten. On Saturday we had breakfast together, and he said he wanted a beanshooter. I got him one and he shot a bunch of beans all over my room. We went for a drive together, had lunch at the Bel-Air pool and went swimming. I brought him back to his mother's and I came on to New York. He saw Miss Monroe for about two hours. Is that a crime?"

Following this incident and the resultant publicity, Joe and Marilyn decided to be very circumspect about being seen together. They also decided to say very little about their romance, in fact, to deny it, to refer to it as a casual friendship.

When I asked Joe, for example, when he intended to make Marilyn his wife, he said, "Gee! We're just good friends. We just happened to run into one another."

This was sheer hokum, of course. When Marilyn was sent to Niagara Falls in July for location shots (she plays the lead in the forthcoming 20th Century-Fox film Niagara), who was on hand but Joe DiMaggio. He returned to New York over the weekend, but, when the film was finished, Marilyn raced to the big city to be near him. She checked in at the Hotel Drake, and that night the lovers dined at Le Pavillon, one of the city's plushiest restaurants. If they weren't in love, they certainly gave a great imitation of it.

Joe took Marilyn around and showed her New York just as she'd shown him Hollywood. To avoid reporters, however, he took her to small out-of-the-way restaurants, places where they wouldn't be seen, eateries in the suburbs located off the Bronx and the Hutchinson River Parkways. As Marilyn herself says, "I've been to New York before, but it was never so wonderful. I'll never forget those days with Joe."

When the studio called and Marilyn had to wing westward, Joe found himself terribly lonesome in New York. As soon as the Yankees hit the road, Joe hit the airlines. He flew to Hollywood again, his fourth trip in six months. He didn't come to see the scenery, either. He just couldn't stay away from Marilyn. As soon as he arrived, he went out to see her. She tossed a few things in a bag and he carried her into his Cadillac. "I want you to meet my family," he told her.

They stopped in little towns en route to San Francisco and soon the word spread that Marilyn Monroe and Joe DiMaggio were eloping.

They weren't. Joe's parents are dead, but the woods around the Bay Area are jammed with DiMaggio relations, and Joe introduced Marilyn to all of them. They enjoyed seven unforgettable days in "heaven," after which they drove down to Hollywood. Once more the rumor was circulated that they were heading for the preacher. But they arrived in Hollywood single.

Next day a columnist announced that Joe and Marilyn had originally intended to get married on that trip, only the studio had prevented it. The story still persists that studio executives do not want Marilyn Monroe to marry for fear she will lose her undeniably increasing box office appeal.

"There are millions of men," one executive told me, "who vicariously look upon this tomato as their own secret property. They go along with the illusion that she belongs to them. Suppose they read in the papers that she belongs body and soul to DiMaggio. The illusion is broken."

Admittedly, this is an outmoded theory but many studio executives still believe in it.

Marilyn herself says, "My career comes out of my life. My life doesn't come out of my career. When I want to get married, I'll get married."

Marilyn's contract with 20th Century-Fox has another five and a quarter years to run. If she wants to become Mrs. DiMaggio, the studio can do nothing about it. The contract contains no clause prohibiting marriage.

Why then don't Joe and Marilyn go ahead and tie the knot right now? Marilyn has moved out of the Bel-Air Hotel. She's rented a cute little house high in the Hollywood hills, a home in which she and Joe could be ecstatically happy.

The answer is that Joe works in New York, and the love of his life labors in Hollywood. Joe has been identified with the New York Yankees for so many years now that he regards New York as his second home. He hates to sever all connection with the Yankees, and yet he will not ask Marilyn to abandon her career and move to N. Y.—not after the incredibly tough time she had in establishing herself as an actress.

Marilyn, who's had one unhappy marriage and one unhappy love affair (with her agent, who died) says, "More than anything else in life I want to love and be loved. A career is a very nice thing, only you can't kiss it on the lips at night."

And yet, despite giving tongue to such thoughts, Marilyn has no intention of sacrificing her career for marriage—not at this point, anyway. She feels she can have them both.

She is currently earning $750 a week. After giving money to her mother each week, paying her agent, putting money aside for taxes, the Screen Actors' Guild and the Motion Picture Relief Fund, her net is about $400 a week, forty weeks a year, or an approximate annual income of $16,000.

Out of this she has to pay rent, clothe herself, feed herself and pay car expenses.

"I'm not complaining, however," she says. "It's more money than I ever thought I'd see and I'd like to enjoy it."

Marilyn won't come right out and say it, but she is hoping strongly that after Joe finishes telecasting the current baseball season in New York, he will return to the West Coast and look for a similar job.

When and if Joe goes to work on the Pacific Coast, you can bet dollars to doughnuts that Marilyn Monroe will become the second Mrs. Joe DiMaggio. END

(Marilyn's latest movie is 20th Century-Fox's O. Henry's Full House.)

now, little girl, you know why you didn't get your autograph

■ At a party to celebrate the return of the Roy Rogers radio and television shows to the NBC network for the new season, a little girl stepped up to Roy Rogers and asked for his autograph.

Roy looked past her and said, "Not now, honey, not now!" As Roy brushed by her, the little girl looked up at him in hurt amazement. She didn't know then, but her daddy probably told her the next day, that Dale Evans and Roy Rogers had been struck by a sudden, unexplainable tragedy.

MODERN SCREEN, on behalf of your many thousands of friends, extends to you, Dale and Roy; Cheryl, Linda Lou and Roy, Jr. our deepest sympathy in the death of your little daughter and sister, Robin Elizabeth Rogers.

lanza fights again

Mario was put on suspension for failing to report for the start of The Student Prince.

This film was scheduled to get under way on Monday, August 18th. Mario had already recorded the musical numbers, and absolutely no trouble was expected.

Came Monday, however, and Mario refused to report to the studio. Someone suggested the possibility of the tenor being ill. Inquiry was made and Lanza's health was reported as excellent.

Came Tuesday and again Mario didn't show. The studio legal department sent telegrams, special delivery letters. Still no Lanza.

On Wednesday Mario was again conspicuous by his absence. This time the studio executives blew their collective top. Mario was suspended, taken off salary, and the studio announced that legal attempts would be made to force Lanza to pay for the damages his failure to appear had cost the studio. At the same time, however, reporters were given to understand that if Mario showed up for work Thursday morning, all would be forgiven.

Thursday morning Lanza did not set foot in Culver City and all hallelujah broke loose.

"Who the devil does he think he is?" shouted one executive, "God?"

"Insofar as I'm concerned," blurted another, "he's through, finished, washed up."

"I don't care if he's the greatest box office attraction in the world," said a third. "I think we should tear up his contract, give him his release and throw him out. He's not worth all the aggravation and heartache."

The reason for this condemnation is money. When a motion picture is scheduled to get underway, the studio must pay the salaries of all the people who report for work. It already has spent thousands of dollars in set construction, in costumes, in music arrangements and so forth.

When Mario did not report for The Student Prince, MGM had to pay everyone else who did, despite the fact that no one could do a lick of work without Lanza.

"Look," one production man explained, "we borrowed Ann Blyth from Universal for this picture. Jane Powell was originally set for it, but she got pregnant. The studio must be paying Universal at least $50,000 for Blyth. Then we have to pay the rest of the cast, Gig Young, Janice Rule, Edmund Gwenn, Walter Hampden, Florence Bates, Leo Carroll, and the whole crew. I don't know the exact figures, but I would say that Lanza's failure to show up this week has cost the studio anywhere from $75,000 to $100,000. Now the cost of preparing a film like The Student Prince is around $600,000—that's before an actor even steps on the sound stage. So that if Lanza doesn't make this picture, the studio can sue him for around three quarters of a million."

JOE PASTERNAK, the small, shrewd, sagacious MGM producer who knows Mario as well as any man in Hollywood, told me, "I understand Lanza, and I can tell you that we'll have this picture finished before your article even gets into print, and Lanza will be the star. This boy has problems, you know, like the big trouble with his business manager. This boy forgets he has responsibilities. A couple of days go by, then all of a sudden he remembers he has a picture to make. By the time he remembers, hell has broken loose. I'm sure that Mario Lanza will be the star of The Student Prince." Mario undoubtedly will be, but the (Continued on next page)

"NO LONGER," adds Ann Pinkham, "is it necessary for girls and women to suffer 'bad days' from functionally-caused menstrual distress.

"So if you experience cramps, pain and headaches, feel as though you'd been literally dragged through a knothole at such times—you'll be glad to know about this way to relieve such discomfort... even on the first, worst day of your period!"

Here's the news. In doctors' tests, 3 out of 4 women stopped or strikingly relieved such suffering...by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's new Tablets or Compound.

That's because Lydia Pinkham's is scientifically modern in action—has a quieting, soothing effect on uterine contractions that may cause the pain. Thus it helps to ease the tension, actually prevent distress.

studio in the future is going to regard him with a jaundiced eye, because these are the days in Hollywood when, because of the inroads of television, stars must cooperate. The pampering days are over.

A few months ago, for example, June Allyson didn't want to make Woman In White with Arthur Kennedy. The studio said they would sue June for the preparation costs, almost $300,000. Little Junie changed her mind in a hurry.

This July, June also let it be known that at long last she and Dick Powell were going to vacation in Europe. The studio called June in and told her she had been scheduled for Battle Circus and Remains To Be Seen. June quickly cancelled her steamship reservations.

Similarly, Ava Gardner was notified by the studio this past summer that unless she began to cooperate she would be kept on suspension, off-salary until her contract expired next year. Seemingly overnight, Ava had a change of heart. She agreed to star in Vaquero and then go to Africa for Mogambo with Clark Gable.

One of the few stars who still insists upon the exercise of temperament is Mario Lanza. He just won't realize that time is money, or realizing it, he doesn't particularly care to put himself out.

Here, for example, is a recent item from a trade paper about Mario: "RCA was set back about $10,000 by Mario Lanza last week when, after some 80 musicians had assembled at 8 A.M. on a Republic sound stage for a day's recording of MGM's Be My Love score, word came from Signor Lanza in mid-afternoon that he wasn't feeling well and wouldn't show up that day at all."

MARIO'S three motion pictures have grossed about $12,000,000 to date, admittedly a lot of money. Lanza, therefore, is in the strategically advantageous position of being one of MGM's top breadwinners, but by the same token it's the studio that has made Mario world-famous. The studio also controls his radio rights, and if Mario doesn't behave himself, he will have no radio show.

Why shouldn't Lanza behave himself? Why shouldn't he report for work on time? Why must he carry on like a big baby? These are the questions everyone in Hollywood wants answered. They know that basically Mario is a kind man with a deep and genuine love of people. His good deeds, his charities are legion. No need to repeat them here. Everyone knows about the little girl from New Jersey he flew to California and how he virtually gave her new life, new hope for living. Everyone knows about his contributions to orphanages, his loans to struggling musicians, his subsidization of composers, his championing of the underdog.

But why, in the face of all this, does he act like a spoiled, irresponsible prima donna?

Some people say it's because he is a genius, that he's different from ordinary folk, that to expect him to act as most of us do is to make no allowance for his extraordinary ability.

"Look at Caruso," a friend of Mario's points out. "Who could control him? He had a dozen illegitimate kids. He was always getting into hot water. One minute he was gay, the next minute sad. Opera managers accused him of being mad, intractable, irresponsible. They couldn't figure him out, just like Mario with this Student Prince episode. No one knows what's in his head. Only last week Mario went up to Eddie Mannix. He's the general manager of the studio. He apologized to Eddie for everything, swore that he'd turned over a new leaf. So what happens? A few days later they start a picture and he doesn't show up. Why? He likes the songs, he likes the script, he likes the cast, he likes the director. You can't figure a genius out. When a man is a genius, you've got to play along with him. His idiosyncrasies must be overlooked if you want to use his talent."

Lanza's genius as an excuse for his questionable behavior is open to doubt, since many music critics insist he is no genius at all, merely the possessor of a powerful set of vocal cords.

The more reasonable explanation for Mario's conduct lies in the undeniable fact that he's had many problems to face.

Number one is the problem of money. Up until a few months ago, Mario never worried about money. He had a business manager, Sam Weiler. Sam was the real estate operator who backed Mario financially when Lanza came out of the Army and decided to study in New York. Mario had no money at the time, and Sam subsidized him to the tune of $50,000, paying for his rent, clothes for him and his wife, food, shelter, etc.

MARIO signed a contract with Weiler giving him 20 per cent of his gross earnings. When Mario came to Hollywood, Weiler hired the Music Corporation of America to represent his protegé, paying them ten per cent of his twenty. Weiler, however, looked after Mario's taxes, expenses, bills, record royalties—everything that had to do with money.

THE MADCAP MOVIES

An actor spent a fortune on a Renoir masterpiece and hung it in his living room. He was very proud of the painting, which depicted four nudes studying a collection of fruit. After it was hung according to his orders, he invited a close friend over for an inspection. As the friend walked into the room, the first thing he saw was the portrait. Turning to the actor, he yelled: "Hey! Where'd you get the dames?"

Dan Bennett

Mario was given $20 a week spending money and very rarely spent that. Anytime he and Betty wanted to buy something they bought it and signed a charge slip.

Lanza has earned close to $2,000,000 in the past three years. This spring he decided to see exactly how much he was worth. He had a new recording contract coming up with RCA, and he wanted to find out how his recordings had done in the past.

Mario took a look at the books. He couldn't believe the figures. It seemed almost impossible. He looked again. The truth was staggering. After taxes and expenses, he had very little actual cash to show for three years of constant work.

Mario and Sam Weiler had several conferences. The publicity was extremely guarded, but once these conferences were finished Sam Weiler took off for a vacation in the Poconos. Two weeks later, the news was out. Sam Weiler was no longer Mario Lanza's manager. Mario was looking after his own money—what little of it he had left. Surprisingly little!

Mario is the first to say how greatly he is indebted to Sam. He will tell you that Sam is a man of probity, sagacity, and unblemished reputation. But, even so, Mario was stunned when he learned how much of his earnings had gone to the Government in taxes, how much he'd spent in expenses.

The Lanzas have also had help trouble. For years they've boasted of a wonderful, efficient couple, Johnny and Thomas. A few weeks ago a relative died leaving the couple a prosperous business. Mario told them to take it over and run it, but they were reluctant to leave the Lanzas. "Go ahead," Mario insisted. "It's the chance of a lifetime." The couple moved out, grateful for Mario's advice.

Thus for weeks now, the Lanzas have been without help. When you have two little children in the house and a pregnant wife, that can be a strain, especially when for years you've been waited upon and even served breakfast in bed.

Things haven't been going too well for Mario Lanza of late.

Just remember that next time you read about his temper and his tantrums, his foibles and his fights.

Underneath it all, he's a very nice guy or, as his wife once confided to intimates, "a big, sweet baby who must be handled with kid gloves." END

we're off!

(Continued from page 53) me, waiting to ask if he could include his rubber saw in his suitcase. I held my hand over the mouthpiece a couple of times, once to tell Lonnie to stop scratching her new smallpox vaccination, and once to ask Belle, our secretary, to find out if Laddie's gray suit had gone to the cleaners. Alan walked in in the middle of all this and stood there a while looking at me. When I finally hung up, he grinned. "You'll make it, Susie," he said. "You're the world's champion manager."

It's a good thing he had faith in me. When we finally boarded the Ile de France, I flopped into this deck chair and stayed here all day. And Alan was right alongside me (until he found out about the skeet shooting on the upper deck), because he, too, has been up to his ears. He finished work in Desert Legion just one week before we left California, and it wasn't until then that he had time to apply for his passport. Even then, it was sandwiched in between the last minute retakes and dubbing at the studio plus publicity photographs and interviews.

Anyway, the gang's all here, and the Ladds have all but sunk the Ile de France. Each of us has a small trunk, plus hand luggage, and whenever we move in a group, it looks like a meeting of the porters' union. The hand luggage is stowed in our cabins, we've just finished breakfast, Alan is reading a script, Carol Lee is playing ping-pong, Laddie is off looking at the ship's boiler room or something and Lonnie and David have found the gymnasium.

It all began last May, when Columbia asked Alan to make Red Beret for them in London. He liked the script and accepted, and then the realization began to come over us that this was our golden opportunity to see Europe. Alan and I had been over three years ago for a Command Performance, to England and Paris, but wonderful as it was, that was the limit of our travels. There was still so much more to see, but time wouldn't allow it, and we came home feeling there was a big empty space somewhere. This time we hope to cover a lot of ground. All of Europe will be within our reach, and we're hoping for time to see most of it. We haven't a dim idea as to how long we'll be gone—maybe four months, maybe a year. Alan at heart is a homebody, and he never shows too much enthusiasm for leaving the hearth until we actually arrive some place. Me, I've got more of the wanderlust, I guess. It's been (Continued on next page)

Wake Up To More Comfort

Without Nagging Backache

Nagging backache, loss of pep and energy, headaches and dizziness may be due to slow down of kidney function. Doctors say good kidney function is very important to good health. When some everyday condition, such as stress and strain, causes this important function to slow down, many folks suffer nagging backache—feel miserable. Minor bladder irritations due to cold or wrong diet may cause getting up nights or frequent passages.

Don't neglect your kidneys if these conditions bother you. Try Doan's Pills—a mild diuretic. Used successfully by millions for over 50 years. It's amazing how many times Doan's give happy relief from these discomforts—help the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters flush out waste. Get Doan's Pills today!

years since I've really seen Europe, and right now, fast as we're slipping through the water, I wish we were going even faster.

There was no question but that we would take the children, all four of them. And there wasn't much doubt about their reaction. Our kids are ready to take off for any place at any time. They all felt that Honolulu last year was the best thing that had ever happened to them, so when we told them about the forthcoming trip to England, the tide of joy that swept through the house all but took the furniture with it.

One thing is certain—we'll stay in England until Alan's picture is finished, and while our breadwinner is working, the rest of the clan will take short jaunts around the country. When Red Beret is completed, we figure on tackling the continent. It's even possible that Alan will make one more film while we're there, in which case we'll be absent from Hollywood for a year. I've promised MODERN SCREEN to write frequently while we're gone, and to send pictures of us at the Tower of London, or gawking at Notre Dame, or spilling out of a gondola, or any of the wonderful, crazy things that might happen to us.

I EXPECT we'll appear a strange lot to the Europeans. We're sending the car over, and Alan says he hopes it will take the strain. There'll be six Ladds, plus luggage for each one, plus a tutor for the children. School presented a problem; until we know how long we'll be in any one country, it will be impossible to send the three youngest to any formal school, so in the interim they'll be individually tutored. It's going to be crowded, and every time we pile out of the car it will look like that midget act in the circus, but all of us will be too happy to care.

I still can't believe we're here, and trying to remember the chaos of getting such a big family off on such a big venture is difficult. Laddie just came to get Alan and show him the whale that's been spotted off the starboard side, so I don't have to be pinched to prove that I'm at sea. I'm calm enough by now to know that there aren't any whales floating around Hollywood, so we must be on our way.

First there were the passports. We went downtown in a body, except for Alan, and applied without any trouble. All our birth certificates were in order, and this time we didn't have to worry about Alan's records. It seems that court houses are always burning to the ground, but, at any rate, the courthouse in Hot Springs did, and when he and I went over in 1949 we had quite a time proving his citizenship. This time, however, we had his old passport and that was all that was necessary. The worry we did have was waiting for the passports. The children were like watchdogs every day, waiting for the mailman. It was Lonnie who finally came howling up the driveway, envelopes clutched in hand, to inform us that the documents were here.

The smallpox vaccination was another thing. Everybody had to be punctured all over again, and we looked like an infirmary, sitting around the house in our summer clothes, all of us flaunting band-aids on our arms.

I suppose the packing was the worst. And the shopping. Carol Lee is the only one who's stopped growing, and the other three were all stretching out of their clothes. We had to prepare for a year of all kinds of temperatures, and even leaving New York in early September wasn't easy because, while fashion decrees fall clothes at that time, it is usually very warm. (And it was.) It seemed we were shopping all the time, and with my usual caution I sometimes bought more than was needed. I'm always afraid the children won't have enough changes, and throw in an extra or two to make sure. If I weren't aware of this fault myself, I have enough people to remind me. Laddie looked at the socks lying on his bed and shrugged his shoulders. "But I won't need them," he said. David tried on his new navy blue coat and cap and looked as though he would be a great deal happier in his dungarees. Lonnie inspected the blue hat and the brown hat I'd bought for her and informed Alan, "I like the blue one, Daddy, but I won't wear that brown thing." She stuck out her chin defiantly. "I told mother so, too."

"I don't think that's very nice," said Alan. "Your mother's working very hard to get you all ready for the trip."

"Oh, I know," she said airily. "I told her very nicely, you see, but she knows what I mean."

Then one night I went into Carol Lee's room to check the progress of her trunk. "How many things can you get on one hanger?" she said, brushing a lock of hair out of her eyes.

"More than that," I said. 'You'll have to squeeze things a bit." And then I noticed the contents. It looked to me as though Carol Lee had packed nothing but shorts and evening dresses.

"How about some skirts?" I ventured. "There might be an opportunity to wear just a plain skirt once in a while, you know."

But I could see she didn't agree with me. For Carol Lee, it's to be all beaches and balls, and I'll just let her find out for herself that a tweed suit would come in handy.

WE had to get new luggage, of course. Families of this size rarely have enough luggage to take care of the entire membership for an extended trip. There were several new trunks, including our one splurge—a white rawhide trunk for Alan. He promptly turned around and gave it to me, and being feminine, I accepted it without a twist of the arm.

We all wanted to take the dogs, Fritzi and Jezebel, but there is a six months' quarantine on them in England. We'll miss them terribly, but we can't have everything. Lonnie put in a plea to take her lovebird along, but even stretching our understanding of children we couldn't see ourselves laboring up gangplanks and in and out of trains holding a birdcage in one hand. So she compromised by taking four assorted dolls.

David wasn't seen, that last month before leaving, without his cardboard box. It was filled with the things he loves most, and each day it grew more crowded. He was always toting it around, even to the breakfast table, and when we finally had to inform him that electric trains and fire engines and erector sets took up much too much room, he took it quite manfully, we thought, when he turned around and quietly left the room. In two minutes he was back, holding the empty box in his arms. "If I can't take all those toys," he announced, "then I will take my box with me."

Finally we got it all together, and Alan had to sit on a few suitcases before they could be closed. When the collection was eventually piled in the hall near the front door, he raised an eyebrow. "Where," he said, "do we keep all that stuff when it's *un*packed?"

The house was rented, and because it's the pride of our lives, we left it with not a little apprehension. Most worried of all was Lonnie, who didn't care so much about the house itself as she did her new playhouse. "You're sure it'll be all right when we get home," she pleaded.

So we took off, equipped with everything but the kitchen sink, dramamine included. I am trusting the Atlantic Ocean to be tranquil these few days, because I'm the only one who inclines toward seasickness. Of course, I can always depend on Carol Lee, who's a guardian angel with the younger ones. As a matter of fact, Alan and I left Hollywood together two days earlier than the children so that we could visit my aunt in Chicago, and Carol Lee herded the other three onto the train to meet us in New York. In New York we settled down for three days, until September 5th, while Alan gave interviews on The Iron Mistress for Warner Brothers and Thunder In The East for Paramount.

PEOPLE were wonderful, seeing us off. We'd already had a round of farewell parties in Hollywood—one for each of the children by their respective friends, and one for Alan and me and our friends.

We're assured now that Columbia Studio has rented a lovely place for us on the outskirts of London, a house that will be our home for many months. I wish I could describe it to you, but of course I haven't even seen it myself.

David has just asked me how soon lunch will be served, which constitutes the first time in his life he has appeared interested in food. Small wonder, the way they prepare food on this ship. Even Alan, who is strictly a meat-potatoes-and-pie man, has begun to take notice of the sauces and pastries. I doubt if the kids will miss hamburgers and hot dogs very much during the trip. Carol Lee and Laddie were a bit concerned when they learned that such American institutions were lacking in Europe, and one night they walked into the house, each holding two hot dogs. Alan put on his fatherly expression and asked if they didn't think they were overdoing it.

Well, all I have to do now is rest, except for putting those hundreds of little notes and addresses and phone numbers people have given us into a notebook for more systematic reference. The children are being good travelers as always, and now are giving each other language lessons. All of them are familiar with French except Laddie, who studied Spanish, so now he is putting them through the paces and they're learning to count in Spanish.

I suppose the only arguments we might have within the clan will be about our itinerary. They all have a different idea on how we should allocate our time. Lonnie wants to see France—all of it, not just Paris—and Carol Lee will have no peace of mind until she has seen Capri. Laddie, who is slightly crushed because he will be missing the American football season, wants to spend all his waking hours watching rugby games in England, and David—well, David is consumed by curiosity about London. He is convinced it will look like Honolulu, and we're afraid he has a shock coming. But then on the other hand we're sure that the changing of the guard at Buckingham Palace, and the "Beefeaters" at the Tower will endear London to him in a very special way.

As for Alan and myself, we are mainly pleased because the children have such a wonderful opportunity to see the Old World, but there's also the unvarnished fact that we are tremendously excited about it for ourselves. We'll go wherever the children lead, and then throw in a few places of our own.

I'll be writing soon again from faraway places, but that's all for now. END

The Quimbys don't believe in ads

You can't fool the Quimbys with any fancy advertising! They don't even read the ads.

Back in the days when all of our modern household conveniences were first advertised, lots of folks rushed out and bought them—later when the ads told of new and better models, they traded the old ones in. Still are!

But not the Quimbys!

The Quimbys just don't know very much about these things of modern America—and they don't own any of them!

And what you don't know can't hurt you—unless you want to enjoy life!

We think the Quimbys have been overlooking a mighty good thing.

The manufacturers of the products you buy have been trying to outdo each other for years to bring you new conveniences, new ideas . . . new improvements on the old . . . all of which have given us more of the good things of life than any other country in the world!

Companies can only grow when more people prefer their brand names. No matter how large or how small firms might be—you the consumer by your daily brand selections have the first and last word about their future.

In this land of trademarks, you, the consumer, are the Boss. Remember the brands you see advertised in this magazine—and buy where you see them featured.

CHESTERFIELD

FIRST PREMIUM QUALITY CIGARETTE

TO OFFER BOTH REGULAR & KING-SIZE

BOTH regular and king-size Chesterfields are premium quality cigarettes and come in the smart white pack.

BOTH contain only those proven ingredients that make Chesterfield the best possible smoke: the world's best tobaccos, pure, more costly moistening agents (to keep them tasty and fresh), the best cigarette paper that money can buy—nothing else.

BOTH are much milder with an extraordinarily good taste and, from the report of a well-known research organization – no unpleasant after-taste.

BOTH are exactly the same in all respects. There is absolutely no difference except that king-size Chesterfield is larger—contains considerably more of the same tobaccos—enough more to give you a 21% longer smoke, yet costs little more.
